The region seems to be relying on the argument that bigger centres are better. There is some force in that, in that surgeons, radiologists and chemotherapists would be grouped together in the same teaching hospital where, in the words of the region, they have the right setting and, "where progress can be made through sharing of knowledge, experience and opinion." That is a genuine point.

[Dr. Ian Twinn]

However, I have reason to think that that probably is more pious hope than reality and that those who thought up the idea have not thought through the consequences. One of the ideas in the plan is that surgeons and chemotherapists should continue their surgeries and meet their patients in the 16 health districts in the region. They will not, therefore, be concentrated in the regional cancer centres, but spend much of their time going to the district general hospitals and other centres. It seems doubtful that the professional togetherness that the regional planners envisage—for the right reasons—is unlikely to happen.

Dr. M. S. Miller: The argument as to whether there should be a few big centres or a larger number of small ones has been going on for a long time. In the United States, in the sector of high technology, some of the bigger firms have found that it is better to have a larger number of small, bright people—I do not mean small in size—who are given the go-ahead with a limited amount of money. Some of those big firms—3M, for example, but I do not want to mention specifically who they are—have found that they get better results in that way, rather than have a bureaucratic structure with large groups, many of which are not doing very much. It is a better idea to spread matters around with a smaller number of people, but much larger in scope.

Dr. Twinn: The hon. Gentleman illustrates that point well from his own experience.

The report that the regions are relying on in coming to the conclusion that there should be fewer and larger centres recognises that small centres can be good and suggests that it is not necessarily a good idea to close smaller centres. Indeed, it recognises that it can be a good idea to build on the smaller centres and not follow through the idea of bigger and larger centres. That is particularly true in the Thames region, which has some great teaching hospitals situated in the centre of London. No one is arguing that those should be reduced and that we should not have specialist centres. The consultant at the North Middlesex hospital recognises that there are cancers which it cannot treat, and it quickly passes patients to the specialist centres. We are talking of a small percentage of cancer patients who cannot be treated at the cancer centres. A centre such as North Middlesex hospital, and other centres in the region that are to be closed, are not small centres. The North Middlesex is a purpose-built centre with good equipment. It was to have had a linear accelerator which was cancelled by the region only because the report came out. The cost of the cancellation was £40,000, which is not recoverable. If the regional authority listens to the widespread opinion throughout the region it will have to reorder that equipment and re-equip the North Middlesex, which has space for expansion.

The Department of Health and Social Security puts some reliance on the figure of 1 million population as the catchment area for cancer centres. In built-up areas, which I assume includes my constituency, the figure is 2 million population. The Government call in aid two documents —a 1978 circular and "Acute Services for Cancer". In my Adjournment debate, my hon. Friend the Minister refers me to those documents and I have read them again to try to discover the Government's justification for the 1 million population criterion.

I was disappointed by the results of my reading. Both documents contained the broad statement that the 1 million figure is correct. There is no justification for that figure and no appendices showing how it was worked out or giving detailed arguments. The regional health authority should pay particular attention to the lack of argument and evidence from the Government for the centralisation of cancer treatment. I look forward to the Minister's reply today or in future if the Government have to take a decision on the matter.

I suspect that the "Big is Beautiful" movement is left over from the 1960s and 1970s when it was fashionable. We could talk about back-up services and the cost of equipment, but technology changes and becomes more efficient and we can use the same technology in the present units, which are not small and are better located for cancer sufferers.

There is a temptation, which I mentioned in my Adjournment debate, to reward teaching hospitals and their staff with bigger and better facilities at the expense of district general hospitals. The fact that those hospitals may be teaching nurses is often patronisingly forgotten by the planners. I have yet to see a convincing argument that resources in the North-East Thames regional health authority are not being concentrated in teaching hospitals for the sake of rewarding them.

The net result of centralisation in my region and, I suspect, throughout the country may be that centres such as the North Middlesex, which are extremely accessible —we are on the major routes out of London and on the major radial routes round London—will be closed and the travelling time of patients will double. At present, patients from as far away as Hertfordshire, Hackney and Haringey can reach the North Middlesex in a short time. In future, they may be asked to come into central London in the rush hour and try to find a parking space. I have news for them. I sometimes have to take my son to Great Ormond street and I know that parking for a long while is virtually impossible. Cancer sufferers will have to rely on their families to drive them into London and to hang around waiting for them. The alternative will be for patients to come to London by ambulance—12 people at a time, being collected early in the morning and returned late at night.

According to the regional health authorities, it would be better still if there were hostels in which cancer patients could stay during the week. But most of the people we are talking about will die, and we need to alleviate their symptoms while they are being treated with radiotherapy. The regional health authorities would ask them, perhaps in the last year of their lives, to spend long periods away from their families and their loved ones. That is in complete contradiction to the thoughtful speeches of hon. Members in this debate and to the thinking of those involved in cancer treatment and care.

I reiterate that we should be very careful before increasing centralisation on big units where patients may be treated more as numbers than as individuals, where they will not see the same staff on each visit and where it will be much more difficult for their families to visit them.

I praise the Government for their recent announcement about screening for breast and cervical cancer. That is welcomed. I am sure that there is still a long way to go and there is a lot more work to be done for cancer patients, but the Government, working hand in hand with the strong voluntary and charitable sector, can make an enormous contribution to increasing the quality of life for people — no doubt including some hon. Members in the Chamber—who will suffer from cancer.

11.16 am

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) on choosing an important subject for the debate. I am doubly grateful to have the chance to take part in the debate. I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak and I am especially grateful to the dedicated doctors, nurses and staff of the Accrington Victoria hospital and Blackburn royal infirmary, without whose skill and care 12 months ago my only contribution to the debate would have been as a cancer death statistic —one of the 19,000 people who die from cancer of the colon each year.

It comes as a great shock to be told that one has cancer, but the speed of my treatment, from routine X-ray through further tests and admission to hospital to the operation, was a tribute to the efficiency of the National Health Service. It may not be perfect, and we criticise it from time to time, but when emergencies occur it responds quickly and magnificently. Many of my constituents agree with that view.

In cancer cases it is important that investigations and care should be provided without delay, because delays are distressing to patients and their families and, as cancer is a progressive disease, they can be detrimental to the long-term prognosis.

Despite the remarkable progress made in treatment in recent years, the word "cancer" still strikes fear into the hearts of those who are told that they are suffering from it. Most people think of cancer as being synonymous with death.

I was not worried about dying, though I suspect that that was not the attitude of Conservative Central Office, which would have had to defend my majority of 21. Although I was not scared of dying, I am a coward and I was very afraid of the pain that might accompany my death. Therefore, I thank God that the people of east Lancashire, under the inspiring leadership of Dr. Merton Seigleman, had, by fund raising and direct contributions involving the whole community, raised £450,000 to build the East Lancashire hospice. East Lancashire is not an area of great wealth or high wages, but it is an area of great generosity and its people wish to help those in most need.

The regional health authority contributed £150,000 and, perhaps more important, agreed to fund the running costs. Thus, we had established a hospice which has been a blessing to many people. I assure the House that just to know that the hospice is there is a great comfort to many people, as it was to me.

Hundreds of patients have received kindness and care at the hospice. Their pain has been brought under control and many are able to return to their homes and lead normal lives in the knowledge that Dr. Seigleman is on hand if the pain returns. When the end is near they are able to return to the hospice and die with dignity. I pay tribute to Dr. Seigleman and his devoted staff, especially the many voluntary helpers.

In east Lancashire there is a wonderful tradition of self-help. We see a need and we act. We do not wait, nor do we always expect the state to do everything for us. Having established the hospice we are now involved in fund raising for a laser — an appeal sponsored by the Accrington Observer and Times. We are also raising funds for a CAT scanner — an appeal sponsored by the Lancashire Evening Telegraph. The latter appeal has had widespread support since its launch only six weeks ago. The fund hopes to raise—I know that it will—£500,000.

The appeal has such public support because there is a widening recognition that many of the common cancers, which may be difficult to treat at a later stage, are curable if detected and treated earlier. Public awareness of the importance of early diagnosis and optimal treatment on the outcome of the disease has changed the level of expectation of standard of care. There is an increasing expectation that the highest standard of treatment, including the very latest developments, should be available to all.

The NHS cannot be insulated against economic realities. The development of new techniques and improved standards of treatment clearly put a strain on scarce resources — not simply in terms of competing priorities for cash, but also the availability of suitably trained manpower. I believe that the NHS must work in closer partnership with the voluntary sector if rising expectations are to be fulfilled.

When people of an area have shown some initiative and are prepared to try to help themselves, the NHS should offer its support. The NHS benefits greatly in many ways from voluntary efforts — not least through voluntary fund raising. The Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley district health authority has recently unanimously agreed that, to give the voluntary sector the encouragement it deserves, the DHSS should urge the Treasury to make additional funds available to support and supplement local fund raising efforts — preferably on a pound-for-pound basis. It has suggested that, to start with, that support should be restricted to fund raising for DHSS projects and that it should be limited to a maximum support of £2 per person per year based on the district health authority's catchment population. It also believes that it should be restricted to projects that are part of long-term strategic plans.

Such DHSS support would not be at the expense of a commitment to the proper funding of the Health Service; it would be a supplement to such funding, giving a new vital boost to self-help projects. The district health authority estimated that the maximum cost to the Exchequer would be £100 million per year, but the NHS would benefit by £200 million per year. That would enable projects to be funded much sooner than otherwise would be possible with the consequent saving of lives, especially those of cancer patients.

I believe that that scheme has much to commend it. I hope that when the suggestion is discussed by the regional chairman and other district chairmen the Department will give urgent and serious consideration to the proposals.

The people of my area have shown by their efforts their concern for the victims of cancer and their desire that more should be done. Therefore, they welcome—as I do—the Government's recent proposals for cancer screening, which will do much to reduce death from breast cancer as early detection can lead to successful treatment. The Government are to be congratulated on the steps that they have taken to increase and monitor the effectiveness and efficiency of screening. I very much hope that more people will be persuaded to come forward for such screening.

Now that I am fully restored to health it would be remiss of me not to pay tribute to the support I received, during a difficult time, from colleagues in all parts of the House, constituents, friends and relations. Everyone was kind and helpful. However, I could have managed without the headline that appeared in my local evening newspaper a few days before my operation which said, "Tories in by-election drama". I am glad that I was able to disappoint them.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I believe that the whole House echoes the closing remarks of the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves). We are all very pleased when there is an escape from this fearsome type of reaper. We are indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) for bringing this important motion before the House today. I believe that its terms are especially significant for those who have control of the country's resources — Her Majesty's Government.

The motion highlights the importance of Friday debates. Most of our citzens are not aware of the difference between a private Member's Bill and a private Member's motion. These motions allow matters of great public importance to be aired in what is, after all, the forum of the nation. Even if the clash of cymbals and the trumpets of warfare receive prime attention in the public broadcasting of this place — I believe that that broadcasting does not give anything like a proper impression of the House's activities — motions such as this one, calling Ministers to account and highlighting the concerns of our constituents, are very important.

There can hardly be a family in the land who is not, has not been, or may not be affected by this scourge of our modern life. Understandably there is a degree of reticence, sensitivity and, in some cases, fear in confronting and discussing the disease. For that and many other reasons, if not the extent and degree to which whole communities can be savaged by the disease, we must, as a nation, make its confrontation a matter of public endeavour. It is a matter not just for statutory agencies — important and fundamental though they are — but for professional skill and advice combined with the skill of voluntary agencies.

It is the way that all those factors work together throughout and for all the nation that is important. It is a national matter. Therefore — without using the word "nationalisation" — it is a matter of public concern that must be dealt with at a national level by national public finance. Of course, that immediately puts the spotlight on the structure, funding, and strategy of the NHS. Those factors may be judged on how they bear on this problem. The strategy on preventive medicine and the link with voluntary agencies also has a bearing on the problem.

Cancer care and cure can put its own X-ray on how the NHS and the voluntary agencies are tackling the problem. Such treatment and care brings the problem into focus and, as has been said by many hon. Members this morning, it is a matter not just of quantity but of the quality of care with which the Minister should be concerned. The hon. Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) spoke of his fears concerning the new centres and treating people as numbers. The hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) discussed breast cancer and pointed to the fundamental psychological importance of dealing with that particular complaint. It is a matter not just of pounds and pence, but of how they are deployed and the provision of personal caring services.

Anyone can see how all this affects our constituencies. I make no apology for referring to Newham, the second most deprived borough in Britain, according to the quantitative criteria. Cervical cancer smears have been a matter of controversy for some time. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has raised this as a public issue. There has been some response, but things have not gone smoothly in my constituency. The district health authority wished to improve its cervical smear services, but found that funds were not available to do so. There was correspondence, and disagreement, between me and the chairman of the North-East Thames regional health authority. I do not blame him for everything, because there are only limited resources at his disposal. But the funds that we wanted to improve cervical smear services were not available this year. We hope that they will be available in the forthcoming year.

There was misunderstanding and an eruption of letters and publicity in the national and local press, which would not have been necessary if the issue had been sorted out. I suggest to the Government that relatively small sums spent in this area would have prevented the problems that have arisen and will prevent the problems that may arise. The money is needed to improve the callback facilities now on computer in most cases.

This is not a dead issue, but I do not believe that the priorities are being properly addressed everywhere in the country. Even if the system becomes as perfect as we can make it, it depends to some extent on people being registered with general practitioners. It is estimated that up to 30 per cent. of the population in my part of London are not registered with a general practitioner. In those cases, however perfect the system, the recall facility will not operate. Such a system is particularly important for young people who tend to move often, and especially for young women it is a growing problem.

The Forrest report's proposals for breast cancer screening have been given the headlines. I understand that the Royal College of Nursing and its breast care nursing forum have had a part to play in the spotlight which has now been directed to the problem. I understand also that the incidence of breast cancer is much greater than that of cervical cancer — up to 10 times greater. We need to know the figures.

Dr. M. S. Miller: It is 20 times greater.

Mr. Spearing: I understand that it is perhaps 20 times greater. The Forrest report's timeliness is highlighted by what to some is an astonishing figure. Another astonishing figure is the cost of the report — £7·40. I understand that limited copies have been made available to district health authorities. This is just an example of our problems. I do not know the extent of distribution, but I believe that the report deserves wide circulation among district health authorities. I wonder how many copies have been sold at £7·40 a throw. The report and the implications of the Government's announcement last week have to be digested.

I asked the Secretary of State for Social Services

"what additional funds he expects to be allocated to the Newham district health authority in respect of his programme for cancer screening."

I shall read the reply by the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security — the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie)—because it applies to more than 600 constituencies and all the district health authorities. The hon. Lady said:

"Funds will be provided for a national breast cancer screening service to be established in England over the next three years on the basis of centres each serving a population of approximately half a million. It is for regional health authorities to decide in which districts the centres should be located and how the special allocations provided to establish them should be deployed. In 1987-88 each region will receive an allocation of about one third of a million pounds to cover the capital and revenue costs of establishing its first centre. Similar provision will be made for the remaining centres in the following two years." — [Official Report, 6 March 1987; Vol. 111, c. 723.]

That means that my district health authority, which covers three constituencies, will have to battle with 10 or 12 other districts within the North-East Thames regional health authority if we are to set up what I understand from professional advice will be one pilot centre in one district health authority.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): We are implementing the Forrest report exactly as we were recommended to do. Within the next 12 months there will be one regional centre in each region. The Forrest report recommended that the best way for the screening centres to function from that time onwards was to have one centre to every two districts, and that is what we propose to do. Therefore, it is probably not quite accurate to say that the district health authority where the hon. Gentleman's constituency is situated would compete with 10, 12 or 14 other districts. Within the three years, as we get the full system, the hon. Gentleman's constituents will share the centre with another district. The centre may well be situated in Newham, or it may be elsewhere, but that specific decision will be taken by the regional health authority.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. That again illustrates the usefulness of these Friday morning debates when we can obtain information on a leisured and accurate basis. I understand from what the hon. Lady has said that one district will not be favoured with a centre to deal with a population of 500,000, but that the centre will be set up by the region and will serve potentially all the population of the region. The hon. Lady nods her assent. But that will cause all sorts of problems. In the North-East Thames regional health authority, the centre, for geographical reasons, will clearly be somewhere in north-east London. Will it be in Romford, in Waltham Forest or in Newham? What is to be the system of referral? The potential demand would appear to be 10 times the provision, if the figure given by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is correct. We shall get one centre serving a wide area, but 10 years of funding will be required to give a comprehensive service.

Although we welcome this initiative — something being better than nothing—it is clear that the demand in the first year by general practitioners is likely to be almost 10 times the supply of the service, even given the centres that the Minister will provide. If that is correct — no doubt the hon. Lady will correct me if I am wrong—the Government's initiative must be put into perspective. I foresee problems of choice and of administration.

As the hon. Member for Broxbourne said—I am glad to see her in her place again — breast cancer is a particularly difficult matter for the patient. I understand that the morbidity rate of those patients who are involved in treatment is up to 40 per cent. This brings me back to the issue of cancer counselling. The problem is just as much psychological as medical.

Mrs. Roe indicated assent.

Mr. Spearing: I am glad to see that the hon. Lady agrees.

In the borough of Newham there is an excellent organisation which deserves to be better known, Cancer: You Are Not Alone—CYANA. It provides a meeting place and forum. It is a co-operative group, mainly of ladies who give support to each other, and it is an excellent arrangement. It is funded by the local authority out of its well-used rate support grant. I hope that it is not affected by recent developments. It is that sort of voluntary effort, funded slightly and given the seedcorn of public money, that we all applaud wholeheartedly. It is perhaps one of the best examples of a proper partnership between statutory and voluntary authorities.

I move from organisations such as CYANA to the hospice movement, which has been mentioned by many hon. Members. We should be grateful for it, but the mere fact that it is a movement that has arisen from voluntary effort illustrates the fact that there must have been a gap in our professional and more customary statutory services in the first place. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said, we are all dying in one sense or another anyway, and dealing with that is a high proportion of the medical profession's task. We all know from our own experience that hospitals are there to cure, but sometimes the care of those who are beyond cure needs attention. It is in that area that the hospice movement started and where it has been so valuable.

In east London, St. Joseph's hospice is well known, and the Macmillan services do excellent and praiseworthy work in homes, which is important. I understand from those involved that, contrary to some public impression, hospices are not only for those who are terminally ill. The condition of many of those who suffer from cancer can be stabilised. Stabilisation can be for a long period, perhaps after two or three short return visits to the hospice. So the hospice movement is for those not just nearing the autumn of life, but for those who may be given life again. That is why that movement and the home care services that the associated nursing staff give are so important.

We all know that the alleviation of pain and the amount of tranquillity that can be achieved by those suffering from cancer are important. That has been referred to several times by hon. Members. The tranquillity and philosophy that some people display are an example to us all. However, the services of those who go out from hospices, treat the patients and counsel their families are fundamental in the hospice movement. I understand that there are some difficulties. A hospice's beds cannot always be used. In some hospices, a proportion of beds are empty. Why is that? It is partly because the necessary voluntary funds may not be available, but there is an additional constraint. If someone leaves the hospice—many do for nursing care at home — domiciliary support nursing is necessary. In some cases it is provided by the district health authority with the help of public funds. However, where those funds are not available, or where there is an imbalance between beds and nursing facilities, those beds cannot be used.

[Mr. Spearing]

Therefore, I ask the Minister to undertake to look at the problem. I do not think that she will give an undertaking immediately, but I think that she can undertake to look at the problem. I should have thought that it is right and proper for the NHS to say that where hospice beds can be funded by voluntary sources, the NHS, through the district health authority, will provide the necessary domiciliary skilled Macmillan-type back-up to enable those beds to be fully used. It would be a scandal, voluntary agencies having established hospices, for those beds not to be used because there was insufficient public backing to make them usable. I hope that if that problem exists it will be rapidly eliminated.

We have heard much recently about the strategy of regional health authorities in respect of cancer treatment and detection. Nowadays funds are often devoted to spectacular medical cures. We must look at the balance between the funds established and maintained for those purposes and those of cancer detection, stabilisation and cure, because, as has been said time and again, that disease is one of the major killers.

Recently a horrific disease has received an enormous amount of publicity, but we must remember that the majority of people suffer even more through the disease of cancer. What of them? We must make sure that we get things in balance, otherwise we, as public representatives or people involved in the medical profession, will be found not to be doing our duty.

What about preventive medicine? It is one of those things to which people pay lip service, but they do not necessarily take a great deal of action. There is a welcome movement of well women clinics. A great deal of our discussion today has been about cancer in women. What about well men clinics or well person clinics? We in the House are privileged because at three or four-year intervals check-ups are available to us. Why are they not available to the whole population, if necessary? Surely we in the House should not rest until such comparable facilities are available easily for every person who wishes to use them.

What about the role of general practitioners? Do we pay sufficient attention to the epidemiological techniques of finding out causes not just of cancer but of environmentally linked diseases? What about the role of the medical officer of health? I do not believe that he exists now. Many years ago I remember hearing anecdotes from an elderly doctor who was a medical officer of health. He said that the best tools of a medical officer of health were a sharp pair of eyes and a sniffing nose. We have community physicians. They are also concerned with the scourge of cancer. But do we give them the proper prominence in our district health authorities and community health councils? Those are relevant questions.

What about the role of family practitioner committees? Are they only committees operating the contractor relationship between medical practitioners and the community? We in east London have problems of coverage, with the hours that general practitioners' surgeries are open and the number of visits that they can make. On today's Order Paper, as the Minister will know, there is a modest Bill arising from deficiencies in that respect. Do we say to our family practitioner committees, "You have a role in the detection, prevention and cure of cancer through the general practitioner services."?

We have all heard of colleagues who have suddenly become ill, gone to their general practitioner and found that the disease is well advanced. What role can general practitioners play in preventing or producing preventive measures to stop that happening? It is possible that not only hon. Members but the entire nation have inverted priorities about such matters. This debate, initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Springburn, has enabled those issues to be aired in the place where such matters should be aired.

The treatment and care of cancer patients is the responsibility of the entire nation. It is the responsibility of us all to ensure that we encourage the whole person. The nation, through public, voluntary and private means as well as family sacrifice, should encourage those who are less fortunate than hon. Members in the Chamber today.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): I am spurred to make a small contribution to the debate by the quality and the scope of the speeches that I have heard. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred to the medical surveillance scheme that applies to Members of Parliament at the moment. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) whose House of Commons (Services) Committee accepted the arguments that were put forward by the hon. Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) and myself after two years work, and instituted the medical surveillance scheme, which is working extremely well. Such a scheme could be considered for every section of the community and population. Indeed, it is being implemented in some places.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) has done a service in terms of the scope and priorities that he envisages in his motion, which sets out clearly the way in which a civilised community should think about the disease of cancer.

The horror and terrifying power of the disease have been triggered in my mind. In science and medicine, one can encounter horrific injuries and diseases of various kinds, where people are badly affected, but the body mechanism helps the patient. Often natural help, without invasive help from the medical profession, can bring that person to perfect health again. However, in the case of cancer, it is incredible that a little spot or blemish on one's skin—often the size of a pin head, if not smaller—can develop into a condition that kills the whole human organism. The mind boggles at the ability of the disease.

When I was a medical student, progress was just beginning to be made into antibiotics against infectious diseases. When we learned about Dr. Paul Ehrlich's magic bullet, we thought that infectious disease could be controlled by vaccination, inoculation, or the giving of antibiotics or bacteriostatics. Bacteriostatic and bacteriocidal medicaments have been given different names at different times. That area of research not only showed promise, but lived up to that promise. There are few infectious diseases now that are not preventable or curable. However, cancer does not fall into that category.

As a medical student, I felt that the cure or prevention of heart disease and cancer were the two problems that remained to be conquered. Unfortunately, in the last few years, we have seen another one, which bears a strong relationship to cancer. The way in which the AIDS virus, HIV, works is similar to what happens to the human cell in cancer. That is why there is considerable evidence that some cancers and leukaemias are viral in their origins.

Although the state of medicine and science at the moment in relation to curing the disease is not static—it is making slow progress—at least one can say that there is a much greater understanding of what causes cancer. As it primarily affects the older members of the population and as people are enabled to live longer, we expect the incidence of cancer to increase. Indeed, with the better methods of diagnosis in the past 25 years one would also expect an increase in the number of cancers. Fortunately, advances towards cures have been made in science and nursing. It is difficult to speak of "cures" because the disease may appear to be cured, but can recur or break out anew many years later.

The Forrest report is excellent in the limited but extremely important matter of mammary cancer. Incidentally, that can also affect men and, perhaps, men as well as women should be screened. I have seen one such case in my lifetime; the incidence is not great.

Mrs. Currie: I can confirm that breast cancer is not confined to women. I understand that about 100 men a year die from breast cancer, but that pales into insignificance beside the 15,000 deaths a year of women. At present, our plans are directed wholly towards women which I hope the hon. Gentleman will accept.

Dr. Miller: I accept that entirely and have no objection to it. It is one of those little matters that sparks in one's mind as we are now in an era of equality of the sexes. The point is well made and I take it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Springburn has done a great service bringing his motion before the House and I wish to say a few words about prevention. Cancer is common and accounts for almost a quarter of all deaths. That figure is fairly constant in most parts of the world, certainly in developed countries. There is a variation from 22 per cent. to 25 per cent. As the disease is difficult to cure, it is incumbent on us to prevent it where possible. I cannot make a big enough plea for people to forget the propaganda that cigarette smoking has not been proved to be the cause of lung cancer. It depends on what is meant by proof. Sometimes it is not easy to juxtapose cause and effect and to reach a conclusion.

Evidence has been accumulating for a long time. The Doll report was published in 1956—that is 31 years ago —and I stopped smoking then. After about 10 years, many doctors had stopped smoking and the incidence of lung cancer among them fell. It falls after a period in every group which smokes less. That cannot be coincidental. Since cigarette smoking is responsible for many conditions in addition to lung cancer, that should be a strong incentive for people to stop smoking.

I do not favour a complete ban on cigarette smoking, if for no other reason than that it would be impossible to effect. However, I am certainly in favour of a complete ban on smoking in all public places where others can be affected. There has undoubtedly been an increase in the incidence of cancer through passive smoking and inhaling smoke. I invite colleagues on both sides of the House to do everything in their power to ensure that all efforts are made to reduce the areas where smoking is permitted and to hammer home that message.

It is, as it ought to be, the norm not to smoke. Two thirds of the population do not smoke. About 25 or 30 years ago 75 per cent. of the population did smoke and, therefore, the message is having a great effect. We should not be lulled into any false sense of security by those who say that the relationship between smoking and cancer has not been proved.

I again commend the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Springburn and other hon. Members who have contributed to the debate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) said, there is something different about Friday debates. I suppose it has been going on for years—one forgets that it happened in the past — but certainly in recent years Friday's debates have been excellent, not only in the subjects discussed but the contributions made by hon. Members and, not infrequently, the responses from the appropriate Ministers.

I ask the Minister who is to reply to pay particular attention to the terms of the motion and to the points of view that have been expressed by hon. Members. I should say to the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) that I, too, feel a sense of elation when someone escapes the evil of cancer. I am sure, from the type of condition he had, that he will live a full life without any great problems resulting from his operation. I wish him all the best in the future.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I should like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) on his good fortune in winning the raffle and our good fortune in him choosing topics relating to cancer as the subject for debate. There have been many interesting contributions, including those from Opposition Members, but I hope that they will not take it amiss if I say that the most touching contribution was made by the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) who drew on his own experience. It was moving to hear the hon. Gentleman describe and pay tribute to those who helped save his life. I felt that he showed admirable levity in the matter which I am sure I could not have displayed had I undergone the same experience.

What he did and said should be taken as an example to show that there are many cancers which, if caught in time, can be treated, and that people can lead entirely full and happy lives thereafter. That is one of the most important lessons that can be drawn from the debate. Despite, at one level, many people understanding that that is the case, at another level there are large numbers of people who feel that the mention of the word cancer is a death sentence and give up. Giving up is no way to survive. I am not suggesting that one can overcome some types of cancer by sheer willpower, but without it it is difficult to benefit from the medical and surgical help available.

Cancer, as we know, is a major individual cause of deaths in Britain. There are questions that must be asked. Are we doing all we can to carry out useful and productive research into finding out what causes it and what can be done to prevent it and treat it? Are we taking measures to prevent cancers? Are we taking measures to treat cancers and are we taking the necessary steps and providing sufficient resources in a proper form to help those who are trying to deal with that suffering?

With regard to prevention, it is a plain fact that the major preventive action that could be taken in this country is a really substantial effort to stop people from smoking.

[Mr. Frank Dobson]

There was publicity this week about a National No Smoking Day or whatever it was called. However, our effort in relation to the problem is quite trivial. We are just playing with the matter until we do something about the advertising and promotion of cigarettes. By doing something, I mean doing something nasty about the advertising and promotion of cigarettes.

Smoking kills 100,000 of our people a year. Not all of them, by any means, die of cancer. Nevertheless, smoking kills 100,000 people a year. It follows as night follows day that the cigarette industry must recruit another 100,000 smokers to make up for those it has killed. That is a plain fact and the industry sets about its task in a skilful way. It knows, for instance, as we all know, that very few people take up smoking for the first time after the age of 20. Consequently, the bulk of advertising and promotional activity by the cigarette industry is directed at young people and, because young women, at least until recently, had smoked considerably less than young men, that activity has been directed particularly at young women.

The cigarette industry is pretty successful at drumming up people to buy its deathly product. I do not believe that any amount of sincere efforts by some Ministers in the Department of Health and Social Security to get people to stop smoking is likely to have the necessary effects to bring about the required reduction.

There is now a class bias in smoking in the sense that the relatively well off and well informed have tended to give up smoking while those who are less well off and less well informed have tended not to give it up. In health education, there has always been what I have previously described as the "too much of the Habitat and not enough of the Tesco" approach. We have been quite good at getting the message across to people who, roughly speaking, are pretty well informed in the first place. However, we have been pretty lousy at getting it over to those who are not well informed to begin with.

The best way to get the message across is the Labour party policy. I am glad that this policy has been adopted as it involves prohibiting by statute all forms of advertising and promotion of tobacco products. That, and only that, will bring about a substantial reduction in the capacity of the cigarette industry to recruit more people to kill. We must stop that recruitment.

Screening women for the signs of the early stages of cervical cancer has been called prevention, although I do not believe that it is really prevention. Perhaps I should refer briefly to attempting to prevent cervical cancer. There seems to be considerable evidence now that cervical cancer in women is caused by small genital warts in men. Therefore, if the Government's campaign to get people to wear condoms as a method of contraception is successful, that may have the side effect of reducing the incidence of cervical cancer. There is some evidence that barrier forms of contraception will reduce cervical cancer. Further studies should be carried out to verify the evidence that has been brought forward to date about the causes of cervical cancer so that we can set about preventing it rather than just having the early warning system in the screening process to treat the early signs of cervical cancer.

In 1981, the Government's committee on gynaecological cytology advised them to introduce computer-based call and recall cervical cancer screening schemes in every district health authority in England and Wales and every health board in Scotland. The Government did not do very well on that, because when they allegedly passed on the committee's advice to the health authorities they missed out the vital aspect, which was that they should introduce a call system as well as a recall system. It was not until 1985 that the Government got round to advising health authorities that call was a vital aspect of the committee's recommendations.

In a parliamentary answer to me on 6 November 1986 — I always attach great weight to the accuracy of parliamentary answers — the Government claimed that this time last year 33 of the 191 health authorities in England were operating cervical cancer call and recall schemes. The answer went on to say that, of the 158 health authorities that had not implemented such schemes as at 31 March 1986, 76 planned to do so by the end of this month.

In pursuit of truth and justice, I asked my secretary and someone else who works for me to telephone those 76 health authorities. The parliamentary answer of 6 November was confirmed as recently as February by the Secretary of State in his statement on cervical and breast cancer screening and AIDS research. I do not accuse him or anyone else of lying, because that would be out of order and, in any case, it may not have been his fault. However, I accuse him of not checking the accuracy of what he asserted. Up to this morning, my staff had managed to contact 56 of the health authorities and discovered that no fewer than 42 do not yet operate call and recall schemes in their areas.

Darlington expects to have such a scheme by April this year; East Cumbria by July; Gateshead by September; Tyneside by April; South West Durham probably later this year — whatever that may mean — and Dewbury in April. Leeds, Western might do it by 1988-89. Northallerton hoped to have a partial recall scheme, but no call scheme, in operation by the end of 1987. Scunthorpe said that it hopes to have a system by the autumn of 1987. Wakefield says June this year. Leicestershire said that such a system was imminent, which is bureaucratese for mañana. Nottingham says within the next few weeks, while Norwich and West Norfolk hope to have the system by July this year. East Surrey, Kingston and Esher, Mid-Surrey, North-West Surrey, South-West Surrey and West Surrey and North-East Hampshire say that the hardware has just been installed and that they hope to have a system in operation by March 1988.

Bath says that one third of its area which is covered by one family practitioner committee has coverage, and it hopes that the other two thirds will be covered "fairly soon" and "a bit later" — whatever that may mean. Southampton says that it will have a scheme by June or July. Aylesbury Vale says that it hopes to have a scheme working by September 1987. Kettering says July or August. Milton Keynes says September. Northampton says that the first patients might be called in September. Wycombe says that its scheme will not come on stream until it has had time to evaluate the results from Aylesbury Vale. The House will recall that Aylesbury Vale says that its system will be in operation by September this year. Bromsgrove says it hopes to do it by April.

The great city of Birmingham with five health districts says that it hopes to have one pilot scheme — not a proper scheme — in operation and that the other four are still at the planning stage. North Warwickshire says that it expects to start calling patients, but not before June.

Herefordshire says it will be in operation there at the end of 1987. Five health authorities in Cheshire—Chester, Crewe, Halton, Macclesfield and Warrington—that had promised to have it in operation by the end of this month say that it will now be April. Tameside says that the first patients will be called in September or October, Bury says August, and so it goes on.

I expect that the people on my staff will by now have just about completed getting in touch with the other 20 out of the 76, but on the strength of what they have found so far they will not find that many of the health authorities which we were promised would have schemes in operation in this financial year will have them in operation. That is most disturbing but, I am sorry to say, it is typical of the Government's treatment of this issue. Ever since 1981 when they received the advice from the committee on gynaecological cytology, their response to the report and to the proper implementation of these vital schemes has been slipshod, to say the least. That is a disgrace. We know that women will die as a result of this slipshod attitude by the Government.

Perhaps in slightly less offensive tones it appears that The Lancet shares our view, because talking about the Government's proposed initiative on breast cancer screening the issue of 7 March says:

"'standards must not be sacrificed to expediency. The UK has a poor record in the organisation and management of its cervical cancer screening programme and the same mistakes must not be made again'."

It does not amount to making mistakes, because the Government have not been making much of anything and certainly not making progress. We need further progress if women are to be saved from cervical cancer. One of the problems is that, although the Government have rather late in the day issued instructions to health authorities, they have never given them earmarked funds with which to do the job. Health authorities in London that I know have been faced with the choice of introducing a cervical cancer screening system or continuing to fund cardiac surgery for the last month of the financial year. I cannot blame those authorities if they choose to come down on the side of keeping cardiac surgery going. I blame the people who are not providing them with the funds, especially funds that are earmarked for these purposes.

Dr. M. S. Miller: The figures that my hon. Friend has quoted are disturbing. It is important that the suggestions made by my hon. Friend should be taken up. In my native city of Glasgow when I was a councillor about 1956-57, the health committee instituted a massive radiography campaign. Glasgow had about four hospitals devoted entirely to the treatment of tuberculosis, but within 12 months we were able to close them all. We detected every case of tuberculosis and treated patients with the modern drugs available at the time, and were able to wipe the disease from the face of Glasgow.

Mr. Dobson: I accept what my hon. Friend says. If the right amount of effort is put into screening and it is properly carried out, it works to great effect.

One aspect that bothers me is that the Secretary of State in his February statement about breast cancer screening said that he was ensuring that a close watch was kept on progress with cervical screening because the Government wanted to increase the takeup. If the Department has not sufficient grip on the situation to know whether anything or nothing is being done, its chances of discovering the takeup rate in the minority of health authorities which have introduced screening must be very small. Staff from my office rang around to discover the takeup rates. The lowest rate given was 40 per cent. in Manchester, where the authority had at least kept tabs on how many women responded. That figure is nothing like good enough. We must put far more effort into achieving a greater response. In parts of Scandinavia the response rate is 90 per cent. or more. Until we can achieve that level in this country, the situation will remain unsatisfactory. Even more disturbing than the figure for Manchester was the fact that most authorities with schemes in operation could not even give the response rate because the system did not make it possible. Clearly, insufficient attention is being paid to the aims of the scheme.

The Government promised to publish the Forrest report in December, but they did not get around to it until February. Their response, as far as it goes, has been welcomed by most people but, given the rag-bag situation in relation to cervical cancer six years after the equivalent report was published, every woman in this country and every man who cares about women's health must look with a jaundiced eye at the Government's promises about breast cancer screening.

I do not usually seek to disagree with the recommendations of an expert committee, but I have doubts about some of the Forrest recommendations. For instance, it is proposed that breast cancer screening should be confined to women between the ages of 50 and 65. I understand the reason for that. It is because there is a high incidence of breast cancer among women in that age group and technically it is relatively easier to use mammography to find lumps which may be cancerous, so there is a good pay-off in relation to the effort involved. Many people, however, want the age limit brought down as soon as technically and humanly possible so that women of 35 and 40 can also be screened.

There is one recommendation with which I disagree completely. It relates to the screening of women over the age of 65. Of all the 10-year age groups, women in the first decade above 65 have the second highest incidence of cancer and are extremely vulnerable to breast cancer. The explanation for the Forrest report recommendation that nothing should be done for those women is not that it is technically difficult to find the lumps and carry out the necessary diagnosis, but that women over 65 do not come forward very much for screening. I do not know how anybody knows whether they come forward very much because there is scarcely anywhere where they have had an opportunity to come forward. More and more people, especially women, are living longer, and most women of between 65 and 75 regard themselves as perfectly normal and entitled to any treatment that is going for younger age groups. I think that they are right.

The other explanation put forward by the Forrest report is that women between the ages of 65 and 75 may die of something else. So they may, but the object is to so stop them dying of breast cancer. The Government should reconsider the upper limit recommended by Forrest and ask why on earth there is a cut-off point when, perhaps with a lot of effort, we could save about as many lives in that age group as among those aged between 50 and 65.

Implementing the Forrest report properly will require a considerable and consistent commitment by Government during the next few years, but it is not just a matter of buying a few X-ray machines, although practically every part of the country will need new machines designed and earmarked to screen symptomless women. Moreover, practically every part of the country will need new or newly adapted buildings because, by and large, symptomless women should not be screened in the same units as women who have been referred for mammography by a doctor who thinks that there is something wrong with them. For many reasons the service should not be provided in part of the ordinary X-ray unit.

Staff are even more important than machines and buildings. It is a disappointment that the Government received the interim report on Christmas eve 1986 and that nothing has yet been done to identify the staff who must be recruited, trained and put in place if we are to have a proper breast screening system. Although Forrest's final recommendations were not known then, they were fairly predictable, and the Department should have done far more, in consultation with the professions and the health authorities, to get on with the work in anticipation of the report's likely recommendations. Not much has been done on that score, even on what might be described as the technical side.

There is another aspect of the Government's response to the Forrest report which does not have the emphasis right. As the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) rightly said, women's breasts are precious to them, and there are all sorts of psychological problems and fears about having anything done to them. Neither Forrest nor the Government's response give sufficient attention to the need to recruit and train nurses throughout the country to give proper psychological advice to the 50 out of 1,000 women who show some signs that they require further attention after being screened and the three to six out of those 50 who may require an operation. Those 50 women will suffer massive psychological problems until they can be assured that they do not need treatment, and even more massive psychological problems will be suffered by the limited number of women who will need treatment. The Forrest report does not give sufficient weight to deploying staff to give that psychological help and counselling, nor to giving women the necessary information and confidence to have a bit of a say in how they will be treated. Everybody agrees that that is a welcome and useful development.

I said that I did not like criticising official technical reports, but the organisation that Forrest has proposed is probably the most dubious aspect of the report. The history of the cervical cancer screening system shows how immensely difficult it is even when each health authority is under an obligation. If we are now saying, roughly speaking, that there will be one local breast cancer screening unit for every two health authorities, the potential for argument, dispute, local petty jealousies and delay is immense. There will be arguments about where the unit should be located, who will provide the back-up, and such matters. It makes me cringe to think of the potential delays. We all know of the degree of rivalry between various hospitals, between people who have been to different medical schools and between consultants who have not spoken to one another for 20 years. There is a danger that local jealousies and so on will delay and foul up even the regions' decisions as to where the major regional centres will be. I ask the Minister to consider—not necessarily in reply to the debate, because considered responses are better than ones made on-the-hoof as an immediate response to something that someone has said—whether the Ministry needs to lay down from the centre who will have operational responsibility for each scheme. The only way in which it can do that is to earmark the funds for each of those schemes on the first instance, and not ask two, three or four health authorities to have a barney about who will do the job and an even bigger barney about who will find the money to do it. There is a great potential for delay in that.

Mr. Spearing: I touched on this issue in relation to the North-East Thames regional health authority. Is my hon. Friend suggesting—in an army analogy—that, although a regional health authority might be attached to a district for pay and rations, it should be responsible for strategy, funding, operations and regional priorities?

Mr. Dobson: Not quite. Often, the existence of the regional tier is used as an excuse for irresponsibility by Ministers and district health authorities. If my hon. Friend asks Newham health authority why they are not doing something, it will say, "The region has not given us the money." If my hon. Friend then complains to a Minister that Newham does not have the money, the Minister will say, "That is an autonomous decision of the North-East Thames region." In this case, if we attach as much importance as we should to the proper, effective and swift introduction of a breast screening system, then we should not have any confused responsibilities. Either Ministers or the local health authorities take the hammer. No intermediary should be hanging around, confusing matters.

There are in England almost the same number of family practitioner committees as the number of units recommended by the Forrest report. As those committees will be the basis of the call and recall system, because they should possess age-sex registers and the necessary computers, perhaps the Minister and her officials could consider—I do not ask for an instant response—whether it would be sensible to base the local centres on family practitioner committees. That would get round the problem of arguments between districts.

I emphasise that we cannot expect women to suffer the delays in breast cancer screening that they have faced in cervical cancer screening. I do not wish to be controversial, but I cannot agree with the endorsement of the hon. Member for Broxbourne of the role of the private sector. It is crucial to ensure that all women are covered, and the only organisation that covers all women is the NHS. In addition, the private sector does not appear to have the necessary capacity to follow up some of its work. BUPA's medical research outfit—if we can call it that—said:

"We have attempted to follow up the 86 women who were found to have abnormal smears at the BUPA Medical Centre in London in 1982 but despite letters and telephone calls have been able to trace only 54".

Only 63 per cent. had been traced. If the private sector does not have the age-sex registers, the computing capacity or the localised base of family practitioner committees, it will always be in that position. I fear that a number of women will go to the private sector, in the absence of a proper NHS scheme in their locality, and will get lost to the system. We need a proper, comprehensive screening system rather than a lot of bits and pieces.

The hon. Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) spoke about the organisation of the treatment of cancer. The North-East Thames regional health authority, which serves one quarter of London and south-east England, carried out a review of its major cancer treatment centres. Many doubts were expressed about that review and the report produced by Coopers and Lybrand was a disgrace to the management consultancy profession. It was denounced not just by me, but by several Conservative Members, not because they disliked its conclusions, but because it was slipshod and inaccurate.

A few weeks after the report was issued, the regional authority was forced to issue two and a half or three and a half pages of corrections—not of typing errors, but of facts. Some centres that were said to have linear accelerators or simulators did not have them, and centres that were reported as not having such equipment did have it. The regional health authority paid £80,000 for that load of rubbish. I am glad that it ignored almost all the recommendations and set up a little working party of its own, which produced better-founded, if not more acceptable, conclusions.

The original report, referring to the incidence of cancer in the region, produced figures that differed from those of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, which is normally an accurate source of information. It even predicted a lower work load for the new centres than that currently carried out by the existing centres. It appeared to suggest that, in some way or other, the review would crack cancer in North-East Thames region. It also produced alternative travel times from various places to various centres. I believe that those estimates were denounced by the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) as plain wrong. I will go no further. Suffice to say that people were extremely dubious about the report.

I feel somewhat responsible for what happened next. As some of the centres for North-East Thames are located in London, I did not believe that it would be a sound thing for North-East Thames to review its major provision without considering what would happen in the other three Thames regions — North-West Thames, South-West Thames and South-East Thames. I asked Ministers whether they would consider urging the four health authorities to get together or whether they might hold the ring, intervene and require an overall review. Ministers refused to do so, but the regional health authorities, after a fashion, did it themselves. The only disturbing feature was that the authorities employed Coopers and Lybrand to advise them. North-West Thames region stated:

"Coopers and Lybrand are conducting the four reviews, building on the methodology developed for their review of services in North East Thames, and maintaining continuity in the membership and expertise of the Review Team they have engaged to undertake the detailed review."

I believe that that is the smallest commendation that can be made for the review team. Having made one shambles, it was invited to produce possibly three other shambles for the other three Thames regions. However, we all learn from our mistakes—I make as many as anyone and I try to learn from them—and perhaps Coopers and Lybrand will attempt to learn from its mistakes. Perhaps it has.

I am disturbed because South-West Thames region told me that it had commissioned Coopers and Lybrand, which for the purposes of the review for South-West Thames, is assuming that the plans already prepared in North-East and South-East Thames regions will be implemented. That is absurd. The object must be a thorough-going, proper review of provision throughout the four regions rather than to assume that the ones that have got off first will stick by their proposed plans, especially as the proposals in North-East Thames have been changed a number of times. Those proposals have gradually improved, but not enough.

My other objection to such a process of review is that all such reviews have pre-supposed that no more resources are available for major cancer treatment centres in any of the regions. I do not believe that that is the proper approach. The four Thames regions should have got together to set up a small unit consisting of members from each region. That unit should have produced a review of the provisions it believed would be necessary. The regions should have then asked for the money that they believed was necessary. They should not have supposed, "We will not have enough in the first place, so let's bodge around and see what we can do to get near to a scheme which will do as good a job as possible with the money that is available".

That is the wrong approach. It is certainly the wrong approach at a time when the Government are contemplating giving as much as a 4p in the pound tax cut next week. If there is enough money to contemplate taking twopence off income tax, surely to God we have enough money to allow the British health authorities to decide what they believe will be needed to treat cancer properly and find the money for them to do so.

The Opposition support the call for more effort to be put into cancer research. The shortage of funds—I shall not call them "cuts" in case it causes offence—within certain health authorities where practical clinical cancer research is being carried out is having an impact on that research. To provide additional nursing to carry out the various bits of clinical experimentation to deal with cancer research at St. Bartholomew's hospital, the health authority provided additional nurses on top of the money that the Imperial Cancer Research Fund provided. The authority has said that it can no longer afford to provide the additional nurses. It will continue to fund the ordinary level of nursing, but the extra level of nursing provided in the Kenton children's ward at Bart's will have to be met by the ICRF. As well as directly funding the research, the ICRF is expected to fund part of the nursing. That is characteristic of what is happening all over the country. There must be continued research efforts. We need to do more to prevent cancer and to screen people. We clearly need to do more and to do better in terms of cancer treatment so that everyone can be properly treated by people who have the necessary resources and necessary capacity to care. I am delighted to see that that care was deployed to such good effect on the hon. Member for Hyndburn. I hope that that will be an example to everyone.

A number of hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), have mentioned the hospice movement, which developed in the voluntary sector and has set an example. Although my hon. Friend rightly said that people who are not terminal cases sometimes stay in hospices and benefit from that stay, a curious fact emerges. People looking at the system without knowing what has happened might think that it is wrong to establish a place where one basically goes to die and feel that it is an artificial and possibly unpleasant place to go. But it is clear that if a place sets out to provide the atmosphere, care and concern that characterises the hospice movement, it succeeds better in helping people to cope with dying and in helping their relatives to cope with death than does a general hospital, where other activities are occurring all the time and which, even with the best will in the world by the staff, are not geared for the sympathy, kindness and cajoling that goes on in a hospice.

We welcome the development of the hospice movement. We should like it to be extended. It is right and proper that the Health Service should take on its share of providing hospice care, particularly when a number of small hospitals here and there are no longer needed for acute treatment or for treatment that has gone out of fashion or is no longer needed. The NHS should take up the baton — but not take it out of the hands of the voluntary movement—and provide hospices.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Springburn for choosing this subject for debate. Not every debate is of particular benefit to the people of this country, but I hope that at least some will draw some benefit from the products of this one.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I apologise to both Front Benches for my late arrival to the debate. I gave prior notice that I would be late. I launched a mobile surgery in my constituency this morning, but, as it was Friday the 13th, I was not helped when a tyre on my car burst as I was going through Whitechapel about an hour ago.

I commend the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) on choosing this subject for debate. I wish that it were not necessary, but there is no doubt that cancer is well known to all hon. Members. We have all known someone who has had cancer, and we all have friends and relatives who have been affected by the disease.

Unfortunately, I did not hear the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves), but I well remember the personal trauma that he experienced when he was told that he had cancer. I went to see him in hospital, and I join him in congratulating all the staff and people who looked after him at Accrington Victoria hospital. There is no doubt that he owes his life to that hospital, with the excellent care that was provided.

The subject that I wish to bring to the attention of the House is on two fronts. It is all about the care and treatment of cancer patients. I wish to bring to the House's attention a document produced by the North-East Thames regional health authority, entitled "A Better Cancer Service". The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) commented on it. I wish to bring that document to the attention of the House because it has caused grave disquiet throughout south-east Essex. In the introduction we are told:

"Cancer occurs when cells in tissues and organs of the body get out of control. They divide and multiply and form tumours. The smallest tumour detectable by the most advanced diagnostic equipment might have as many as one thousand million cells.

Surgery or radiotherapy, or the two combined, will often halt the spread of a tumour—the first by removal of the affected area, the second by the destruction of the cancer cells with high-voltage x-rays. Nevertheless, some of the cancer cells may already have invaded other parts of the body."

The introduction concludes:

"Advances in surgical techniques and radiotherapy will continue, but the best long-term hopes of beating cancer may well rest in developing drugs which can get at cancer cells that surgery and radiotherapy cannot reach—drugs which will kill the cells or change their behaviour."

The document goes on to outline the authority's proposals for improving cancer care services.

The Government have adopted a most serious and responsible attitude to the treatment of cancer patients. I am delighted with the amount of money that they have committed to the long-term task of trying to find a permanent cure for that horrific disease. In the interim, we must concentrate on how best to treat it. For the people of south-east Essex, the best way to treat cancer patients in our area is to leave alone the excellent facility that we already have at Southend hospital.

I realise that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary has already answered an Adjournment debate on that subject. The constituents of seven right hon. and hon. Members are served by that facility. I refer to my right hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and for Billericay (Mr. Proctor), the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and, last but not least, my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark).

In Basildon, more than half of the people who are diagnosed as suffering from cancer receive treatment from Southend hospital, which provides an excellent facility. Frankly, we were horrified by the proposals put forward by the North-East Thames regional health authority to take that excellent facility away from Southend and move it to Harold Wood. The report in page 11, appendix 3, states that the longer travelling times would cause grave anxiety to patients treated with radiotherapy. We all understand that the longer radiotherapy treatment continues, one often begins to feel sick. Longer travelling times cause great trauma, not only for the patients but for their friends and relatives. The travel time to Harold Wood would be far greater than that to Southend for most of the residents of south-east Essex. Southend has more travel arteries leading directly to it and also facilitates easier transit, whereas, from most places in Essex, one has to change trains in Southend to reach Harold Wood.

I emphasise to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary that, when the matter goes before the Secretary of State, the proposal has nothing to do with resources or cuts. In fact, it will cost an extra £4·5 million. That is why we cannot understand it. The facility that is suggested at Harold Wood will be very expensive. The ancillary services of Southend hospital are quite removed from Harold Wood and the co-ordination of those services would present personal expense as well as difficulty.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State knows only too well that our local newspaper, the Evening Echo, has been most responsible in launching a powerful and effective campaign to mobilise the people of south-east Essex in support of that excellent hospital. Only last week, we arrived at Westminster in an open-air double decker bus. We went round Parliament square four or five times before arriving at No. 10 Downing street. A petition, signed by more than 100,000 people, was presented there by six cancer patients, all of whom are currently receiving radiotherapy treatment at Southend. We are all determined that that excellent service should be retained at Southend.

I know, from what my hon. Friend said in a Adjournment debate, that she is not in a position to comment in detail until the decision goes before her right hon. Friend. However, this is a gentle signal to say that our resolve is as firm as it could possibly be. We have an excellent service that has the confidence of all the people of south-east Essex. Under no circumstances do we want it removed to Harold Wood for the extra expenditure of £4·5 million.

The final point that I should like to make relates to the role of hospices upon which the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras touched. I am delighted that we have a hospice movement in my constituency. About two years ago, the Cox family, together with some friends, local doctors and nurses, decided to build a hospice in Basildon. The development corporation — now the new town commission — was most co-operative in more or less giving them a converted farm house. In just two years we have raised £280,000. We have not asked and are not asking the Government for a penny. We raised that £280,000 through voluntary work. Until then, we did not have a charity in Basildon. Through the St. Luke's hospice movement in my constituency the entire town and district have rallied round in fund-raising activities to raise that huge amount of money. The large thermometer outside the hospice shows that we are only halfway there. I need help from my hon. Friend the Minister, and particularly from Treasury Ministers, with whom I have raised the matter.

In last year's Budget the Government took a specific line to encourage businesses to make donations to charity. I understand and support the argument for it. We would like the Treasury to waive VAT payments on the added expenditure involved in the conversion of the farm house. That would save us £140,000, which is a considerable sum. Therefore, I ask my hon. Friend to raise that matter with a Treasury Minister.

The plan is for St. Luke's hospice to have an eight-bed facility for patients. Statistics from similar institutions give the approximate stay of each patient as being about three weeks, in which case St. Luke's will be able to treat 140 in-patients a year. However, the hospice will not stop there. It has plans for a day-care facility for those who are well enough to remain at home but would like or need to spend an occasional day in a nice environment. It would also be a place of rest for patients after threatment but before the journey home. It wants to operate a home-care team who will visit the homes of patients who are well enough to remain at home, but not to travel. Patients will certainly not be well enough to travel if the facility is removed from Southend to Harold Wood.

The hospice will provide services to relieve families of the full responsibility of care for patients by helping to care for the patients. The day-care facility and the home-care team will be operated by St. Luke's to relieve pressures on families, and at the same time it will relieve pressures on overcrowded facilities in hospitals and in the hospice. The hospice beds will relieve the families and facilities of extremely ill patients, so that others may be treated in hospitals and families will not have to suffer the trauma of caring for dying relatives.

I am grateful for the opportunity provided by the hon. Member for Springburn to raise those two matters. I look to my hon. Friend the Minister to urge her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State not to remove the excellent facility from Southend to Harold Wood and to encourage the Treasury team to help us with our VAT payments for St. Luke's hospice.

1.2 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I join other hon. Members on both sides of the House in congratulating the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) on his wisdom in drawing this subject to our attention and giving us an opportunity for this debate. This is certainly the first debate that we have had on cancer in this Parliament. I am not sure when we last had a debate on the subject, but I suspect it was many years ago. We may have had odd debates on individual cancers in the past. Therefore, we should all feel extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram) would wish to be associated with those remarks and, as hon. Members will have noticed, he was present on the Front Bench at the beginning of the debate. I understand that, challenged by an Edinburgh newspaper on Tuesday night, he immediately gave up smoking. That may account for the fact that he found it a little difficult, suffering as I suspect he was from some of the cold turkey symptoms, to stay in the debate for the whole day. I am sure that we wish him well and hope that he will be successful. As his parents live in my constituency I take a particular maternal interest in his welfare and hope that he will be successful.

Some 12 hon. Members have spoken in the debate and covered many different aspects. If I miss anything in my responses I hope that hon. Members will forgive me, and I shall undertake to read Hansard in detail and write to them on any individual cases.

We have come a long way on cancer. Cancer is no longer the taboo word it was 40 years ago when Lord Beaverbrook forbade its appearance in his newspapers because he thought that people did not want to read about it at breakfast. Perhaps at that time he was right.

The moving words offered to us today by my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) about his own treatment and recovery from cancer have done a great deal to move us on from Lord Beaverbrook's attitude. People should talk about cancer and say, "I have suffered from cancer, I have got rid of it and here I am, fit and well and working again." That is one of the best ways in which we can encourage people to come forward for screening and treatment programmes and it is also one of the best ways of advising people about prevention. I honour my hon. Friend for what he said. I have checked up, and the type of cancer from which he was suffering has a good survival rate. We look forward to his retiring when he chooses to do so at some point long in the distant future.

We also heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) about the Women's National Cancer Control Campaign. As they may know, I had lunch with people from that organisation just before Christmas at the Cafe Royal, which I enjoyed very much. I hope to meet them again in May when I plan to visit one of their mobile clinics, I hope in Soho square. I would welcome an opportunity to discuss the campaign in more detail with the organisation, perhaps in my office, to find out what it is developing at the moment. I shall ensure that the two hon. Ladies are advised of the meeting and, if they wish, perhaps they might attend.

We fund the WNCCC to the tune of some £68,000 per year and the grant for next year is currently under consideration. We also fund the excellent organisation, Women's Health Concern, to the tune of £7,000 and we are involved in helping a number of other organisations such as the Mastectomy Association, which gets £6,000, Cancer Link which also receives £6,000 and the Anthony Nolan Trust which received £11,000 this year. We are closely in touch with the Imperial Cancer Research Fund and Cancer Research Campaign which have funds of their own of about £20 million each. Of course, we are in touch with the Marie Curie Memorial Foundation which I shall mention later. As I understand it, that has nearly £10 million. We are talking about good links with those voluntary organisations and quite large sums of money.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) mentioned the British Association of Cancer United Patients. He may not know that among the 20,000 inquiries it received since it was set up was one from myself as a Back-Bencher asking whether there was anything I could do to help and registering my personal interest. The Department has received its request for a grant and I have asked officials to give it sympathetic consideration. We hope to make announcements shortly on a number of grants for various organisations that have been mentioned for the year starting in April, along with all the other requests that we get.

This is an opportunity to pay tribute to all the volunteers and fund raisers in the area of cancer whether it is cancer research, prevention, treatment, care, advice for families or whatever. The volunteers do things that we cannot do in the National Health Service and perhaps, particularly in the hospice, Macmillan and Marie Curie movements, they do things in ways that we can admire and learn from. Particular reference has been made to hospices, and I know that at St Christopher's hospice, on which there was a recent Adjournment debate, there are 200 paid staff matched almost man and woman for man by 200 volunteers. We could not run the Health Service in that way. That is an excellent recognition of the desire of ordinary people to put something back into health care and I believe we all welcome the voluntary effort and would not wish to see it wither or disappear.

I should like to join my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne in recognising the work of the private sector, which has done so much to promote screening and understanding among those people able to take advantage of it. Of course, we work closely with it.

I want to refer to individual points raised by hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) and my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) questioned the proposals that are soon to come to us for the re-organisation of cancer services in the south west and the inner London regions. I take issue with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton about the cut in the standard of services to constituents. As I understand it, the idea is to improve the service to constituents, not to cut it. Both my hon. Friends drew attention to the fact that the proposals would cost more money, not less. Therefore in no way is there a cut.

The proposals are based on scientific advice from committees which date back 10 years which suggest that the larger centres have better survival rates ultimately than smaller centres. We set up the committees so that they could provide advice—in the same way as we gained advice from the Forrest committee. It behoves us to do what we can to take that advice. However, that does not absolve us from the responsibility—especially as time goes on and some of the research is now 10 years old—of carefully examining the papers to ensure that they are not out of date through changes in prices of equipment or staff rotas so that the procedures may be modified.

I intend to ask my officials to gather in the information and evidence that lies behind those decisions. I shall examine that and attempt to get an up-to-date scientific view. I do not know whether we shall change anything. However, we ought to take that information into account. I shall ask my officials to advise how far stress and problems with travelling play a role in the treatment of patients. We must be aware that with cancer, as with many other diseases, stress can be an exacerbating factor. That is hard to measure, but we are not absolved of responsibility to assess that. I will consider that matter.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) raised particular questions about the way in which the breast cancer screening service might work for Newham. I shall take that point up later. I agree with the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that we do not get enough "Tesco". That is why we have recommended that Miss Carey Dennis, the daughter of Sir Jack Cohen the founder of Tesco, should be a member of the new Health Education Authority. Miss Dennis is in charge of product development and consumer control and the way in which products are presented to the consumer in Tesco. She has been responsible, among other things, for the much improved labelling of Tesco products and the removal from many of Tesco's products of unnecessary additives. That is remarkable. I am delighted that she has accepted our invitation to serve on the new Health Education Authority. I hope that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras will not start to accuse us of having too much "Tesco" and not enough "Habitat". In my view we need both.

With regard to voluntary organisations and hospices I want to go deeper into the relationship between the National Health Service, the DHSS, local health authorities and the voluntary movement. Questions were raised at Question Time on Tuesday about terminal care and the circular that was issued last week. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey mentioned that point. Obviously at Question Time we do not have time to go into those issues in great detail. However, I want to read into the record paragraphs 4 and 5 and paraphrase paragraph 6 of the circular as that should answer some of the points that have been raised by hon. Members. The section is called:

"Collaboration with the voluntary sector."

It states:

"Health authorities should take particular account of the contribution that is being or can be made by local and national voluntary groups. Wherever possible these should be involved in the planning of services in order to make the most effective use of all the resources available. Where a voluntary group provides a service that represents an essential element in a health authority's overall plans for terminal care, the health authority should agree with them a contribution to the costs of that service."

That is what we told health authorities last week. We mean that and we want them to report back to us on how they propose to do that.

Paragraph 6 sets out in detail some of the ways in which authorities might want to help. For example, section 23 of the National Health Service Act 1977 gives health authorities powers to assist voluntary bodies by making available to them land, buildings, vehicles, medical supplies and special equipment. There is guidance to health authorities on the making of grants to voluntary bodies under section 64 of the Health Service and Public Health Act 1968, and joint finance is available. That is apart from any other arrangements that they may wish to make. I hope that that answers some of the points that were made.

Mr. Simon Hughes: There must be a partnership, and the circular sets out well the parameters, between local health authorities and the voluntary sector, and the Minister has accepted that there must also be a Government contribution. But knowing the figures in relation to the voluntary organisations in that sector that are grant-funded, I believe that there is scope for a substantial overall increase. The present amounts are so small that it would be a significant contribution, not just in cash terms but in a recognition by the Government of the importance of care and treatment, if in the decisions that are about to be made that partnership is backed with a bit more hard cash than we have seen so far.

Mrs. Currie: Perhaps it is safest to say that the hon. Gentleman's views are noted. We have acquired an extra £1 billion for the year starting in April, much of which has been distributed to the regional health authorities and, eventually, to the family practitioner services. As a former district health authority chairman, I am reluctant to see more done from the centre when we should be telling local health authorities, as we have done in this circular, "You must work with the voluntary organisations in planning and development and if you ask them to do some of it, you must pay."

Mr. Spearing: Although I do not expect the Minister to give a full undertaking, will she at least give an undertaking to consider the point I made about voluntary agencies providing the beds in hospices and Government assistance in the provision of the domiciliary, associated nursing services?

Mrs. Currie: I shall come to some of the more detailed points a little later. I am glad to have the opportunity to do so.

It is highly appropriate to discuss cancer this week, following the announcement in December last year by the Prime Minister, on behalf of the EEC Heads of Government, that 1989 will be European Information on Cancer Year, and that between now and then the EEC Commission is proposing a plan of action as part of the Europe against cancer initiative. That will cover prevention, public information, health education and research, and it will be considered in detail by EC Health Ministers in May. This has also been the week in which we have had no smoking day, with all the razzmatazz that that has involved, so it is apposite to end the week with this debate.

The first question that I have asked is how much we spend overall. I am advised that it is impossible to quantify NHS resources involved in the treatment of cancer, primarily because cancer patients are distributed throughout the main medical specialties. The only service that is wholly devoted to cancer treatment is radiotherapy. However, the information that is available suggests that cancer makes a considerable demand on the Health Service and that the demand is increasing. The development of expensive diagnostic and treatment techniques, some of which we heard about today and which are mentioned in the motion, will contribute to the demand on resources. We are well aware of the points that were made by hon. Members.

There are 200 or more different conditions called cancer which affect more than 1 million people in the community at any one time. In 1981, it caused 23 per cent. of all deaths in the United Kingdom. It is a strongly age-related phenomenon, with about 60 per cent. of all cancers affecting the over-65 age group, although it occurs in all age groups. But the number of cases of cancer which present for treatment is increasing, at least partly as a reflection of the ageing population. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras mentioned the number of women in older age groups who die from breast cancer. Survival rates seem to have changed little overall, although reports that we have received point to significant improvements in certain cancers. I shall mention those in detail in a minute. It is worth putting on record what we know and what the Department accepts about deaths from cancer and about potential or possible or agreed causes, because we do not have many opportunities to put such things on the record. That will make sure that at least before we go on to talk about treatment, we shall know what is happening and, perhaps will know about the forces for prevention in future.

The biggest killer in Britain is heart disease—heart and arterial diseases and strokes. That is the largest single group, and in England and Wales in 1985 about 287,000 deaths were caused by diseases of the circulatory system. Therefore, that remains our major target and among other things we will have in April a look-after-your-heart campaign which, we hope, will draw people's attention to that fact.

Cancer is the second biggest killer in Britain. In 1985 more than 150,000 people in the United Kingdom died from cancer. The biggest single group, more than one quarter—40,000—had lung cancer. I shall read into the record one or two of the other cancer figures from the 1985 report of the United Kingdom Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys. Total deaths from cancer were 160,000. Of these, 40,000 were from lung cancer; 20,000 from large bowel cancer; 15,000 from breast cancer; 11,000 from stomach cancer; and 10,000 from lymphomas and leukaemias. The other cancers accounted for fewer than 7,500 deaths each. Those are the main cancers to which we are paying attention.

There is a difference between the figures for men and women. The major cancer that kills men is lung cancer, of which there are nearly 30,000 cases a year. After that, we are talking about large bowel cancers, prostate and so on. In women, the main killers are breast cancer, which causes 15,000 deaths a year, and lung cancer which results in more than 11,000 deaths a year. However, deaths of women from lung cancer are rising and one of the most worrying things that has arrived recently on my desk is the information that deaths from lung cancer in women have gone up by 20 per cent. since 1979. That is completely against the trend for lung cancers as a whole, where there seems to have been some slight drop since 1979.

That 20 per cent. rise is extremely worrying and it troubles me when I visit universities and colleges and someone has a go at us about cervical cancer while she is smoking a cigarette. Deaths of women from lung cancer are five to six times more likely, more common, than deaths from cervical cancer. On the other hand, the major cancer killer among women is breast cancer. Both of those are killers of women before their time — premature deaths.

I should also like to place on record the trends in cancer survival in Great Britain. These are details of cases registered between 1960 and 1974 and it looks as if the death rates have not changed very much in these cases. The relative survival rate at five years for all lung cancer cases in England and Wales, the average for males and females, is only 7 per cent. Worldwide there are now more than 1 million cases of lung cancer a year, and most patients die within two years.

The prognosis for lung cancer victims is very poor and has barely improved. I am advised that only about 25 per cent. of all lung cancer cases are operable, and that the survival rate of those which are operable is not good. Therefore, it follows that for that cancer perhaps more than for any other, prevention is almost the only cure. To seek cures for lung cancer against figures of that sort is going about it in the wrong way.

The survival rates for cancer of the oesophagus, which I shall come to in a moment, and for cancer of the stomach are about the same. The survival rates for many other cancers are much better. For example, the survival rate for cancer of the uterus, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Springburn is generally very good and seems to be improving. I am delighted to say that I have checked on the survival rate for the illness of my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn and find that it is generally very good and improving dramatically all the time. My hon. Friend is here to prove that statement.

What is causing those cancers? I am not a doctor, so I looked up the books and I should like to quote from "The Causes of Cancer" by Richard Doll and Richard Peto, the standard work on the subject which was published in Britain and in America in 1981. The authors say:

"No single measure is known that would have as great an impact on the number of deaths attributable to cancer as a reduction in the use of tobacco . . . The principal impact would be on the incidence of cancer of the lung which by late middle age is more than 10 times greater in regular cigarette smokers than in lifelong non-smokers . . . By contrast, the difference in incidence between smokers and non-smokers is less marked for cancers of the bladder, pancreas and kidney than for cancers of the respiratory and upper digestive tracts, but the accumulating evidence suggests that an average consumption of cigarettes approximately doubles the incidence of cancer of the bladder and probably also of the pancreas while being associated with a more moderate increase in kidney cancer".

A material effect would also be produced on the incidence of cancers of the mouth, the pharynx, the larynx, the oesophagus and other organs.

"That smoking should affect bladder cancer and perhaps kidney cancer is not surprising since tobacco smoke contains a wide range of mutagenic and other chemicals, some of which are absorbed from the lungs into the bloodstream, circulate through distant organs and are found at particularly increased concentration in the urine of smokers."

In other words, the carcinogens go right through the system.

The same reference work compares the number of deaths observed in a sample of male cigarette smokers with the number that would have been expected if the rate of death had been the same as that for age-matched non-smokers. The figures come from the United States, but there is no evidence to suggest that the figures would be any different in north Europe. To put it colloquially, it shows how many times higher the chances of cancer are for smokers. For cancer of the lung, the risk is 11·3 times higher. For cancer of the mouth, pharynx, larynx or oesophagus it is seven times higher. For cancer of the bladder, it is 2·2 times higher, and roughly the same for cancer of the pancreas. It is also higher for cancer of the kidney. Indeed, for all other cancers there is a 30 per cent. increase in the observed risk. For causes other than cancer, deaths from respiratory disease are 4·3 times higher for smokers and there is an increase for just about all the other diseases.

The authors of that work go on to consider one or two other possible causes. The second is alcohol. They say:

"It is convenient to consider alcohol next, not because it is the second most important cause but because it 'interacts' with smoking, each agent enhancing the other's effects . . . Both in Western Europe and in North America, the carcinogenic effect of even quite substantial consumption of alcohol is small in non-smokers . . . In smokers, on the other hand, consumption of the same amount of alcohol would have a large absolute effect as it seems to multiply the carcinogenic effect of tobacco smoke on the mouth, the pharynx, larynx and oesophagus, although it has no such effect on the lung. . . Pure alcohol is not by itself carcinogenic . . . but most of the cancer deaths now caused by alcohol could have been avoided by the absence of smoking even if alcohol consumption remained unchanged."

They then go on to look at diet. I make no comment at all about this, although I am entertained and interested by what they say. They state:

"Diet is a chronic source of both frustration and excitement to epidemiologists. For many years, there has been strong but indirect evidence that most of the cancers that are currently common could be made less so by suitable modifications of national dietary practices. This is even more plausible now than it was 10 years ago"— the book was published in 1981—

"but there is still no precise and reliable evidence as to exactly what dietary changes would be of major importance. The chief need is, therefore, for continued and more intensive research."

On the other hand, they go on to say:

"The importance of gross aspects of nutrition were suggested 40 years ago by Tannenbaum's experiments on mice, which showed that restricting the intake of food without modifying the proportion of the individual constituents could halve the incidence of spontaneous tumours of the breast and lung and of a variety of cancers produced experimentally by known carcinogens. The underfed mice grew to one half the size of those fully fed but they were active and sleek, appearing perfectly healthy and they lived on average longer than the others . . . Tannenbaum's experiments made little impact on cancer research . . . (More interest might have been aroused, however, if the freely fed mice had been described as obese instead of the mice on the restricted diet being described as small!)"

Dr. M. S. Miller: We are all interested in that, but may I suggest that what the Minister has just said is very confusing? The public want to know facts, not Tannenbaum's experiments. It would be much better if we stuck to what is certain — the relationship between cigarette smoking and lung cancer and other conditions.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I am putting those findings on record simply because there may well be more than one cause. Professor Doll's Stevens lecture to the Royal Society of Medicine on 23 June 1986 says:

"Scientists should take care to distinguish the advice they give that is based on incontrovertible evidence (such as the harmful effects of tobacco, alcohol and asbestos) from that which is based on their assessment of the most likely interpretation of the evidence such as the benefit from increasing the consumption of dietary fibre, vegetables and fruit."

He says elsewhere that many of the recommendations that are being made for dietary changes are for other reasons, but make enjoyable choices and should be encouraged. The hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) was right. The single most important cause of cancer is smoking. I am very glad therefore that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has issued today the statement by the independent scientific committee on smoking and health on passive smoking. I shall read some of it into the record.

The committee was set up in 1973. It is intended to advise Ministers and the industry on what might be done and what might be needed to be done about the effects of smoking. It is chaired by Sir Peter Frogatt of the university of Belfast. The note that it has sent to us says:

"In its third report to the Secretaries of State in January 1983, the independent scientific committee on smoking and health noted reports of the irritant effects of tobacco smoke on eyes, nose and throat, the exacerbation of symptoms in some adults already suffering from coronary and other arterial diseases and chronic non-specific respiratory disease and the increase in the incidence of respiratory diseases in children exposed to tobacco smoke in the home. The four main studies investigating passive smoking in relation to cancer were reviewed and the committee considered that a causal association had not been unequivocally demonstrated. Since them, additional studies have confirmed the association between passive smoking and the exacerbation of respiratory and cardiovascular symptoms while other studies have examined the possible association between passive smoking and lung cancer, some reporting 'positive' and some 'negative' results. While none of the studies of passive smoking and lung cancer can on its own be accepted as unequivocal, the findings overall are consistent with there being a small increase in risk of lung cancer from exposure to environmental tobacco smoke, possibly between 10 and 30 per cent. This opinion regarding an increased risk is supported by other types of evidence."

The remainder of the statement is available in a parliamentary answer which has been issued today. The more colloquial way in which to put that is to say that perhaps 200 to 300 additional cases of lung cancer per year are caused by people breathing in other people's cigarette smoke. That is a matter for some concern.

We are issuing the statement. We expect to receive the final report at the end of this year and we will then consider, in the light of responses to the statement as much as anything else, what action may or may not be required.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the Minister accept that the DHSS, which is responsible for the nation's health, cannot have two masters — the tobacco industry and good health? Therefore, it must come down on the side of God rather Mammon—good health. Has the hon. Lady, or her departmental team, spoken strongly to her two sets of colleagues — the Treasury and the Department of the Environment — and told them that they cannot encourage tobacco from one part of the Government while discouraging it from the other? We must have a clear, new direction.

Mrs. Currie: Is that not the value of this debate? The British people are moving fast on some of these issues; sometimes they are moving faster than Ministers, sometimes slower. However, a lot of research into the effects of passive smoking is still under way and the Committee is continuing to review the evidence.

We have seen some progress. The percentage of people who smoke in this country has dropped sharply from more than 52 per cent. of the population in 1972 to 36 per cent. in 1984, and I am sure that it has dropped since then. The percentage of women who smoke has dropped from 42 per cent. in 1972 to 32 per cent. in 1984. People are giving up smoking at the rate of about 3 per cent. per year, which means that we are giving up smoking faster than any other country in Europe. The number of cigarettes smoked has dropped from 137,000 million in 1973-74 to 98,000 million in 1984. The average tar content of cigarettes has dropped from 20 mg to 14·4 mg. As a result, as we mentioned earlier, deaths from lung cancer are just beginning to slide; we are beginning to see the tide turn. Unfortunately, that is just among men. The numbers of deaths of females from lung cancer is rising. Smoking is increasing among the young, and more female teenagers smoke than male. That is a horrible legacy for the future.

We have many successes to report. Leukaemia is an example. Not long ago, that disease was, invariably, incurable, but bone marrow transplants offer a prospect of treatment. Hon. Members will know that we have given a commitment that bone marrow transplant will be a service development priority for all English regional health authorities. In October 1986, the Secretary of State set a new target of 550 such operations by 1990. We can look forward to that improvement.

Mr. Dobson: Does the hon. Lady think that one of the more bizarre aspects of the relationship between the Government and the tobacco industry was that the Scottish Development Agency gave a £1 million grant to help an American tobacco company set up the Skoal Bandit manufacturing plant to produce little tea bags of tobacco, which were so dangerous that on the day that it first started selling its product in this country the chief medical officer of the DHSS issued a warning to all doctors that these things were likely to cause cancer of the mouth? Is it not a little bizarre that one arm of the Government was giving that company £1 million, yet the other arm was telling people that this project could kill them?

Mrs. Currie: Sometimes, we all must be wary of our friends. I recall that when the Southern Derbyshire health authority, which covers my constituency and five others, recently attempted to implement a no smoking policy in its NHS premises, NUPE objected most strongly. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will take that message back to where it came from.

I hope that Scottish Members will not mind if I leave some of the Scottish issues in view of the time that we have taken, but I shall ensure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland has an opportunity to respond.

[Mrs. Currie]

I shall now turn to screening, which has been raised in some detail. There are some misconceptions about screening, such as that we should screen all of the people all of the time. That would serve no real purpose. The principles of screening were clearly set out in 1968 by Wilson and Jungner for the World Health Organisation. They are sound and worth recognising.

There are 10 principles. First, the condition should pose an important health problem; secondly, the natural history of the disease should be well understood; thirdly, there should be a recognisable early stage, which there is not for lung cancer; fourthly, treatment of the disease at an early stage should be of more benefit than treatment starting at a later stage, which applies strongly to breast cancer screening; fifthly, there should be a suitable test; sixthly, the test should be acceptable to the population —that is perhaps one of the difficulties that we have run into with certain sections of the population over cervical cancer screening; seventhly, there should be adequate facilities for diagnosis and treatment; eighthly, for diseases of insidious onset, screening should be repeated at intervals; ninthly, the chance of physical or psychological harm to those screened should be less than the chance of benefit, which is why I question screening everybody for AIDS; tenthly, the cost of a screening programme should be balanced against the benefit that it provides.

There is a clear distinction between screening symptomless people, which is what our screening programmes are for, and treating people who have symptoms, who do not come into the screening programme and should be strongly encouraged to seek help and advice. If a woman has a lump in her breast she should not wait for the Newham system to be set up, but should come in and seek help now. If a woman is having trouble with infections of the cervix, she should not wait for a piece of paper carrying the signature of a doctor or anyone else, but should come in and seek advice and assistance. People with problems should not wait; they should come in at once for assessment, diagnosis and treatment.

On the other hand, we have to advise and encourage people without symptoms and problems to feel that they are part of the screening service. They should not feel that simply because they are fit and well it does not apply to them. They are just the people whom we are trying to reach.

Mention has been made of the ages of the women whom we want to screen as part of the breast cancer programme. Time and again we have been asked why we will not screen younger women. I am 40 and if I thought that there was any benefit in screening women of my age, by golly we would be doing it. At least, I hope that I could convince my colleagues that we ought to do it.

I read the Forrest report with great care. Opposition Members have been waving the report at me and I hope that, as well as having acquired copies, they have read it, particularly chapter 5 which sets out advice based on the latest scientific evidence. It says:

"The most important risk factor for breast cancer is age . . . the incidence and mortality rates increase with age so that for women aged 50-54 incidence is over seven times and mortality is over 12 times that of women aged 30-34."

The report goes on:

"Screening policy should ideally be based not merely on the age groups most likely to develop breast cancer, but on those in whom early detection can improve the prognosis. All of the studies that have so far examined the effect of screening on deaths from breast cancer have clearly shown its value for women aged 50 or over but at younger ages its effectiveness is less and is uncertain."

The report goes on to list various studies in Holland, Sweden and New York which show that even when women were screened at a younger age there was no apparent improvement in detection and mortality rates until the women reached their 49th or 50th birthdays. In other words, much of the earlier screening was of no benefit to younger women. Indeed, they could be told that they were all right and in the clear when they were not or they could be advised that they had some problem when they did not. The Forrest report concluded:

"There is clear evidence that women aged 50 and over are likely to benefit from screening. Further evidence on the effectiveness of screening women under 50 is required: studies are continuing . . . Women up to age 65 should be positively encouraged to be regularly screened, but after this age screening should be provided only for those who request it."

The studies that I have seen from Sweden suggest that the acceptance rate of older women for call and recall schemes drops off sharply and can be as low as the 40 per cent. rate of which the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras was so critical.

I accept the points made about the treatment of women as people and the importance of counselling—that has been written into the Forrest report and the advice that we are issuing. I reject the criticisms that have been made about the timing of Forrest and how long it will take to implement that report. I reject the criticism that the rate of development depends on the rate of funding. The real constraint is how quickly we can get radiologists, radiographers and other essential technicians recruited and trained.

As part of the preparations for the Government's decision on the Forrest report I went to Guildford and I spoke to Dr. Barbara Thomas and her team. Their strong advice was, "Don't rush it. Get the people trained." If we are to achieve a 90 per cent. success rate through screening it is important that that screening is carried out properly. Recently when Professor Forrest was challenged that it was all too little too late he said:

"On the contrary. They are after a high quality service."

I would much prefer that we do it a little bit more slowly than we would like so that we get it right. Getting a proper, effective screening service for women is not a magic wand exercise.

Mr. Dobson: Does the Minister agree that the broad outline of the Forrest report's likely recommendations were discernible in December 1985 when the interim report came out? I believe that things could have been done a bit quicker if the Department, the health authorities and the professions had got on with starting, at the preliminary stages, to identify the availability of staff and had done something about that rather than wait until the second Forrest report came out.

Mrs. Currie: There is no point in having interim reports that help us to initiate discussions, but then to ignore the possibility that the final report may reach slightly different conclusions. It seemed wise to wait. We are now going ahead to implement the Forrest report in precisely the terms and with precisely the costings that were recommended to us. That report has been widely welcomed throughout the country and, with respect to the hon. Gentleman, he might do rather better than carp at it.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Does the Minister agree that she must also approach the Treasury about this matter because the pay and conditions of nurses must be improved? The Nursing Times and Nursing Mirror of this week carries a large coloured advertisement offering a salary of between $28,000 to $40,000 a year as well as all sorts of benefits, to nurses in California and other parts of the United States. I do not say that we should match that figure, but I believe that the Government should do better on nurses' pay.

Mrs. Currie: I sometimes wonder what the reaction of other members of the Health Service would be if we paid our nurses more than our doctors—that would broadly be in line with the figures that the hon. Gentleman has given. A pay review is under way, evidence has been given to it and we expect it to report in April. We shall see what it has to say.

With regard to cervical cancer I am most grateful to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras for the hard work he has done. Earlier this week he said that he did not trust letters these days, but he clearly trusts the telephone.

However, as far as we have been able to check up, he is getting different information from us. I agree that some of the things that he has said are accurate, but I believe that he is carping if he criticises a health authority that, at one stage has said that it will be ready in March, but now says it will be ready in April. I find that perfectly acceptable. If it says it will be ready in June I will hold the authority to that promise. I have regular reports from the call and recall schemes to discover exactly what they are up to.

With regard to the remark that Leeds Western district authority is reported to have made to one of the hon. Gentleman's staff, we shall check and if there is any truth in what he said one of my officials will be there next week to find out exactly what the authority thinks it is up to.

I am aware that there have been some difficulties in Birmingham. I intend to invite the chairmen of the five district authorities and the chairman of the family practitioners committee to see me in London. In that way I can discover what they propose to do to ensure that women in Birmingham are given the same opportunities as everywhere else. I believe that some cities believe that London is a long way away. Perhaps I should just warn them that it is not far enough away. We intend to ensure that promises are kept and that the systems are implemented.

Mr. Dobson rose——

Mrs. Currie: We have another debate to come, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way. I suspect that some of the difficulties come from the fact that——

Mr. Dobson: The Minister has just attacked my staff.

Mrs. Currie: On the contrary, I have not attacked the hon. Gentleman's staff. I will offer them a job in the Department if they are that good at making telephone calls to the FPCs.

Mr. Dobson: I understood from my staff when I returned from Stockport this morning that DHSS officials had telephoned around trying to find out what was happening, only after they had discovered that my staff had been doing so. I am willing to stand by the information supplied to me. Perhaps on odd occasions points have been slightly misheard, and some of my comments may turn out to be mildly unfair to an individual health authority. If so, I shall duly apologise to the authority when it proves me wrong.

Of the 56 health authorities which my staff contacted, 42 have not done in this financial year what Ministers told women would be done in this financial year. I welcome the Minister's commitment to put the boot into those who are not doing their job properly, but I regret the fact that it takes an initiative from me at the end of the financial year to get attention drawn to that aspect, when a bit of effort by her officials earlier in the year would have drawn it to her attention in sufficient good time for them to have kept their promises.

Mrs. Currie: On the contrary, what is clearly happening is that the questions asked by the hon. Gentleman's overworked staff and by my overworked staff are probably eliciting different replies because the questions are worded in slightly different ways. Installing the system involves a number of stages. First, the equipment has to go in. Then the register has to be put on the computer. Then the existing screening records have to be put on the computer. Then there is, I hope, the opportunity for a dry run before we practise the system on any patients. Then we go on to the call and recall of patients. Some health authorities have done one of those before the other.

Recently, the hon. Member for Holborn and St Pancras went to the Calderdale district, to Halifax. He was extremely critical about the non-existence of a service for the women of Halifax. The doctor who started running that service 22 years ago took him to task in the local newspapers. When I visited the area a few days later, the authorities insisted on taking me into the magnificent laboratory where cervical screening tests were carried out, and they were able to demonstrate exactly how all that work is done.

It is clearly not satisfactory that we get different answers. I checked again this morning, and I am told that we are getting good answers from some of the health authorities. They say——

Mr. Dobson: Will the hon. Lady give way on Calderdale?

Mrs. Currie: No, that is enough. The hon. Gentleman has already made his speech, and I want to finish mine.

I am told that the Leeds Western health authority is still saying that it will be ready at the end of March and that Aylesbury Vale and Wycombe say that they will be ready in the summer. We shall check, not because the hon. Gentleman has been jumping up and down about it but because, apart from anything else, I as a woman am concerned to ensure that they do things properly.

We have insisted that the family practitioner committee computer programmes include a report-back facility on take-up rates. We expect to get accurate reports back from May.

We have heard about a 90 per cent. response rate, but I do not think that that is possible. I doubt whether that calculation has been done on the same basis as the others. Apart from anything else, 18 per cent. of women in their sixties have had hysterectomies and, therefore, are that much less likely to be candidates for these problems. About 20 per cent. of the register is inaccurate. We have looked repeatedly at this problem and at other possible registers, but this is the best that we have.

[Mrs. Currie]

I am satisfied that we are saving lives. The district medical officer recently reported to the Southern Derbyshire health authority—my local health authority —that in that district 22 women die each year from cervical cancer, but some 150 cases are picked up through its cervical cancer screening programme. Although the death rate is not now being improved, God willing, in future 150 women will not die of cervical cancer. Therefore, we should begin to see an improvement.

We fund cancer research to the tune of very large sums of money. We have been in touch with Quest for a Test for Cancer for over four years and have told it repeatedly that the correct procedure for it or any other similar research group is to have its work independently assessed by one of the appropriate bodies. In this case, that would be either the Medical Research Council or one of the major cancer research charities. We advised the quest in March 1983 and on several subsequent occasions to make a formal application to one of those bodies. As I understand it, so far it has been unable to do so. In the absence of an independent evaluation, the DHSS cannot consider the potential application in the Health Service of that technique as a cancer screening test. That is the wise and sensible line for us all to take.

Hon. Members mentioned several other issues. In view of the time and the fact that we have another debate yet to come, I hope that they will allow me to write to them.

However, I should like to mention the care of cancer patients at home, because that issue comes into the terminal care circular. I have taken an interest in it for many years, going back to my time in Birmingham. I was involved in setting up the nightwatch services, funded by the local authority in Birmingham, which supplemented the work of district nurses and the health authority's "tuck-in" service. This year we have given an extra 1 per cent., through Department of Environment grants to the local authorities, to pick up the costs of community care. That means about £26 million. There is no harm in at least some of that being directed to such services.

There are now some 125 home care teams, NHS-employed, with some charitable funding, and some 25 hospital support teams, which do much of the work that has been described. There are some 4,000 Marie Curie day and night nurses, most of whom are part-time. They have been recruited by the Marie Curie foundation, which sends them to the health authorities on request, and then each meets half the cost of the care.

There are now 350 Macmillan nurses all full-time and highly trained. That is a specialised resource on which the ordinary NHS staff can draw. They are trained by the Macmillan fund and paid for by the district health authorities. Much of the recent hospice movement developed through the Macmillan campaign. I am a patron of the Macmillan hospice in Derby, which has been established in the old Nightingale home.

Also available for the care of patients at home is financial assistance through the attendance allowance, mobility allowance, invalid care allowance and so on. Some of those allowances have a six-month qualifying period because they are intended to help those needing long-term care, but increasingly as we are able to help cancer patients — we hope that the death rates and survival rates will improve—it is likely that more will be able to qualify.

From April 1988 grants to promote community care of terminal cancer patients will be available to those on income support under the new discretionary social fund. Although we expect it to start fairly modestly, the Government hope to develop that element of the fund.

In recent weeks we have seen yet more steps taken to combat cancer. They range from the razzmatazz of no smoking day, which was a gimmick, but it worked, right through to the major announcement of breast cancer screening, which will save women's lives for decades to come. We have gone from improvements in the cervical cancer screening system—they will be improvements and they will make the system effective—to the setting up of the Health Education Authority, which is a major step forward in prevention and health promotion, and then on to the circular on terminal care, which will make such a difference to so many people.

The debate has been yet one more step forward. I believe that it will also have been a major contribution. I should like to put on record my gratitude to the hon. Member for Springburn for raising the matter and allowing us all to debate the issues.

1.59 pm

Mr. Martin: I should like briefly to thank all hon. Members who have taken part in the debate. It has been interesting, and I have enjoyed all their contributions. It was good of them to stay, particularly as this is a Friday and I know that Friday is often the only opportunity that they get to return to their constituencies. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and the Minister for their contributions. I should also like to add to the comments made by other hon. Members about the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves), and say that his contribution was excellent. My majority being different, he at least had his party headquarters worrying about him. When I was ill some years ago, the only get-well card that I received was from my pair.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House believes that a humane and efficient health service should be guided by three main priorities in relation to cancer, namely: an effective national screening system designed to facilitate the earliest possible diagnosis of the different forms of disease, the provision of resources to enable patients to benefit promptly from the most technologically advanced treatment available, and the development of hospice and other facilities to permit the terminally ill to end their lives in decent and dignified surroundings with the minimum of pain; and calls on the Government to ensure that these priorities are fully reflected in the future funding of the National Health Service.

Gipsy Caravan Sites

2 pm

Mr. Peter Lilley (St. Albans): I beg to move,

That this House calls for a thorough reform of the legislation requiring local authorities to provide caravan sites for so-called travellers; believes that no special privileges, such as the right to build permanent sites in the green belt, should be granted to one section of the population when the rate-paying, settled majority is rightly prevented from doing so; recognises that districts which are comprised largely of green belt and residential areas should be required to provide fewer sites than other districts; and believes that official caravan sites should be available only for those pursuing a genuinely nomadic lifestyle rather than semi-permanent residents in one place.

This is the third debate that I have had the privilege to introduce this year on environmental matters. The first was an Adjournment debate on the river Ver in my constituency, which is in danger of disappearing. The second was about the green belt, which we are determined should not disappear. The third, today, is about gipsy sites which, unfortunately, show no sign of disappearing. They will not disappear because local authorities are caught in a "Catch-22" situation under the present legislation. Without designation, local authorities do not have adequate powers to move on gipsies using illegal sites and are forced to tolerate them. To obtain the powers to move them on, local authorities must create official sites. So, one way or another, we have to have gipsy caravan sites in our area.

Gipsy caravan sites and their locations are emotive because they concern three powerful considerations. The first is our concern for the environment. The second is fear of crime. The third is the importance that people attach to education. However, it is not just an emotive matter as some people claim. The concern is based on genuine hard and concrete problems, to which I recognise that there are no easy solutions.

We now need a thorough review of the present legislation. I do not think that the recent and modest review, which was carried out by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, is sufficient, because, in the words of the Environment Committee that recommended it, it was "merely modest". It was also quite distinctly biased towards accommodating the needs of gipsies, rather than recognising the public concern.

The key legislation under which we operate is the Caravan Sites Act 1968. I am sorry that no Liberal Members are present today because that legislation was introduced by a Liberal Member, under the congenial supervision of a Labour Government—congenial to the Liberals, that is. The legislation was introduced by Lord Avebury. When I mentioned to the inhabitants of Redbourn, who are threatened with a gipsy site, that the present legislation was introduced by the present Lord Avebury, soon after he had publicly announced his desire that his body should be fed to the dogs after his death, their immediate response was, "Why wait until then?"

However, I do not want to put the blame on him or the Liberal party because, on looking back, I see that the Act received near unanimous support on Second Reading. In my experience, that should have given us cause for suspicion because my experience is that when any measure has nearly unanimous support across all parties all too often it is an unmitigated disaster. We should have recognised that when we passed the legislation without proper, careful consideration and recognition of the difficulties which would arise.

I wish to highlight one particular problem which is not mentioned in the Act, in Professor Wibberley's report, which was recently prepared for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, or in the final review of the operation of gipsy caravan site policy. The problem is the provision of gipsy caravan sites in the green belt.

The Act requires every county council to build sufficient sites in its area to accommodate all the gipsies who habitually resort to or live in its area. The only limit on that obligation for London boroughs was a maximum of 15 pitches per borough. Circular 28/77, which was issued to implement the Caravan Sites Act, specifically states that caravan sites can be built in the green belt. Indeed, it states:

"In certain counties there are areas of open land (including Green Belts, and Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty, etc.) where the land use policies which apply are severely restrictive to development. It may be necessary, however, to accept the establishment of gipsy sites in such areas."

That has been taken by county councils and planning authorities generally to mean that gipsy sites can be placed in the green belt. There is a tendency to neglect that the circular also states:

"On the other hand, there will clearly be a special obligation to ensure that the arguments in favour of a departure from the development plan are convincing."

There will, indeed, have to be such special circumstances and I hope that the Minister and the Secretary of State, in evaluating any proposals in my area, will lay greatest weight on that final sentence. Not only does that apply, but county councils can exercise compulsory purchase powers in the green belt and elsewhere to establish such sites.

In effect, one section of the community is being given an extraordinary privilege. Ordinary owners of caravans do not have the right to set up caravan sites or to have sites set up for them in the green belt. Plenty of local residents in my area would like the right to build a house or site a caravan in the green belt. We, rightly, forbid them to do so because we believe that the green belt should be sacrosanct and preserved as a green lung, separating us from London and other built-up areas. There are plenty of people without jobs in the old smoke-stack industries of our major towns, often in the north, who would love to seek work in my constituency where jobs are plentiful. They would be only too happy to reside in caravans on green belt land, but they are not permitted to do so; only gipsies are granted that privilege.

Gipsies are given that privilege despite the fact that they are not conspicuously noted for paying rates or taxes or for abiding by the law, as most of my constituents do. When the privilege was granted, people may have thought of gipsy sites as a few rustic, wooden caravans nestling among the trees, like a Constable painting—the sort of feature that would enhance rather than detract from the green belt—but in practice that is not the case. They can look like dumps. Indeed, even well-regulated gipsy sites are not attractive with their modern, garish caravans and vehicles. Indeed, they look all the more unattractive as the activities in which gipsies frequently engage and on which they depend for a living, such as car breaking, the provision of aggregates and laying tarmac, are unsightly, require unsightly machinery and equipment and leave residues which destroy the environment. Nobody else would be given permission to carry out those activities on green belt land.

If gipsies are not allowed to do those things on green belt land—it is not required by the Act that working provision should be provided at the same place as living accommodation — they have to be able to do them somewhere. In many areas, there is no alternative to green belt land unless working areas are to be thrust into built-up residential areas.

I hope that the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State enforce vigorously their powers to prevent the development of sites on the green belt. I hope that we will have a review of legislation to remove that special privilege from gipsies, but clearly gipsies must go somewhere. In my area, if they are not on green belt land, they have to be in residential areas because my constituency consists solely of green belt land or built-up residential areas.

The 1968 Act recognises that London boroughs, being entirely built up, do not have the full obligation to accommodate all and every gipsy caravanner who can claim to have resort to their area. It seems reasonable that a similar exception should apply to other districts which are heavily urbanised or consist solely of urbanised areas and green belt land. That is simply a recognition of the fact that gipsy sites cannot be placed easily in the middle of residential areas. Gipsies themselves, by their culture, want to live apart from the rest of society. They want to be different, separate and distinct. That is their privilege and I do not want to deprive them of it. However, that desire is reciprocated by the majority of the public. They do not want to be cheek by jowl with gipsies either. That is their right and privilege and we should not force gipsies upon them.

I am sure that, like everybody else, the majority of gipsies are decent, law-abiding folk, but a significant number do not abide by our laws and there is often a crime problem associated with gipsy caravan sites. That crime problem will be intensified if they are in the middle of residential areas.

There is an educational problem if one has to accommodate large numbers of gipsy children in existing schools. That also gives rise to concern in residential areas. Often, a travelling school is the best solution to that problem.

At best, only a small number of gipsies can be accommodated within residential and built-up areas in constituencies such as mine just as in the London boroughs. I hope that any review of the legislation that is implemented will extend that recognition to areas such as St. Albans.

The presumption must be that most gipsies will be accommodated in rural areas that are not designated as green belt. Failing that, planners should at least be allowed to take into account the social and other problems associated with caravan sites when they are considering a particular application for an official caravan site in an area. At present, I am told that they are required to assume that all the problems of crime, education and other social problems are deemed to have been solved.

That unrealistic assumption is required of them and they consider only the environmental and visual aspects of a gipsy site in their green belt or other planning areas. That is obviously nonsense and should be changed.

I hope that all those factors will be taken into account when my hon. Friend the Minister and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State consider the proposal to establish a gipsy site on green belt land in the village of Redbourn. That epitomises the problems I have been talking about. It is proposed to build an official gipsy site on green belt land that falls in the middle of a residential area. A more unsuitable location could barely be imagined. At the same time, all the associated problems of crime and education are to be deemed to been solved.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister cannot comment on specific cases in his response, but I hope, none the less, that he will hear what I have said and bear it in mind when a decision has to be taken.

The second point which I hope will be considered when a thorough review of the legislation is carried out is the fact that under the present law designation, once granted to a district because it has established a sufficient number of official sites to accommodate all the gipsies who habitually live in or resort to the area, can subsequently be revoked. That is viewed with apprehension by people in my area. They fear that even if we establish enough sites and subsequently gain designation, that may be revoked and we would be back in the original position and prey to an influx of more gipsies from elsewhere.

That is a particular problem with regard to the one official site in my constituency at Barley Mow. When that site was established more than a decade ago with 15 pitches, local inhabitants were assured that the site would be temporary although there was a possibility of it being renewed, and that 15 pitches was the maximum that they would have to face. There is now a proposal to expand that site by another five pitches. In view of the past assurances, I hope that the proposal will be withdrawn. Even if it is not withdrawn and a further five pitches are established, we must be able to give the local inhabitants an assurance that, if designation is given in return, that will not subsequently be revoked.

The third problem that we have to tackle is the definition of what constitutes a gipsy. The current definition is vague. It appears to be a bureaucratic re-interpretation of Stevenson's "The Vagabond":

"All I seek, are the heavens above
And the road below me."

Gipsies are simply defined as:

"Persons of nomadic habit of life whatever their race or origin."

For some reason that excludes only people engaged in travelling circuses and travelling show men. I do not know why those are the only categories of people who cannot pose as gipsies. The definition is so loose that virtually anyone could pose as a gipsy.

Hippies are increasingly seeking the status of gipsies and they have a nomadic mode of life whatever their race or origin. Presumably official sites must be provided for them. Indeed, many of my constituents spend most of their time moving house from one part of the area to another. Are they of a nomadic habit of life? If they own caravans, could they claim a right to official gipsy sites? We must tighten the definition and prevent an increasing number of people claiming to come within it.

At the same time we must recognise the Irish dimension to the problem. In recent years, ever since the war, there has been a growing influx of Irish tinkers and didicois. That is a consequence of our immigration laws which permit people from Southern Ireland to enter this country without requiring British nationality status. That is absurd.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): That is true of people from the rest of the EEC.

Mr. Lilley: That has been so until now. No check is placed on those people, not even the checks that apply to other EEC citizens. Irish entrants should clearly be placed full square with other EEC citizens.

We are dealing with a balance of rights and obligations. We must consider the obligations of each part of society. The general public has a duty to be tolerant towards gipsies and those who pursue that way of life. There can be no question of harassing them unnecessarily or of acting vindictively towards them because they are different — although that may have happened in the past. We have the same obligation towards members of the gipsy community who need help as we have to any other member of society and, by and large, my constituents overwhelmingly accept that obligation. But we have no moral obligation to subsidise a lifestyle, nor to promote it artificially.

It may have become more difficult to pursue a gipsy lifestyle than it used to be with the decline of casual agricultural work, but many opportunities have become more difficult to pursue. There are fewer opportunities for those whose parents and grandparents were tenant farmers to become tenants, but we do not compulsorily acquire land, hand it over to tenant farmers and artificially subsidise them. There are fewer opportunities for people to become steel workers, but we do not build steel works in the green belt and artificially subsidise them to keep them going.

We do not have obligations to provide benefits to a special category of people who are often considerably wealthy. I have visited several illegal gipsy sites in my constituency and been impressed by the quality of the cars and how new they are, the expensive caravans, the heavy lorries that they use and the immense variety of equipment that they possess to carry out their activities. We have no obligation to provide social security benefits to people who are clearly well able to look after themselves, if they are not genuinely unemployed.

Gipsies, too, have obligations to pay taxes and rates, to abide by the general laws of the community and to respect the rights of the majority among whom they live. The policy makers—Members of Parliament and the officials and well-meaning people who determine the climate in which policy is made — have a duty to consider the gipsies and the general public. In almost all the work that I have read on the subject, the bias is towards the gipsy and the tendency is to sneer at the worries of the general public. Even Professor Wibberley, who, by and large, is free from this, refers to the frenetic opposition by local people to reasonable site suggestions for new gipsy sites. He says that, as a local councillor, he was aware of how strong and distasteful such local opposition can be.

It is not especially distasteful for people to express their anxieties about genuine problems. There is nothing distasteful about the concerns expressed by my constituents. I am extremely worried on their behalf, and I hope that the law will be altered to accommodate their worries as well as to allow opportunities for gipsies to continue their way of life.

The Act is producing intolerable pressures, which are especially strong in green belt and residential areas. The laws are weighted too heavily towards the gipsies, who are accorded privileges that are not available to any other section of the ordinary public. There is a great danger that others will learn of those privileges and seek to define themselves as gipsies under the loose definition that operates. All those matters require correction after a thorough review. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will begin such a review.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Time is so short that it is impossible to make more than the briefest remarks about this subject. Wherever nomads and settled people have lived alongside each other, there has been conflict. One can see that in Darwin's "Voyage of the Beagle" and in the song by Rodgers and Hammerstein, which said that farmers and cowmen should be friends, but they were not. The amount of virulence, venom and hatred directed towards gipsies is almost metaphorical. I have encountered it in my constituency, as have most people.

In a civilised society, we must try to find an accommodation between people of different lifestyles. It is not easy, and there are no absolute principles that one can lay down, but we must try to find that accommodation and deal with the problem objectively, instead of giving way to prejudice.

I have looked at the Minister's response to the recent inquiry and have no hesitation in agreeing with almost all of that response. I am unhappy about designation, but for reasons quite different from those put forward by the hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley). As the Government provide the whole of the cost for gipsy sites, a further effort must be made to try to enforce local authorities to meet the need that remains by providing one site for each gipsy family for every 10,000 settled families in Britain. That should not be too difficult to do. It would be hopeless if we started to make even more exceptions and gave further dispensations to local authorities, some of which are not meeting their responsibilities.

I appreciate the constituency points that were made by the hon. Members for St. Albans, but we must take an overall view. We have to try to enforce more thoroughly than before the duty that is placed on local authorities, because it is often the neglect of that duty that creates problems. I hope that the Government will renew their efforts, which follow the efforts of the previous Labour Government, to try to solve this problem by the provision of proper sites.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): Time is so limited that I shall not be able to address all the problems in my constituency that I should have liked to draw to the attention of the House. In my constituency there are some horrendous problems because of an invasion of the area by so-called gipsies. Instead of describing those problems, I shall ask the Minister a few questions, because he has been to my constituency and has seen the problems that exist there. He also kindly met me to discuss these problems.

[Sir Hugh Rossi]

Does the Minister know where the people who invaded my constituency come from? Are they covered by the provisions of the Caravan Sites Act 1968, and is any research being conducted to find out why this sudden growth has occurred? What are the exact legal obligations of Haringey borough council? It says that it has a duty to accept all these visitors. My understanding of the law is that a council has an obligation to provide a 15-caravan site properly laid out with all the necessary facilities so that it can be kept in a clean and tidy condition. Is not a 100 per cent. grant available from the Government for the provision of such a site, and is it therefore wrong for the council or its members to say that no money is being made available by the Government to regulate this problem?

Once a council such as Haringey has provided a properly regulated site for 15 caravans at Government expense, is that not an end of the council's obligation and can it not claim to be a designated area and receive powers to turn away any fresh invasion? If such a council fails to apply for designation, in his review of the law, would the Minister consider the possibility of, say, up to 50 local ratepayers applying to the Secretary of State for designation when the council refuses or neglects to do so?

I read with great interest the report by Professor Wibberley, and the Minister will know that that report says that the London Boroughs Association asked for automatic designation for every London borough. That would suit my constituents very well, but if that cannot be done, at least when the minimum provision has been made, can there not be a direct application to the Secretary of State from hard-pressed and distressed residents?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): This is a short debate, but it is clear from the speeches that we could go on for a long time. All that I can do in the time remaining is to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley) on once again bringing this topic to the Floor of the House and on securing time for the debate. He asked questions and made some comments and criticisms in order to enable us to address this problem. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for his work on behalf of his constituents since he entered the House. Today's debate is evidence of his persistence in that work.

I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), Chairman of the Select Committee on the Environment, who has led some interesting research and discussion on this subject, leading to a report——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

London Borough of Ealing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Malone.]

2.32 pm

Sir George Young (Ealing, Acton): I welcome this opportunity to develop on behalf of ratepayers in the London borough of Ealing the case for the Secretary of State to rate-cap the council in 1988-89. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) hopes to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for a couple of minutes at the end of my remarks. We are both delighted by the response of our hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, who has first-hand constituency experience of the damage wreaked by Left-wing Labour councils.

For eight years, until last May, Ealing council was Conservative controlled. In the last four of those years, rates increased by only 13 per cent. in cash terms due to prudent budgeting, contracting services out to the private sector where that made sense, making realistic charges for rents and other services, keeping a tight control on manpower and developing a partnership with the private sector to harness its energies to regenerate rundown parts of the borough. Those policies bore fruit and the new town centre opened by the Queen two years ago brought fresh heart to the borough. In my constituency, the Park Royal industrial estate, which had been declining for many years, began to sprout new offices and factories. Attracted by the combination of low rates and good services, businesses in Ealing expanded, others moved into the borough, and more discerning people, including the Leader of the Opposition, chose to make their homes in the borough.

Last May, Labour took control and the policies that I have described were thrown into reverse. As democrats, we live by the ballot box and accept the verdict, but with one or two comments. First, it is now remarkably difficult to find anyone in Ealing who admits to having voted Labour last year. A random poll in the Red Lion in Acton earlier this week found no volunteers. Had people known last year what they know now, Labour would certainly not have got in. The Labour party now running Ealing is an entirely different animal from that which ran the borough in the 1960s and 1970s, for which a number of people mistakenly thought they were voting.

The biggest cost increase is in the number of additional staff and the office space needed to house them. Sadly, many of them are political appointments. Since coming to power, the council has taken on 750 extra staff, a figure which is due to double by May next year to about 1,225. The majority provide no actual services—they are not teachers, social workers or refuse collectors. Many are political appointments.

There is a large number of press and publicity officers, personal assistants and clerical support to the chairman of committees. We have large numbers of people running the animal rights sub-committee, the gay and lesbian sub-committee, the nuclear disarmament sub-committee, the anti-apartheid committee, the women's committee and the race equality committee—all the municipal apparel that the well dressed Labour council now feels obliged to wear. Those people have to be accommodated, and a new office block has been hired at a cost of £3.1 million a year, to the enormous relief of the developer who put it up. That represents a long-term commitment by the council.

Where else has the money gone? Some £1.3 million a year goes to the GLC in exile, £1 million goes on the de-privatisation of street cleaning, we are to have an anti-apartheid festival in Ealing in July at a cost of £12, 000 and we have a race equality committee with a campaigning role budget and grants of £200,000. The cost of stationery has increased by 44 per cent., and attendance allowance for councillors has gone up by 400 per cent. They, at any rate, do not propose to be worse off.

Last Thursday, the bill for one year's Labour administration in Ealing was added up. The council voted an increase in the domestic rate of 65 per cent. and in the industrial rate of 57 per cent. An alternative Conservative budget involving an increase of up to 10·6 per cent. was voted down. I pay tribute to the Conservative opposition on Ealing council under the dynamic leadership of Councillor Martin Mallam.

I attended part of the council meeting at which the director of finance described the path down which Ealing council has now embarked as an exceedingly high-risk strategy. A higher increase was avoided only by a dubious practice of charging to capital account a number of items conventionally charged to revenue account.

By adopting that strategy, the council has ignored its own research into the acceptability of a rate rise. Independent research funded by the council and carried out last year in four Labour wards and one Liberal ward showed that 48 per cent. wanted no increase at all and that 38 per cent. were prepared for a small rise if it meant an improvement in services in their area. Only 5 per cent. were prepared to fund a big rate rise.

The average rate rise for a council tenant will be more than £4 a week and for the average owner-occupier nearly £5 a week. For industry, the problem is even more acute. I should like to quote from a statement by the Industrial and Commercial Ratepayers Consultative Panel, the energy and initiative of which I applaud for bringing home to the council the consequences of what it has done. After the rate increase, it said:

"We would reiterate our view that the damage to the industrial and commercial sectors in the London Borough of Ealing will be considerable.

1. Some smaller traders have already advised that they will go out of business as a result of such a large increase.
2. With regard to the larger businesses employing in excess of 1,000 people, such an increase will affect their overheads and their competitiveness. It would require a substantial increase in turnover just to stand still. It would also make such companies less competitive and could have a knock-on effect on their ability to create further employment opportunities.
3. There is no doubt that some other companies will be affected by such an increase which could result in a reduction in the number of people employed, or curtailment of investment, or both.
4. Businesses in general would be severely affected and some have already indicated the possibility of relocation to areas more conducive to industrial and commercial development."

There is an impact on the health authority, which has to pay rates. I have a letter from the director of finance which outlines how the more than £250,000 extra rates might be found. It involves a delay in opening 12 geriatric assessment beds, converting a children's ward to a five-day ward and a reduction in the mental health unit's budget, all of which would cost 21 jobs in the Health Service.

I have just opened a letter from Landis & Gyr which says:

[Sir George Young]

"Further to your recent visit to Landis & Gyr we have learnt through the newspapers of the appalling rise in rates in Ealing which I believe to be 65 per cent.

As we discussed, the effect on our company is extremely unpleasant to say the least, and we calculate that it will cost us approximately £150,000 a year. Put another way, that is worth at least 15 jobs or we must sell another £2 million worth of goods to pay for it.

Will you please use your best endeavours to resist this outrageous increase or at the very minimum ensure that it does not occur next year?"

That is what I am doing at the moment.

The point is well made by the panel to which I referred a few moments ago, which said:

"We would ask the council what is the net gain to the local economy if additional jobs in the public sector (as the council is proposing) are at the expense of jobs in the private sector."

It is not just the Conservative party that is fed up with Ealing council and would like to see it restrained. The hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) was quoted in The Sunday Times as saying:

"I was told to keep quiet after the Bermondsey by-election. I kept quiet after the miners' strike. I kept quiet during the Militant Tendency but I am not going to keep quiet any longer.

Neil has got to take on these councillors. We can't win with 65 per cent. rate rises in Ealing and stories about banning boxing in Hackney.

They are not fighting an election in Ealing until 1990 so they don't care. We are fighting an election this year . . ."

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook, (Mr. Hattersley) wrote in The Mail on Sunday:

"Nothing can be more damaging to a political party than small groups of vocal zealots who think they know best—better than the leader, better than official party policy, better even than the voters whose support they hope to win."

We all know of the views of Patricia Hewitt, who said:

"The 'loony Labour Left' is taking its toll . . . The gays and lesbians issue is costing us dear."

The equal opportunities programme in Ealing will cost the ratepayer £7·5 million. There are national implications of what is happening in Ealing. Two leading councillors are trying to get into Parliament, presumably so that the national taxpayer can benefit from the treatment which is being allocated to the Ealing ratepayer. They are not alone in London. They represent the new modern Labour party in London—dogmatic, humourless and expensive.

Not only is spending out of control, with unpopular policies being pursued and senior officers leaving, we now have the first ever white-collar strike in Ealing. It is not possible to pay rates in Ealing because the town hall is on strike. Houses and businesses cannot be sold in Ealing. If a bill is sent to the local authority it will not be paid. No urgent housing repairs are being conducted, the switchboard is on strike, the homeless families unit is not working and even the incontinent laundry service is out of operation. That is the administration that my constituents are having to put up with.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government for help. I want to put the problem in perspective. Previously, Ealing had enjoyed eight years of Conservative administration. We have had eight years of Conservative Government, and we are all looking forward to the Budget. The undoubted damage which is now being done in Ealing can be reduced if, next year, Ealing is rate-capped and if it is known, as soon as possible, that that is the course of action that will follow. For some, one year of Socialism will be one year too many, but the rest of business in Ealing might survive if we knew that help was on the way.

We in Ealing are not asking for the cavalry: one horse will do, as long as it is mounted by my hon. Friend equipped with his rate-capping gear. The people of Ealing are looking to the House to protect them from the local tyranny that we now have in the London borough of Ealing.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) for allowing me two or three minutes in his debate. I congratulate him on securing it and on the excellent case that he has made out, which I second with all my heart and determination.

The House should note that the alliance is opposed to rate capping, so it will not support any efforts to rate-cap this high spending and evil council. The Ealing rate is the highest in the country. As my hon. Friend has said, the borough has been brought to a standstill within 10 months of the accession of this council. In addition to the services that my hon. Friend said had been affected, schools are being closed throughout the borough and children are being sent home on account of the strike. It is a most serious situation.

Can my hon. Friend the Minister answer a question that is on the lips of everyone in Brent? By how much could rates in Ealing have been raised without the council incurring penalties? My hon. Friend and I both know Whitton avenue, because it runs between our constituencies. Previously, rates on the Ealing side have always been half of those on the Brent side. From 1 April this year the Ealing rates will catch up at a stroke. Ealing council says that rates have been too low, and that is part of its justification for raising them.

An elderly lady, who is well into her nineties, lives in a small house and pays rates of £210. She has been told that they will go up by no less than £136, and she will have no increase in her income, apart from a rise in her pension, to pay those rates. The rates of the Leader of the Opposition will go up by £333 a year. We need not feel sorry for him, but we should note the facts.

People from all over Ealing want to take round petitions against the rate increase. Mrs. Penny Talbot of Northolt brought me a petition signed by 1,000 people. It says:

"We the undersigned bitterly reject Ealing council's planned 80 per cent. rate increase and their wasteful expenditure behind it, compared with a reduction of 4 per cent. by the previous council. We demand no further rate increases for ten years. We particularly reject the wasteful expenditure on homosexuals, lesbians and other such wrongful expenditure."

There has been a great deal of such expenditure.

The rates of Lyons, which employs 2,500 people in my constituency, will go up by over £600,000 a year. That means that porridge, tea, coffee, ice cream and other basic necessities of life will cost much more or people will be made redundant or there will be a combination of the two effects. The CDS laundry tells me that its rates will rise by £8,000 in a full year, which will hit mums, dads and single parents in their laundry operations. Carhill Roller Shutter Services wants to move from its present 3,900 sq ft of premises to a new place of 5,600 sq ft, but the rate rise is likely to rule out such a move. As a result, six people who would have been employed by the firm will not now get jobs.

The situation is serious and we look to my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government for the succour of rate capping.

2.47 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I have listened carefully to the excellent speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) and for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). There is no doubt about how strongly the people of Ealing and their representatives feel about this matter.

I am grateful to my hon. Friends for raising the subject. I trust that we can influence public opinion, even if we cannot do anything about rate capping this year. I shall refer later to rate capping.

Ealing is just one of a number of London boroughs that have recently fallen under the control of the hard Left. Once a haven of sensible Tory administration, it has now been infected by the Brent disease spreading across the Great West road and Whitton avenue. Hilary Benn and his cohorts are, by their antics, giving new life and meaning to the noble traditions of Ealing comedy. Life in Ealing, once the heartland of fine old English comedy, has reverted to tragic farce.

The situation is doubly horrifying because Ealing has a long history of responsible, moderate and Conservative administration. It has spent within 2·5 per cent. of its grant-related expenditure assessment in every year since the block grant system was introduced and in every year expenditure growth has been consistently below the rate of inflation. During that period, when there were targets and penalties for overshooting them, the council budgeted prudently and safeguarded its ratepayers from the loss of grant penalties. That is not to suggest that service levels have been low; on the contrary, Ealing has the sixth highest grant-related expenditure per head of outer London boroughs.

Rates have been held closely in check, with rate poundages last year among the lowest in outer London. That increased the shock that Ealing ratepayers faced this year. The rate increase in 1985-86 was only 0·1 per cent. Now, as Ealing ratepayers dig deep into their pockets to find the extra 72 per cent. that the council is asking for, they will come to look on the time of the previous Conservative administration as a veritable golden age.

This year the Government have given authorities an extremely reasonable RSG settlement. Indeed, throughout the country there has been an increase in RSG of £1·2 billion, which represents an average of 9 per cent. so nobody can say that the Government have not done their share to help hold down local rates. The majority of boroughs have taken the opportunity to budget sensibly and levy modest rates increases. So far, the average increase in the country as a whole is about 6 per cent. In outer London Conservative boroughs the restrictions on expenditure have been such that the average rate increase is only 5 per cent. What a difference from the Ealing scene!

As my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton has said, the council is blaming the Government for the increase. It is arguing that grant reductions have forced the increase on the council. It would have been interesting to note what the rate levy would have been had the Conservatives been elected last year — no doubt the wisdom of the electorate will increase as a result of this year's events. It is complete nonsense to say that Government grant cuts have caused the rate increase.

This year had the council increased spending in line with inflation—as the previous Conservative administration constantly achieved or bettered—the block grant entitlement would have been £73.2 million and the rate increase 3.6 per cent. On top of that, ratepayers would have had to find about 2.4 per cent. for teachers' pay, but, even so, the rate increase would have been only 6 per cent. I should add, as my hon. Friends know, that the council is also receiving extra balances from the London residuary body, and grant that it did not budget for this time last year — in total about £4.4 million. Had the council sought to use this extra for the benefit of ratepayers, the rates could have been lower still. In fact, overall, Ealing's local rate need not have risen at all if the extra balances had been used in such a way.

Instead, ratepayers in Ealing are having to face a massive increase. My hon. Friends have said that that increase is driving business out and bankrupting people of all ages. I listened with great care to the effect that the increase is having upon old-age pensioners within the borough.

Mr. Greenway rose——

Dr. Boyson: If my hon. Friend will allow me I will give way in a moment.

Mr. Greenway: I apologise. I was not seeking to intervene, but was passing some papers to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young).

Dr. Boyson: I thought that my hon. Friend was so excited that he sought to intervene. I thought that the spirit of intensity had moved him.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton for giving us full details of Ealing's final budget and rate for 1987-88 so that we can compare it with previous years. Neither I nor my officials had, until now, succeeded in obtaining this information since Ealing town hall appears to be out on strike and is incommunicado at this time. One cannot phone, write, or make personal approaches.

Personnel management does not appear to be one of the strong points of Ealing's Left-wing council as, apparently, there is no contact with that council. To the Leftists presumably, these are just teething problems before their view of Utopia is achieved.

I had feared that the grave problems relating to management efficiency, recently highlighted by the Audit Commission in certain Labour-controlled London councils, might spread to other authorities. However, I never dreamed that it could spread as quickly as it has to Ealing. It is a great sorrow to me that this year the Government have no power to protect ratepayers from such swingeing increases—except where an authority is rate-capped.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton, who served as a distinguished Minister in the Department which I now have the honour to serve, knows the basis of rate capping. As hon. Members will be aware, selection for rate capping is on the basis of budgeted spending in the previous year in relation to GRE, not on the basis of rate increases in the year itself. Rate capping for 1987-88 is based on expenditure in 1986-87. This year we have selected 20 high-spending authorities for rate limitation. All of them were budgeting to spend at least 12·5 per cent. above their GRE—the Government's objective assessment of what an authority needs to spend to maintain a standard level of service—and all have increased their spending significantly in recent years.

Ealing was not selected because its spending was very close to the GRE—in fact, slightly below it in 1986-87—nor had it shown any significant increase in previous years. Needless to say, it was at that time under a Tory administration. I should add that where an authority budgets below GRE, as Ealing did in 1986-87, the Rates Act 1984 specifically provides that it cannot be selected for rate limitation. That is to acknowledge that in such circumstances the authority is clearly run economically with the interests of its ratepayers in mind.

Four London councils fell to Labour control in the 1986 municipal elections — three from Conservative control and one from hung Conservative control. Those boroughs were Waltham Forest, Hammersmith and Fulham, Brent and, of course, Ealing. One could consider them the unfortunate boroughs in last year's election. Their ratepayers certainly feel that they were. For 1986-87, ratepayers in those boroughs were protected by the modest rate set by the previous administration. Unfortunately, no such protection is available in 1987-88. Apart from Ealing's local rate increase of 71·8 per cent., increases of 67 per cent. and of a staggering 127 per cent. have been announced by Waltham Forest and Hammersmith and Fulham respectively. Only in Brent, thanks to rate capping, is a modest increase proposed—7 per cent.—a testimony to the value of rate capping if ever there was one. Any hon. Member who doubts the use of rate capping need only look at those three boroughs to see the necessity for it.

Even in these three boroughs, however, some protection is afforded this year by the capping of the precepts levied by the Inner London education authority and the London fire and civil defence authority. This reduces the increases in actual rate bills in the high-spending Labour authorities. In Hammersmith and Fulham the increase at ratepayer level comes down from 127 per cent. to 50 per cent.; in Waltham Forest from 67 per cent. to 62 per cent; and in Ealing from 72 per cent. to 65 per cent. If it were not for the rate capping of the precepts levied by the ILEA and the London fire and civil defence authority, the ratepayers would face larger increases.

If the 1987-88 selection criteria had been applied to Ealing's latest budget, it might have been a different story. It appears that the council is budgeting to spend £179 million, as against last year's budget of £144·6 million—a phenomenal increase. It would have meant Ealing would easily have met the growth criteria for selection. If £179 million is the correct figure, the council is proposing to spend 18 per cent. above GRE, and would also have met the other GRE criterion for selection—GRE plus 12·5 per cent.

As regards the case for rate capping Ealing in 1988-89, I can only say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has not yet decided what criteria should apply for selective rate limitation in 1988-89. Before deciding on the appropriate criteria for excessive spending, he will, of course, need to have regard to all relevant considerations. It is intended that he will make an announcement on selection in July in the usual way for next year, in the same way as there was an announcement in July last year for the rate-capped boroughs which were selected for rate capping in 1987-88.

I feel strongly on the matter, both as a Minister and as a Member of Parliament, as my constituency is adjacent to that of Ealing, North. Brent, as well as Ealing, has a hard Left authority. I should like to mention Brent, and I cannot let this opportunity pass without commenting on a leaflet about the police now circulating in the borough, which came to light this week. I believe that it is also circulating in Ealing. It was distributed by the Brent hard Left Labour council throughout the borough. The chief superintendent of police in Brent issued a statement against it this week.

The leaflet is entitled "How to make a complaint against the police and take them to court". It is an outrageous and completely irresponsible document. In an area in which the police are working hard to build better relations with people of all races and creeds, the leaflet is designed to create an atmosphere of distrust and fear among all the people. The tone of the leaflet is clearly demonstrated by a cartoon on its opening page. It shows the boot of a policeman crushing the head of an individual stretched on the ground. Another cartoon and the text of the leaflet seek to undermine confidence in the independent police complaints procedure. I hope that the House will join me in condemning that leaflet, which can do nothing but harm. I am sure that there is unanimity on that on the Floor of the House this afternoon.

When in control, the hard Left spends money as if there is no tomorrow, and, by attacking the police, it hopes to undermine law and order in society. Those people are the wreckers of the late 1980s. Ealing, Brent, Waltham Forest and Hammersmith and Fulham show the whole country what Britain would be like if Labour won the next general election. We did not volunteer to suffer, but at least the warning is going round the rest of the country. The lesson is being learnt every day by more people as to what happens when the hard Left takes control, as it has in Brent, Ealing and the other boroughs. We see the misery of the ratepayers. That misery cannot be revenged but it can be ended nationally by our victory at the general election——

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

British Rail Workshops

1. Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will have urgent talks with the chairman of British Rail about the concentration of repair work in the regional depots, and the work available to British Rail Engineering Limited, Crewe in the light of the accelerated redundancies.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John Moore): The allocation of repair work between regional depots and British Rail Engineering Limited is a management matter for the British Railways Board.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Secretary of State aware that that extraordinarily distancing reply will do nothing to satisfy the interests of those of my constituents who are now told that they will be faced with redundancies, not in tens, but in hundreds? If the right hon. Gentleman does not intend to support British Rail workshops, he should now make that plain. We cannot afford to lose work in the workshops.

Mr. Moore: It was not a distancing reply; it accurately described the proper relationship between the management of British Rail, BREL and the Government. Obviously, I would regret further job losses, and I know that the hon. Lady will be concerned about her constituents. She, like others, should also be concerned to argue the case for British Rail beyond this sector. For example, it would be pleasant for her constituents if she were unequivocally to support British Rail with regard to the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Coombs: Is it not time that the news from BREL was about job creation rather than about job losses? Would not the most positive measure that the Government could take be to prepare British Rail Engineering Limited for the private sector so that, like Jaguar, it could create new jobs instead of laying people off? It might then follow in the footsteps of the Great Western Railway, which was at its greatest when it was in the private sector.

Mr. Moore: The Government cannot make any comment on privatisation. No decision has been taken on whether, when or how BREL could be privatised. The Government have a lot of other things to do at the moment. My hon. Friend should be commended for the way that he has handled the problems of ex-BREL employees in his constituency and for the work that he has created as a consequence.

Mr. Anderson: The Minister will know that much of British Rail's rolling stock is in poor condition. A programme of refurbishment is precisly what BREL is good at, and it is very labour intensive. Will he, with the management of British Rail, stress the importance, in job-creation terms, of that refurbishment programme?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman is right about the importance of refurbishment, but he would want me to remind the House that the £2 billion investment programme over the next five years for British Rail includes £716 million for locomotives and rolling stock. That is a sizeable re-equipment and refurbishing programme.

Airlines

2. Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the number of airlines currently based in the United Kingdom.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): There are about 50 United Kingdom airlines holding air transport licences.

Mr. Dicks: What are the major benefits of competition in the airline industry, and what are the major obstacles to that greater competition?

Mr. Spicer: Our policy towards encouraging competition in the airline industry is one of the reasons why our industry is now the largest and most efficient in the Western world outside the United States.

In answer to the second part of my hon. Friend's question, we would like to extend competition in Europe and to see British airlines able to compete more fairly for business in the United States.

Mr. Sheerman: When scrutinising some of the deals that smaller airlines are tying up with large American airlines will the Minister ensure that those deals do not give a foothold to major American airlines which can damage the national interest and the British airline business?

Mr. Spicer: I agree with the hon. Gentleman if he is implying that any such tie-ups should be on a reciprocal basis, but we would like our airlines to be able to invest in commuter travel in the United States. It would only be on such a reciprocal basis that we would conceive of the reverse being the case.

Mr. Soames: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his robust championing of the aviation industry. Will he give a fair wind to the applications by British Caledonian for a number of new European routes being heard today? Does he agree that, through no fault of its own, British Caledonian has had a difficult year and needs every assistance that we can give it?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend is far too well versed in the affairs of the airline industry to expect me to make any comment about the hearing currently before the Civil Aviation Authority. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has a quasi-judicial role in relation to appeals, so he will have a role if an appeal is made. The Government's avowed policy is to encourage all sorts of competition between British airlines wishing to fly into Europe.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister take this opportunity of congratulating Loganair, one of our domestic airlines, which this year celebrates its 25th anniversary? Will he pay tribute to the valuable service that it provides to and within the islands communities in Scotland? Does he accept that British Airways complements that service to an important extent? May we have an assurance that following privatisation the Government will not agree to any diminution in the vital lifeline services which British Airways provides for the islands communities?

Mr. Spicer: I associate the Government with the first part of what the hon. Gentleman said about British Airways and Loganair.

The second part of the hon. Gentleman's question might come up in detail later in connection with lifeline services. The British Government are committed to lifeline services and to the appropriate licensing procedures associated with them.

Mr. McCrindle: How many of the 50 airlines fly scheduled services through Stansted, or how many have indicated a desire to do so? Can my hon. Friend confirm that the Government's policy is still the expansion of Stansted to a maximum of 7 million to 8 million passengers a year, looking to the time when there will be complementary services to the main European destinations?

Mr. Spicer: Air UK is the major supplier of scheduled services through Stansted. My information is that airlines are increasingly finding it difficult to get into Gatwick and Heathrow and are looking at Stansted as an alternative. That is one reason why we took the decision last year to expand Stansted.

Mr. Carter-Jones: As American airlines have change of gauge facilities in this country, will the Minister arrange for British airlines to have similar change of gauge arrangements in the United States?

Mr. Spicer: One of the matters being discussed in Washington by our officials this afternoon is the question of reciprocal arrangements and fair trade between the United States and the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the American airlines, which often are the first to complain about charges, at Heathrow airport for instance, can use their rights at Heathrow—change of gauge is one of them, and to pick people up at Heathrow, is another—which our airlines cannot do in the United States. One day that will have to be redressed.

Mr. Roger King: Will my hon. Friend accept the grateful thanks of the people of the west midlands in particular for the fact that, because of his policy on competition and deregulation within the internal airline industry, shortly we are to have an international transatlantic service in the shape of Highland Express, which I am sure will go a long way towards re-establishing Birmingham as the country's industrial capital?

Mr. Spicer: Highland Express is applying to the Civil Aviation Authority for the appropriate permission, so I cannot comment about any particular airline which is currently applying for licences. My right hon. Friend has a quasi-judicial role. We want to encourage the maximum number of viable airlines to fly to the United States, or anywhere else.

Railways (Electrification)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss electrification of the Bradford-Leeds railway line.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): The chairman is well aware that I am willing to consider any proposals for electrification where there is a sound case.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister agree that rail passengers travelling between Bradford and Leeds are entitled to a first-class service that is fast, clean and comfortable, rather than the fifth-rate service that they now receive, which is slow, dirty and uncomfortable? When he next meets the chairman of British Rail, will he tell him that instead of subsidising sick public relations stunts, such as taking people to Sellafield on the first anniversary of the Chernobyl disaster, he would be better employed submitting electrification proposals for the Bradford-Leeds line, which would help to give passengers a better service, to combat unemployment, to expand local industry and to promote tourism?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, during the past 12 months I have paid two visits to Bradford, both by rail. The hon. Gentleman spoke about the level of services between Leeds and Bradford and asked for a first-class service. I must tell him that responsibility for the level of local passenger services in West Yorkshire rests with the passenger transport authority.

Mr. Waller: Is my hon. Friend aware of the multi-million pound investment in new rail services, including new stations and the latest and most modern trains, that is being embarked upon by the West Yorkshire passenger transport executive? This more efficient use of resources is a clear rebuff to the forecasts of Opposition spokemen, who claimed that bus deregulation would spell the end of rail services because they would be unable to compete with buses on the most profitable routes.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct. I am also grateful to him for his invitation to visit his constituency later this week, when I shall have the opportunity to ride on some of those buses.

Mr. Meadowcroft: If the responsibility for services rests locally, surely the Minister is not suggesting that the local community should electrify the lines? Does the Minister appreciate that electrification may well bring advantages that will enable other stations to be opened between Leeds and Bradford, including west Leeds? The benefits of through-running will be greatly appreciated by people in Pudsey and west Leeds as well as Bradford.

Mr. Mitchell: Electrification is a matter for British Rail to propose. British Rail proposes and Ministers dispose.

Our record of approving electrification proposals for British Rail is one that should give the hon. Gentleman some cause for complimenting the Government. Between 1974 and 1979, when the Labour Government were in office, £71 million worth of electrification was approved. Since 1979, under the Conservative Government, no less than £476 million worth of electrification has been approved. I believe that the figures speak for themselves.

Dr. Hampson: In the context of the development of the Channel tunnel, does my hon. Friend agree that electrification will be an important factor in preventing the relocation of northern companies in the south-east? Will he assure us that he will consider the development in Yorkshire of a new freight terminal, possibly with free port status, to assist companies to stay in the north?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the considerable advantages to the north that will come from the Channel tunnel with the possibility of direct through services for both passengers and freight.

With regard to the development of freight terminals in Yorkshire, British Rail will report back to me in July with its report on the freight side, which will say where it wants those terminals.

Motorways

4. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been spent on new motorway construction in each of the past three years, at constant prices.

Mr. Moore: In the past three years, expenditure on motorway construction at constant 1985-86 prices reduced from £323 million in 1983-84 to £317 million in 1984-85 and £254 million in 1985-86, reflecting the switch to trunk road improvements, particularly bypasses. Capital investment in roads is now nearly 30 per cent. higher than in 1978-79.

Mr. Knox: Is my right hon. Friend concerned that the figure for 1985-86 showed a sharp decline compared with the two previous years? Does he agree that a much better motorway network is essential if we are to improve our industrial efficiency?

Mr. Moore: We have seen an overall increase of 30 per cent. in real terms, because that encompasses the switch to trunk roads and bypasses. However, I recognise the point that my hon. Friend has made. Without question, motorways assist the economic development, and to that extent I know that my hon. Friend will be interested to learn that I am currently reviewing the overall programme and hope to make an announcement about it in the spring.

Mr. Ashby: My right hon. Friend will be aware that the M42 comes up to the boundaries of my constituency. He will also be aware that the contract for the extension to that road is shortly to be placed. Will my right hon. Friend please ensure that there is no slippage in that contract, because the traffic conditions in Measham and Ashby-de-la-Zouch—2,000 extra vehicles per day—are absolutely dreadful? Will my right hon. Friend also undertake to see whether it is possible for the contract for the next section, from Ashby to Kegworth, to be put forward ahead of time?

Mr. Moore: I bow to my hon. Friend's detailed knowledge of his constituency and its environs. I know he will be pleased that the completion of the M42 is part of our programme. I shall draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for roads to the additional points that my hon. Friend is understandably making within his constituency.

Mr. Ward: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the trunk roads and bypasses programme has been a tremendous help, particularly by restoring a respectable and quiet way of living to numerous towns and villages? Nevertheless, when he reviews the programme, will he bear in mind the necessity of completing the link between the M3 and the M27? At present the two motorways are connected by a dangerous and narrow section of road, which is highly dangerous for the heavy traffic from Southampton and Poole docks and for traffic from London.

Mr. Moore: Again, I have listened carefully to the point made by my hon. Friend about the connection between the M3 and the M27. He is right to draw attention to the fact that since 1979 we have completed 398 miles of new, all-purpose trunk roads in addition to the motorway programme. Sixty-seven bypasses have been completed and another 150 are in the programme. We can be pleased with and proud of that programme.

Manchester Airport

5. Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the latest position regarding the development of the rail link to Manchester airport.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that an outline application for grant for the rail link to Manchester airport will be submitted very shortly. I welcome this progress and will ensure that the application receives immediate attention.

Mr. Silvester: Is it not a little disappointing that this is taking so long? Where does responsibility lie for the next stage? Can my hon. Friend give us any idea of the date on which he expects the application to be submitted?

Mr. Mitchell: As far back as 28 October last year I promised to consider a section 56 grant application urgently. Apparently it is not regarded quite so urgently by the passenger transport authority, or presumably I should have received it before now. I understand that there is private sector interest in providing a rail link, either partly or wholly at its own expense, relating to the development that the private sector is prepared to undertake at the airport. That may be very good news for people in the area and for the airport.

Mr. Stephen Ross: I congratulate Manchester on getting permission for its airport connection and getting it under way, but will the Minister tell us what progress has been made in the review of a rail link to Heathrow, which I suggest is absolutely urgent?

Mr. Mitchell: The review of the corridor and of the transport links within it is proceeding.

Mr. Adley: Will my hon. Friend make a clear statement on behalf of the Government that his Department accepts that, if we are fully to maximise the advantages of a new airport, it must have a rail link? Given the increase in road traffic that airports bring, a rail link is an environmental necessity for a modern airport.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point, but we have to consider horses for courses. In some cases, people travel to an airport from all directions and do not all channel down a single rail link. My hon. Friend must take that fact into account in his enthusiasm for railways to all parts of the country.

Mr. Carter-Jones: When the Minister receives the application, will he give it favourable and speedy consideration and appreciate the significance of the rail link, not only for the airport, but for the infrastructure of Manchester and the north-west?

Mr. Mitchell: I undertake to deal with it speedily, but until I receive it I cannot say how I shall regard it.

Driving Tests

6. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many driving test examiners are employed by his Department (a) nationally and (b) in Leicester; what qualifications are required of driving examiners; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): (a) 1,445; (b) 15. The waiting times in Leicester are below the national average. I have arranged for the information on qualifications to be placed in the Official Report.

Mr. Bruinvels: I welcome the possible privatisation of driver testing, which would reduce waiting lists. The average waiting time for the 2 million driving tests each year is 15 weeks. Will my hon. Friend investigate urgently the possible impersonation by a number of people in driver tests? Is he aware that in the east midlands people are charging £200 to take someone else's driving test? In one case, the person failed the test—even though he had a current driving licence—then went outside the driving test centre, removed the L plates, drove away, and was eventually prosecuted and fined £300. Will my hon. Friend investigate this as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Bottomley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome of the internal review of driving tests. We do not have fixed views on what the outcome should be. We know that it is right to see whether improvements could be made. My hon. Friend seems to have given one example of an instance when impersonation, or personation, was detected. If he has any further information on that or other cases, will he give it to us? It is not right for us to give every bit of information on how we check people who falsely take the driving test, but all information will be welcome.

Mr. Robert Hughes: What on earth possessed the Minister to bring forward the bizarre idea that, by privatising driver testing, he could increase efficiency and improve pass rates? Will driving schools offer 10 lessons at £100 or 10 lessons at £300, with a driving licence at the end of the course?

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that we try to run the driving test regime in a way that is seen to be safe, fair and honest. It is our intention to keep it that way. We want to see whether it is possible to give customers a better service and to get greater efficiency. —[Interruption.] I ask the hon. Gentleman to listen to my reply. I listened to his question. If I may, through the hon. Gentleman, I shall speak to the 1 million people a year who take the driving test. It is ludicrous that over half of them present themselves when they are likely to fail. It is ludicrous to have a waiting time of 13 weeks on average. It is sensible to see whether we can make improvements that can include delegation to the private sector.

Following is the information:

Examiners must be over 26 years old. They must have at least six years experience of driving different types of vehicles, and wide experience of driving in the three years before appointment. They must demonstrate their driving ability in a special test. After initial selection by interview, they must complete successfully an intensive residential training course, usually lasting four weeks.

London Underground

7. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Epping Forest on 23 February, Official Report, column 8, what consideration he has now given to the memorandum about the running of the London Underground submitted to him by the hon. Member for Epping Forest.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have, as I offered, copied the memorandum to the chairman of London Underground for consideration and reply. In addition, I covered a number of these matters in my recent letter to my hon. Friend.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Although the improvement of tracks and signals must take time, may immediate attention be given to the representations of the Line Users Action Group regarding timetables, with particular reference to Epping and Debden?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's views are drawn to the attention of the chairman of London Underground Ltd. There were problems on the introduction of the new timetables, but I understand that they are now being satisfactorily dealt with.

Mr. Squire: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is a widespread welcome in my constituency for the increased number of trains on the District line, particularly in the rush hour, and the fact that it has been achieved at a reduced cost to the taxpayer? Will my hon. Friend, when he tries to improve the use of the Underground, continue to bear in mind the fact that a large number of women refuse to travel on the Underground after the evening rush hour?

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to that fact. The sum of £15 million is being allocated over the next three years to London Regional Transport to help cut crime on the Underground. I hope that that will bear the sort of fruit that he and I want to see.

Air Traffic Control

8. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the ratio of air traffic controller posts to the number of flights.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This matter is the statutory responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority. The authority's inspectorate of air traffic control ensures that there are sufficient qualified staff at all air traffic control units to handle the traffic there.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Minister accept that since the last major review of air traffice control, transatlantic flights, for example, have doubled and that air movements plotted by the air traffic control centre at Prestwick have gone up by 267 per cent., while staffing levels have remained the same? Against that background, does it not seem rather odd that the Civil Aviation Authority is seeking to reduce its manpower by 10 per cent.? Will the Minister undertake that when he, or the Secretary of State, meets the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority he will emphasise the paramount consideration of safety over any commercial considerations that it may have in trying to compete for other contracts at other airports?

Mr. Spicer: The answer to the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question is yes. The Civil Aviation Authority employs air traffic controllers at a limited number of airports. One of the reasons why its payroll has been falling is that it recently lost the Liverpool contract. As the hon. Gentleman implied, as long ago as 1983 the Monopolies and Mergers Commission reported that there was under-utilisation of air traffic controllers at some airports. As a result, the CAA is trying to make better utilisation of its air traffic controllers at non-busy airports and at off-peak periods. On the hon. Gentleman's last point, I can give him a specific assurance that, despite the increase in traffic to which he referred, the number of serious risk-bearing air misses declined between 1976 and 1985 from 40 to 16.

Mr. Tim Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is an inherent conflict of interest within the Civil Aviation Authority arising from the fact that it is both the principal provider of air traffic control services on the one hand and the official investigator of air misses, which may involve those very air traffic control services, on the other? If he agrees, does he think that the problem might be resolved by privatising the CAA's air traffic control services?

Mr. Spicer: The provision of air traffic control services operates in competition with at least three other organisations. There is never any question of there being any conflict of interest on safety. The answer to the question that was asked earlier about whether safety is paramount has to be yes.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Minister not accept that the volume of traffic that is being controlled by the Atlantic centre at Prestwick is rising, and will continue to rise, and that to try to control aeroplanes with a reduced number of air traffic controllers is both a false and a dangerous economy? Will he express these views to the CAA so that we do not end up with an air crash and the Minister having to make a statement at the Dispatch Box to explain that the crash occurred because some poor air traffic controller had been working long hours because of the cuts, with the blame inevitably falling on that poor scapegoat instead of where it ought to fall—on those who are making the economies?

Mr. Spicer: I very much hope that the hon. Gentleman is right and that air traffic into Prestwick is increasing from across the Atlantic.

Mr. Foulkes: No, through the Atlantic centre.

Mr. Spicer: Through the Atlantic system as well, through the Prestwick control. However, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely wrong and, I have to say, almost mischievously wrong, in his implied criticism that safety is being put at risk. I have already stated categorically that during the last 10 years the air traffic control system has progressively become safer and safer. That is the policy of both the CAA and the Government. It is quite another matter to consider whether or not there is some scope for better manning during off-peak periods and also in airports that are not busy. That is all that is being proposed.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Minister take to heart the very old adage that prevention is better than cure? Therefore, does he agree that by far the best course of action is to have a proper system of regulations that lay down hours of work and proper rest periods while on duty? Although an air traffic controller may not be hyperactive during a certain period, the fact that he is not doing very much may equally be a cause of fatigue. That matter ought to be looked at very seriously.

Mr. Spicer: If the hon. Gentleman is saying that there should be standardised regulations throughout the country, I do not agree. At the busier airports there are already very substantial fatigue periods. Every two hours at a busy airport there is a half an hour fatigue period for air traffic controllers. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that standardised regulations are the answer. Airports throughout the country are very different. In some cases there will be a greater requirement for air traffic controllers. For example, as STOLport comes on stream there will be more air traffic controllers. It is a matter for the judgment of the CAA, for a start, which always puts safety at the top of its list of priorities.

Roads (West Sussex)

9. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on investment by Her Majesty's Government in the road infrastructure in West Sussex.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The M23 and its associated Gatwick link were completed in 1974 and 1975. Apart from a short length of the A3, the other trunk roads in West Sussex are the A23 and A27. Actual and planned expenditure since 1979 amounts to more than £70 million at 1983 prices. In addition, £18 million has been made available to the county council through transport supplementary grants over the past five years.

Mr. Soames: I thank my hon. Friend for his great help, but does he agree that the increase in vehicle miles and traffic in and around my constituency has been dramatic in the last few years? Is he also aware that the traffic congestion is unacceptable to my constituents? Although my hon. Friend has been down to see this for himself, will he do whatever he can to assist West Sussex county council in resolving this problem, to the betterment of my constituents and local industry?

Mr. Bottomley: I should like to pay tribute to my hon. Friend, not only for inviting me to meet those primary school children and to see at first hand the problems of the growing amount of local and longer-distance traffic. It is the Government's determination to put figures on the help given to county councils, rather than fresh directions, which do not. We intend to go on trying properly to meet the needs of both commercial and domestic road users. I look forward to associating myself with my hon. Friend's efforts towards that achievement for many years to come.

Mr. Gow: Does my hon. Friend agree that East Sussex is adjacent to West Sussex, and will he—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about roads infrastructure, not adjacent to, but in, West Sussex.

Mr. Gow: Will my hon. Friend accompany me on that part of the A22 which is the London to Eastbourne road, which passes through West Sussex? If he makes that journey he will realise that great though is the need of my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) and his constituents, the needs of my constituents are even greater.

Mr. Bottomley: If I am allowed, Mr. Speaker, I shall quote from my briefing, which states:
"also applies to East Sussex, if raised."

British Airports Authority

Mr. Hubbard-Miles asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about progress in the privatisation of the British Airports Authority.

Mr. Moore: Preparations for the privatisation of BAA plc are progressing well. The privatisation is planned for June-July this year.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. What, if any, special arrangements have been made for employee shares?

Mr. Moore: The 7,200-plus employees will be involved in the issue. They will be eligible for about £100 worth of shares at no cost, at the time of flotation. In addition, the Government will provide two free shares for each share purchased by an employee up to a maximum of about £400 of free shares for £200 purchased. All employees and pensioners of BAA plc will be able to apply on a priority basis for shares at the offer price.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Have the Government learnt any lessons from the sale of British Airways, in which a great deal of public money was lost? Or has the right hon. Gentleman been reminded by the Prime Minister of a statement that she made to the House in April 1968, when she said that it would be Conservative party policy to sell off public assets at below their true value?

Mr. Moore: We certainly have learnt lessons from the successful privatisation, of British Airways. The prime lesson is that I am still trying to discover what the Opposition fear most, a further successful privatisation, or a general election.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Will my right hon. Friend advise the House how, when preparing the British Airports Authority for privatisation, he will deal with the loss-making Stansted airport? He will know that a new terminal is being built there. In a recent answer to a question from me he said that the passenger traffic at Stansted is decreasing. Will not the abolition of income from duty-free sales at the airport put BAA totally in the red for a long time ahead? Will he consider curtailing the development at Stansted to prevent that occurring?

Mr. Moore: I cannot accept certain of my hon. Friend's propositions. Like others, he will want to look forward to the detailed prospectus that will appear in advance of the privatisation of BAA, which, as I said, we are looking forward to, successfully, in June-July this year.

Mr. Stephen Ross: May I take it that in the legislation providing for the privatisation of BAA protection will be given to ensure that foreign airlines will not be able to acquire shares and form cartels which might give them some effective control over the future of BAA?

Mr. Moore: I can reassure the hon. Gentleman on that fair point. Provision will be included in the articles of association of the privatised BAA plc restricting the shareholding of any individual or of parties acting in concert to 15 per cent. of the total issued share capital. In addition, the Secretary of State will retain a special share that will give him the right to veto any proposed change in the articles of association.

Motorways

11. Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of motorway have been completed since 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Two hundred and sixty-five miles of new motorway have been completed in England since April 1979.

Mr. Coombs: Will my hon. Friend tell the House what major new motorway schemes are now in preparation? In particular, will he say what progress is being made in research on the extra traffic in the M4 corridor between the M25 and London as a result of the opening of the M25 and the extra traffic now being siphoned off the M3 and M40 on to the M4 coming into west London?

Mr. Bottomley: We said that we would review the M25 a year after it was fully opened. Obviously, our major schemes will help the M40, the M20 and the Manchester outer ring road. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to open the southern turn of the junction of the M5 and M42 this Wednesday. It is important, to have not only motorways, but trunk roads and relief roads. Our increase of 30 per cent. in spending contrasts with the Labour Government, who cut new national road spending in half during their term of office.

Road Safety

12. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will set up an inquiry into the provision and funding of further road safety measures for schoolchildren.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department is funding a detailed survey on the provision of road safety education in the United Kingdom. The subject has been considered in the interdepartmental review of road safety. We shall consider with the Department of Education and Science further appropriate action.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that the education of children in road safety is not enough and that much more money is needed for road safety measures outside schools? Is he further aware that the absence of such safety measures caused the death of a child in Anstey lane, Leicester recently and that there is a desperate need for money to enable the local authority to provide pedestrian crossings where they are needed and so that safety measures can be implemented effectively?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, Sir. First, our guidelines must be right so that local authorities can put in safety measures. Secondly, it is important to have safe routes to school analysed and to have changes made. Obviously, education matters, but most important, especially for young children, is that parents and those around them chaperone them when they are below the age of seven and make sure that they are properly trained before they go out on the roads alone.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

State Security

28. Mr. Janner asked the Attorney-General when he next expects to meet the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss progress with the consideration of possible prosecutions under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act in the eight currently outstanding cases.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): I expect to meet the Director of Public Prosecutions shortly and to discuss with him such matters as appear at that time to be appropriate.

Mr. Janner: May I say how pleased we are to welcome back the Attorney-General in good health?

Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman considering the lessons to be learnt from the catastrophic mishandling of the Wright case in Australia? As a result, will he make any further prosecutions under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act? Which of the eight are to be prosecuted and, if any, do they include Nigel West, alias Allason, who is a prospective Conservative candidate?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for his kind remarks, which I greatly appreciate.

I do not accept that the case in Australia was a catastrophic disaster. It concerned a principle which we are maintaining and we were right to do so. Of the eight outstanding cases, two have been convicted, two have been dropped and the rest are awaiting final consideration. I have already dealt with the decisions on the others.

Mr. Forth: Does my right hon. and learned Friend appreciate how much support there is for the principle that those who sign the Official Secrets Act and then break it, particularly for personal gain, should be pursued and prosecuted, and that anything that he and his Department do in that connection in the future will have wide support on this side of the House?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That in a nutshell is the principle behind the case.

Mr. Foot: If that is true, as it is alleged in some of the reports about what is in Mr. Wright's book, that people from MI5 were engaged in some sort of conspiracy against the elected Government of the United Kingdom, does the Attorney-General think that that, too, is a matter of principle? What steps has he taken to ensure that that is properly investigated?

The Attorney-General: I think I can refer the right hon. Gentleman most conveniently to the answer of the then Prime Minister when he addressed the subject.

Mr. Rippon: Most right hon. and hon. Gentlemen will welcome what my right hon. and learned Friend has just said. Does he agree that the operations of the secret service must remain secret and that they involve a lifelong duty of trust?

The Attorney-General: I agree entirely with my right hon. and learned Friend. I am surprised that so many Opposition Members seem unable to accept that principle.

Mr. John Morris: I, too, wholeheartedly welcome the Attorney-General back to his place in the House.

What is the prime consideration in relation to prosecutions? Is it damage to national security, or is it political embarrassment? Does the Attorney-General maintain consistency in his approach to Miss Tisdall and Mr. Ponting and to others such as Mr. West, Mr. Pincher, Lord Rothschild and the security men who may have leaked information to those people? Has not section 2 of the Official Secrets Act been virtually put out to grass and replaced in practical terms as a damage limitation exercise by actions for breach of confidentiality?

The Attorney-General: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his kind remarks. He used the word prosecutions, not for the first time during my questions. In fact, the proceedings in Australia are civil proceedings. There is no way in which we can prosecute under the Official Secrets Act in another country. With regard to the action in Australia, the principle has been brought out clearly today that it is the Government's determination to establish that once a man joins a service in which he promises to keep secret for the rest of his life all that he finds, that principle should be upheld.

Mr. Mates: For the benefit of the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), will my right hon. and learned Friend reinforce the point that whether or not a matter is politically embarrassing, the fundamental principle to be observed is that if a person breaches trust he must be pursued by any Government as far as it is legally possible to do so?

The Attorney-General: It would be impossible for the intelligence services to carry on their business and to maintain the confidence of other intelligence services if that principle was not upheld.

State Security

29. Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if he has yet reached any decision whether to prosecute Lord Rothschild in relation to alleged offences under the Official Secrets Act.

The Attorney-General: The police investigation to which the Solicitor-General referred on 6 February is as yet incomplete.

Mr. Dalyell: Before appealing in Australia, would it not be wise to find out what on earth induced Victor Rothschild to pay money for Peter Wright to come here and to introduce him to Chapman Pincher? As I suggested in an Adjournment debate on 6 February, is there not some selectivity in prosecution policy? Why go for Wright and not for Victor Rothschild?

The Attorney-General: I have made it clear that there is no question of any decision being taken about Lord Rothschild. The police inquiry is not complete and the Director of Public Prosecutions has no report. With regard to the case in Australia, the hon. Gentleman again fails to distinguish between insider and outsider books.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Is not the answer to the selectivity issue raised by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) the fact that neither Mr. Chapman Pincher nor Mr. Nigel West is subject to the Official Secrets Act and thus cannot be prosecuted under it?

The Attorney-General: With one reservation, my right hon. and learned Friend is right. A person who directly repeats information from someone bound by the Act could himself be liable.

Wright Court Case

30. Mr. Winnick asked the Attorney-General if he is now in a position to make a statement on the Wright court case in Australia.

The Attorney-General: With permission, I shall answer this at the end of Question Time.

High Court Judges

31. Mr. Madden asked the Attorney-General what criteria the Lord Chancellor uses in recommending the appointment of High Court judges.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): High Court judges are appointed by the Queen on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor. The statutory qualification is to be a barrister of 10 years' standing, but those appointed are usually of more senior standing than that. The criteria for selection are judicial potential, ability, experience, reputation and personal integrity.

Mr. Madden: Can the Solicitor-General, from his personal recollection, think of anyone who has been promoted in one go from registrar to High Court judge?

The Solicitor-General: I can think of one — or, at least, I have been prompted of one. It is unusual, but there is one. To make a general response to the question, I believe that the reputation of our judiciary is unsurpassed throughout the world. Where the constitution appears to be working well, on the whole I am averse to changing it.

Mr. Stokes: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that most people in this country, unlike some Opposition Members, regard our judges in the highest light? They look to them as protection against arbitrary power and they want no changes in their appointment, and certainly no political mucking about with what they do.

The Solicitor-General: As usual, my hon. Friend speaks with the good sense that characterises the opinion of the vast majority of people in Britain.

Mr. Skinner: Has the Solicitor-General seen the recent remarks of Judge Argyle, who last week addressed a meeting and said that those who are found guilty of crimes which result in sentences of more than 15 years should be hung—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hanged."]—hanged: it is the same argument. He also said that there are 5 million illegal immigrants in Britain. How did he manage to become a judge? Who was responsible for giving him the job? Why is it that the Government can cast aspersions on the Australian judge, yet this one seemingly attracts no comments from the Attorney-General and his mates?

The Solicitor-General: The advantage of having an independent judiciary is that its members are responsible for their own opinions, if they are correctly reported. The Attorney-General is not responsible for anything that is reported to have been said by any judge.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Africa

Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to help control the devastation being caused by locusts and other pests in Africa.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): Last month I committed over £1·5 million for pesticides, sprayers, vehicles and spares to combat the current desert locust upsurge in eastern Africa. I have agreed to today to provide a further £567,000 for locust and grasshopper control in the Gambia, Mali and Sudan. This is in addition to the £3 million the Government provided last year to help to control locusts and other pests in Africa. We stand ready to provide more help if needed.

Mr. Norris: Does my hon. Friend agree that the locust and grasshopper devastation in central Africa, all the way from Senegal to Djibouti, wreaked untold damage on the fragile economies of those countries? Does he agree that although his news today is welcome, we must do all that we can to combat those serious attacks on the economies of central Africa?

Mr. Patten: I very much agree with my hon. Friend, whose remarks underline the importance of supporting the regional organisations working on the control of locusts. I was pleased to visit the desert locust control organisation a couple of weeks ago, which we support and will continue to support.

Mozambique

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the amount of aid her Majesty's Government will be extending to Mozambique in 1988-789.

Mr. Chris Patten: We expect to maintain a substantial aid programme to Mozambique in 1988-89. Figures will be announced in due course in the usual way. We shall also remain ready to contribute food aid and emergency relief.

Mr. Soames: Although I congratulate my hon. Friend on the imaginative programme that he has introduced for Mozambique, does he agree that Britain has some important interests in a stable Mozambique? Will he do all that he can to ensure that if any EEC food surpluses are available for that region, Mozambique has the first charge upon them?

Mr. Patten: I very much agree with my hon. Friend's first point. I hope that Mozambique will soon agree on a programme with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, which we shall support when it happens. As for food aid, I am pleased to be able to tell my hon. Friend that following my visit to Mozambique we immediately raised the question of food aid in Brussels. A further 60,000 tonnes of cereals was agreed by the Commission on 3 March. Much of it will be provided from Zimbabwe.

Mr. Kirkwood: Bearing in mind the fact that economic security cannot exist in the absence of military security, and having regard to the problems of Mozambique at present, do the Government have any plans to increase military aid to the front-line states and to Mozambique in particular?

Mr. Patten: Although the matter is not strictly within my terms of reference, I can confirm that we are helping with the training of the Mozambiquean armed forces, and we are also providing battalion unit training for the Zimbabwe army.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Is not a major cause of Mozambique's difficulties and need for food aid the disruptive tactics of the Republic of South Africa to the south, supporting the guerrillas within the country, who are disrupting the normal flows of supply? This happens throughout the Southern African Development Coordination Conference countries. What thoughts have my hon. Friend and his Department given to supporting those countries that are being seriously disadvantaged by the sanctions being imposed on South Africa and South Africa's retaliation?

Mr. Patten: We have continued to urge restraint on South Africa in relation to Mozambique and the other front-line states, and we have continued to urge South Africa to stick to the Nkomati accord.

Mr. Anderson: I welcome the new warmth in the relationship between our country and Mozambique and the coming visit of President Chissano, but what are the Government doing about South Africa's destabilisation policies, which are destroying the very infrastructure that the Government are seeking to assist? Are we telling the South Africans that they cannot get away with arming and financing these rebels, who are surrogates of South Africa and destroying our aid efforts?

Mr. Patten: In answer to the previous questions I have already referred to the representations that we have made to the South African Government. As I was able to make clear at the meeting of SADCC in February, we are also providing more support to help the front-line states become more independent economically of South Africa.

Development Research

38. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he is taking to ensure the viability of development studies and development related research in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Patten: The ODA currently provides £17 million a year for direct support of about 30 British institutions undertaking development-related research. Another £12 million is provided in grants for research by specific individuals or teams. Support for courses in development studies at British universities is provided by the Department of Education and Science through the University Grants Committee. The ODA also provides assistance to postgraduate students from overseas.

Mr. Holland: The Minister must be aware that the cuts undertaken by the Government have lacerated research in tropical development institutions and core funding of research institutes such as the institute of development studies at Sussex. Since December it has been clear that the whole future of the school of development studies at East Anglia is at risk. The Minister made a good start at this by expressing concern over the matter, but why has he not followed it through? Can he not get the Department of Education and Science to grant funding, and if he cannot, will he not come up with something from his own budget as a temporary measure to ensure that that school can survive?

Mr. Patten: The first part of the hon. Gentleman's question is nonsense. As to the second, I was concerned to learn about the proposals being discussed to reduce undergraduate training programmes in development studies at East Anglia. As the hon. Gentleman suggested, I made clear publicly how much value we place on the work of the school of development studies there. I have also made those views known to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science and to the chairman of the University Grants Committee. I understand that discussions are continuing, and I hope that there will be a satisfactory outcome.

Development Process (Women's Participation)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the specific projects in his present programme of overseas aid that relate to women's participation in the development process.

Mr. Chris Patten: All aid affects women. Examples of projects and programmes with a direct impact on women are given in the booklet "Women in Development", copies of which are in the Library.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Minister aware that in most Third world countries it is women who do all the hard physical labour, and specific targeting of projects that would help them in training and in agricultural matters would have a direct effect on the standard of living of most difficult areas, particularly those in need of some kind of economic investment?

Mr. Patten: I agree with the emphasis that the hon. Lady places on training. Too few women are on our training programme, and we are taking that point up with the Governments of aid recipient countries.

Mr. Forth: Do we not have to be careful not to impose our own standards and mores on other countries? Will my hon. Friend give me an assurance that any pontifications that we make on this matter will be kept to a minimum, as with expressions of our attitude to the internal, domestic and social affairs of other countries?

Mr. Patten: The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The answer to the second part of the question is yes.

Mr. Deakins: Is the Minister aware that one way of helping women to take part in the development process in the Third world is to ensure that they have full access to information, suppliers and advice generally on family planning so that they can choose for themselves the number of children they will have and their spacing and can preserve their health and play a full part as citizens in the development process?

Mr. Patten: There is a great deal in what the hon. Gentleman said. In 1985 we spent £15·5 million on population-related activities. I believe that there is a close relationship between the success of population programmes and literacy rates among women.

Immunisation Schemes

40. Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support is being provided from the aid programme to immunisation schemes in developing countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: We support immunisation programmes through our contributions to the United Nations Children's Fund and the World Health Organisation's cold chain support unit and as part of our bilaterally funded primary health care projects.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my hon. Friend agree that in this modern age it is unacceptable that so many children throughout the world should suffer and die because of a lack of immunisation? Does he agree that Britain's contribution compares favourably with those of other countries? Will he give a comparison? What is my hon. Friend's opinion on how well UNICEF is carrying out its functions in that regard?

Mr. Patten: UNICEF is doing an extremely good job. That is why I was pleased that we were able in January to announce a £5 million grant for its immunisation programme. This financial year we shall contribute more than £13 million to UNICEF, which is the largest amount that we have ever contributed. We are making £164,000 available to the WHO's cold chain support unit. In addition, we hope to spend more than £10 million on bilateral health activities, many of which include immunisation.

Aid-Trade Projects

41. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further projects he is considering for developing countries under the aid-trade provisions.

Mr. Chris Patten: Thirty four capital aid projects and 37 technical co-operation proposals are currently under consideration for funding from the aid and trade provision.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister accept that Britain alone within the OECD is one of the few countries whose proportion of aid as bilateral aid — as opposed to funding through multilateral sources — is increasing? Is that not regrettable?

Mr. Patten: I am not sure exactly what the hon. Gentleman is asking. I believe that the more significant figure is in the OECD's recent findings—80 per cent. of our aid budget goes to the poorest countries, as against an average for the OECD of 60 per cent.

Wright Court Case

3.32 pm

The following Question stood upon the Order Paper:

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): To ask the Attorney-General if he is now in a position to make a statement on the Wright court case in Australia.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): The principle which the Government are seeking to uphold is clear. Having considered Mr. Justice Powell's judgment and the advice of Australian counsel, the Government have decided to appeal against it. A notice of appeal will be lodged as soon as practicable.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Attorney-General aware that many people believe that it is simply a further waste of taxpayers' money to pursue the appeal in Australia? Is he aware also that the Opposition are concerned not about the tittle tattle of the memoirs—we all know that Wright is a very embittered individual—but about the need to ensure that there is adequate parliamentary scrutiny of the security services? In view of the allegations that a Labour Government were destabilised—at least at certain stages—by the Security Service, will there be a clear promise that there will be a full judicial inquiry into those allegations?

The Attorney-General: I have no power to give any such undertaking. That is not a matter for me. I remind the House of what the Prime Minister of the day said. He said that, after conducting detailed inquiries, he was satisfied that the allegations about the Security Service

"did not constitute grounds for lack of confidence in the competence and impartiality of the Security Service or for instituting a special inquiry."

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that if the Government had done nothing to try to stop those who are entrusted with the nation's secrets from betraying those secrets for money they would have been subject to the accusation of having shown the grossest irresponsibility? Do we in this country not have reason to believe that a system of justice founded upon our system will uphold the principle of confidentiality?

The Attorney-General: Those are certainly matters that the Ministers concerned took very much into consideration when reaching the decision to start the proceedings in Australia.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): May I refer the Attorney-General to the answers that he has given twice today about the inquiry that took place in the summer of 1977, in which I played a part? The statement to which he referred, of which I have a copy, reads:

"The Home Secretary, as the Minister to whom the Security Service is responsible, has been closely involved in the enquiries".

We were not inquiring into the allegations that are now made by Wright and by others. We were inquiring into alleged electronic devices at No. 10, and it was on that issue that the then Prime Minister issued his statement, in which I played a part.

None of that information would be provided to the Attorney-General. None of that information would be provided to the Home Secretary of today. None of that would be provided to the Prime Minister. It is a convention—I note that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is nodding in agreement—that none of that information is provided to a later Government. I am satisfied that the information about the Wright allegations and other allegations is not referred to in the inquiry. When Ministers, including the Attorney-General, say that the Prime Minister of the day dealt with it in his statement, I can say that he did not, and neither did I. They are different allegations, and unless an inquiry is set up—this is an exercise by dissident members of MI5 and not a question of national security—I shall get at the root of it whatever happens. The Government had better remember that.

The Attorney-General: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not suggest for a moment, as he has made clear, that the Government are seeking to mislead in any way.

Mr. Merlyn Rees indicated assent

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Misleading! Come clean to the House.

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his acknowledgement——

Mr. Skinner: Come clean.

Mr. Christopher Soames (Crawley): Shut up.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) must not interrupt like that.

Mr. Skinner: Why do you not mention Bunter, Mr. Speaker? Why do you not get stuck into Bunter, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Attorney-General: As the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) has said, we do not have access to any of the papers that were considered by him and the then Prime Minister. I shall, however, ensure that what he has said is drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Geoffrey Rippon (Hexham): I warmly welcome the statement that the Government are to appeal in the Wright case. Many in the House believe that the Government are right so to do and that there is no alternative but to take that course. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that if the operations of the secret service must remain secret, the means by which it is controlled must remain the responsibility of the Government of the day and cannot be delegated to any other body?

The Attorney-General: That has been the convention for a very long time. That is why questions about security are usually not allowed by the Table Office. I agree with everything that my right hon. and learned Friend has said.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Is the Attorney-General aware that I am sure that both sides of the House agree with the principle that no one who has worked in MI5, either present or retired, should be free to publish what he wishes? The question of accountability of MI5, however, and what appear to be fairly widespread illegal practices are causing great concern. Will the Attorney-General, who is answerable on this issue to the House, explain why he was not involved in the decision not to prosecute Mr. Chapman Pincher six weeks before the book was published? Did that decision relate to the fact that the book had been stolen? Will the Attorney-General tell the House also why no action was taken against Mr. Peter Wright when he appeared on television?

Both those events occurred in Britain, and surely it is better to proceed on that basis than to go on digging a deeper hole, when one is deep enough in it already, down in Australia. Surely we should deal with the issues for which we are responsible and for which the Attorney-General is responsible, which preceded what happened in Australia by a couple of years.

The Attorney-General: I well understand the anxieties that have been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman. I was not consulted, and therefore I am unable to comment on why I was not, and that is clear.

As to the rest of the right hon. Gentleman's question, I am still bound by the obligation that was imposed on me earlier, because this morning I consulted counsel in Australia and was told that I cannot make any full or detailed statement until the appeal is over.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): As the confusion over the Wright case seems to be deepening with all these announcements, will my right hon. and learned Friend take note of the view that, by his announcement today, he may be pursuing a good principle, but by the wrong method? Instead of spending the best part of £1 million of taxpayers' money on what I fear will be a vain attempt to persuade the Australian courts to uphold Britain's narrow view of the Official Secrets Act, will my right hon. and learned Friend and his advisers concentrate on the higher priority, which is to ensure that all present and future members of the security services are given binding and enforceable contracts of employment, the breach of which makes them clearly liable to damages and loss of their pension rights if they dishonour their obligations of confidentiality?

The Attorney-General: One of the decisions of the learned judge, Mr. Justice Powell, was whether there was an enforceable contract, which almost certainly will be one of the grounds of appeal.

Is this a vain attempt? No, Sir. We do not accept that it is a vain attempt. I would not agree to any appeal unless I felt confident that there was a proper chance of success. That is why we have taken this decision.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why does the Attorney-General not take up the offer that was repeatedly made by Mr. Turnbull last week, that he was willing to do a deal with the Attorney-General on the content of the book and exclude any material which the Attorney-General felt breached national security, with one proviso, that the material that Wright has produced on the destabilisation of Labour be published? Surely it is in the public interest that that be made available?

Why did the Attorney-General go through his agent, on bended knee, to the judge in the Australian court, insisting that the affidavit of Mr. Wright which dealt with the destabilisation of Labour be taken in secret behind closed doors? Why was that area of his affidavit not made available in the public domain so that the whole world could learn what happened during the mid-1970s?

The Attorney-General: A great deal of the book remains, in the view of Her Majesty's Government, a matter of confidence. On those occasions there was no question of going on bended knee to the judge. On the occasions that it was clear to anybody looking at a passage that it was a matter of confidence, the proceedings were heard in camera. There was no question of having to go on bended knee. I am sorry, but I have forgotten the first point.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The deal with Turnbull.

The Attorney-General: Again, the hon. Gentleman has failed to understand the principle, which I thought we had repeated so many times that it would be clear to anybody. The principle is that we need to uphold a promise that is made by those employed in the intelligence services that they will not, at any time, disclose anything that they have learnt in confidence. We cannot have a settlement, because if we achieve a settlement we shall be in breach of that principle.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Has my right hon. and learned Friend considered that the reason why the Australian courts take a different view of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act is that they have a Freedom of Information Act, which effectively has replaced the Official Secrets Act? Is that not the direction that we should be taking? Should we not get rid of section 2 and replace it with a Freedom of Information Act that will say what can and cannot be published.

The Attorney-General: Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act played no part in our conduct of this case in Australia. As to the second matter, my hon. Friend will know that in 1979 we sought to improve section 2 but that that proposal did not meet with favour. Ultimately, that must be a question for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Is the Attorney-General aware that a large number of people inside and outside the House will regard the Government's decision to appeal as little more than a delaying mechanism to prevent any further discussion of the matter this side of the general election?

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that taxpayers' interests are at stake? Can he tell the House the total estimated cost to the taxpayer of this farce? In the light of what has happened to the Liverpool councillors, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that he and the Prime Minister should be surcharged if the appeal fails?

The Attorney-General: The councillors would have been in a much stronger position if they had acted on, instead of against, legal advice.

The hon. Gentleman talks about people outside. For the third time at Question Time I must tell the House that I have received not a single letter from any member of the British public about our taking action in Australia. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman reads something into the issue in which the British public do not believe. I think that they believe in the principle that we accept.

What the hon. Gentleman said about a delaying mechanism is nonsense. I am confident that we have a better than even chance of success. As I said to the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) on the last occasion when I was able to attend Question Time, I am longing for the opportunity to make that statement, and I still am.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the majority of people in this country understand and support his desire to uphold the principle that, in the interests of national security, secrets are secrets and should not be sold for money by those to whom they are entrusted in the course of their duties?

The Attorney-General: I do not wish to comment myself, but I believe that to be the view of the British public.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): Which is the weightiest principle in the Government's mind — failing to recognise inconsistency delaying other cases, or kicking the ball for touch until after the next election?

Who takes the decisions — the Law Officers or the Prime Minister? Alternatively, was it on the Attorney-General's advice that it was decided to sue in Australia as well as in relation to Miss Miller's book in Ireland? Why was the Attorney-General not consulted about the decision not to act in Pincher's case? Was it because the book's proofs were obtained illegally? Having failed to ban such books in Australia and in Ireland, has the right hon. and learned Gentleman considered that even if he were to win in Australia he would fail to ban publication in Ireland or America?

The Attorney-General: The right hon. and learned Gentleman listens too much to gossip. He talks about weighty principles and kicking the ball for touch. That is one way to put it, but I have now told the House not once, but three times, that I am satisfied that our chances of success are sufficient to justify an appeal. There is no question of taking a deliberate political decision in order to get past the next election. This is a ministerial, collective decision on which the Attorney-General advises.

European Community (Steelmaking Capacity)

3.48 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East)(by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on European Commission proposals to reduce steelmaking capacity within the European Community.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Giles Shaw): The European Commission's view, which is generally shared by the member states, is that substantial excess steelmaking capacity remains in the European Community. This excess capacity is generally estimated to be in the range of 20 million to 25 million tonnes per annum of hot rolled capacity.

Against this background, the European Steel Producers Federation, Eurofer, put forward proposals to the Commission on 1 March for reducing capacity in a number of steelmaking sectors. These proposals were presented to the Commission on 1 March. No capacity reductions from the British Steel Corporation were included in the Eurofer proposals.

At a meeting of the Council of Ministers on Thursday 19 March, which I will attend, the Commission will, I understand, make an oral statement of its views of the Eurofer proposals in relation to the excess capacity in Europe. I shall, of course, be reporting to the House following that Council of Ministers in accordance with normal practice.

Mr. John Smith: Is the Minister aware of the alarm that spread rapidly throughout the British steelmaking communities when news was received of possible proposals by the European Commission to reduce steelmaking capacity, particularly in hot-rolled coil and strip production? Can the Minister give a categorical assurance that the pledge given to maintain the five integrated steel plants will be maintained absolutely until 1988 and that no proposals will be agreed to take effect thereafter or to prejudice decisions for the future?

Is the Minister aware that the United Kingdom has already borne a severe reduction in the steel industry and there is just no room for any more? Can the Minister confirm that no proposals—I believe that he said this in his statement, but it is so important that I hope he will confirm it—to reduce capacity have been made by the British Steel Corporation, through the mechanism of Eurofer, in discussions with the Commission? Will the Minister make clear at the Council of Ministers meeting on Thursday a view that I believe is fairly widespread throughout the House, that the British Government will not agree to any further reduction in steel capacity, particularly in hot-rolled coil and strip production, either now or in the future?

Mr. Shaw: I unequivocally give the right hon. and learned Gentleman the assurance that he wishes in connection with the maintenance of the five integrated plants strategy as agreed in August 1985 and to which the Government are fully committed.

In relation to the Eurofer proposals, I assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that no step will be taken which in any way prejudices the future of that strategy after the particular date. I can give him the assurance that there is no element in the Eurofer proposals than has been submitted by the British Steel Corporation.

Thirdly, in relation to the Eurofer initiative, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware, as I am aware, that initial rounds were put together in the Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co. report, which became public.

I can assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that in the discussions that I have had, particularly with Vice-President Navjes, in relation to the reports that appeared in the press last weekend, there is absolutely nothing which in any way weakens or undermines the assurances that I have given the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Sir Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): The maintenance of the five integrated steel plants is a tribute to the Government's persistence, but, to ensure that they achieve viability, the future of those steel works should not be endangered by the current talks taking place in Europe.

Mr. Shaw: That is absolutely correct. It should be borne in mind that the position in the United Kingdom today is that we have a steel corporation and a steel industry which are infinitely more competitive than they have been since the war. The British Steel Corporation is actively seeking to increase the sales of many of its steel products, to the advantage of the United Kingdom, and against European competition. That is a major sea change in steel production.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): We welcome the assurances that the Minister has given to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). However, the Minister must be aware from his recent visit to Scotland that many fear that the BSC might be making the European Community an excuse for advancing the closure of Ravenscraig. When the Danish Commissioner, Mr. Petersen, recently visited Strathclyde, he agreed with those who pointed out that Britain had already taken more than its share of cuts and that in the next round the brunt should be borne by the French, the Italians and the West Germans.

Mr. Shaw: I take note of what the hon. Gentleman said. He will be aware that that is all the more reason why the BSC has not offered volume reductions in relation to the Eurofer proposals. As regards the Government's view, whatever the Commission may say, it is a political decision by the Council of Ministers that will determine the issue.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my hon. Friend remember that it is not sufficient to state important truths once, and that the facts of the extent to which Britain slimmed its steel industry before the other members of the European iron and steel community did so, bear repeating in public over and over again?

Mr. Shaw: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, and I expect that that fact needs to be repeated several times.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Did the BSC propose to Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co. the closure of any capacity, and were any such proposals subsequently withdrawn before the report was submitted to the Commission? Further, can the Minister give an assurance that nothing that the BSC is allowed to incorporate in its own plans will be based on the assumption of any major plant closure after 1988?

Mr. Shaw: I have already given the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) the assurance that the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) would wish me to give. The BSC position in relation to Eurofer is that no volume of BSC capacity is involved therein. On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I must make it clear to him that Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co. was free to conduct its own assessment of what would be required. The Eurofer meeting determined which proposition should be placed before the Commission. Those proposals, which are the only proposals that have been made by Eurofer, were deposited with the Commission on 1 March and they will form the basis of the Council meeting on 19 March.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): My hon. Friend may return to Brussels with the knowledge that he has the backing of the whole House. Is he aware that he must make it clear to the Commission that not only the BSC but the Government would find it unacceptable that there should be any cut in British steel production, and that he should continue to point out that although we have reduced production, other nations have increased their production and have not slimmed down? There can be no question of Britain making further reductions until the rest of Europe is in line.

Mr. Shaw: I very much endorse what my hon. Friend has said. He is correct to point out that the capacity exists elsewhere in the Community.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Following the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), may I ask whether Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co. put forward proposals for shrinkage? Is it not a fact that the company could have done so only if such proposals were put forward by the BSC?

Mr. Shaw: I do not think that the hon. Member can be right. Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co. made propositions to Eurofer, but the British Government and the Government of all other member states did not know what those proposals would involve, because that was the basis on which Eurofer approached Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co. for an exchange of views. As I understand it, the only formal propositions made by Eurofer were those delivered to the Commission on 1 March.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): No one doubts the Government's determination to fight in the Council of Ministers for the retention of five integrated steel works, but will my hon. Friend say clearly to the House whether steel capacity is an area in which Britain has the right of veto, or whether it is likely that other members could make decisions, by a majority vote, on the steel capacities of member states, including the possible future closure of a plant?

Mr. Shaw: I think my hon. Friend will recognise that there can be no more important issue than discussion in the Council of Ministers of such an important matter. I would not wish to prejudge how that discussion will end.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does the Minister not answer the question that he has just been asked? He has been asked a straightforward question by one of his hon. Friends about whether Britain would use the veto to stop further steel closures. Why does the Minister not have the guts to stand up to those people in the Common Market instead of continually giving in, as the rest of the Tory Ministers have done over the past five years?

Is the Minister not aware that countless thousands of people throughout the country have been scattered around by the lethal combination of the Common Market and this Tory Government over the past eight years? It is time that we put a stop to it. Get across there and tell them that we are having no more of it.

Mr. Shaw: I understand the hon. Member's strong views on this matter. He will know that the whole of the steel regime is bound up with such matters as quotas, quota liberalisation, increases in quotas, capacity and many other issues. The United Kingdom wishes to secure the best possible solution in relation to its European capacity, and that is a matter for negotiation.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Is my hon. Friend aware that the sea change in the fortunes of the British steel industry to which he has referred is a source of considerable pride to people in this country and that any robust action that he takes in relation to the European proposals will have the widest support in all parts of the House?

Mr. Shaw: I am pleased to have my hon. Friend's support. I am grateful to know that hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise the strong position of the United Kingdom steel industry.

Wright Court Case

3.59 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the appeal in the Australian courts in the case of the Attorney-General v. Heinemann Australia Pty. Ltd. and Peter Wright."

The matter is important because a great body of opinion in this country, of all political persuasions, believes that to appeal would only heap one embarrassment upon another, as the Government would inevitably lose. A wise man knows when he has been given a sound beating. Only a fool would go on in search of more punishment. The great majority of people in this country object strongly to the undignified spectacle of Britain being mauled and hauled over the coals in an Australian court action. People are unable to understand the inconsistency in the Government's prosecution policy—the green light to Pincher and West, and the red light to Wright, The Guardian and The Observer, against whom injunctions remain.

People believe that an appeal would leave Britain open to further revelations as to the identity of security officers who, despite lifetime obligations of confidentiality to the Crown, have leaked secrets and yet have not been prosecuted. There is concern about the delay that any appeal may have on the decision whether to prosecute Lord Rothschild, under section 7 of the Official Secrets Act 1920, for soliciting Mr. Peter Wright, by means of an offer of money, to pass to Mr. Pincher documents known or believed to contain official secrets relating to the security services.

What is most worrying is the grave matter of the insistence of the British Government in the Australian court that Wright's affidavit on the destabilisation of Labour should be taken in private session behind closed doors. Why have the Government so vehemently denied that any attempt was made to destabilise Labour, yet made a desperate plea to the judge to prevent Wright from making his allegations in public? We know that that happened, from reading the small print in the judgment. When I alleged this matter months ago, there were repeated denials. We have Mr. Justice Powell to thank for allowing this part of the secret evidence to be brought into the public domain. It is clear that a major cover-up of security service activity in the mid-1920s is now taking place. The Government want to keep the lid on the issue until after the general election.

The matter is urgent because we need a full debate on the accountability of the security services to Parliament and on the reform of the law. I earnestly hope that my memorandum to the Privileges Committee on the necessary reforms will be fully considered. It provides the framework that would avoid embarrassment in the future.

Finally, the matter is important to me as a Socialist. We do not want a future Labour Government, wrestling with unemployment, to be destabilised by a gang of out-of-control security officers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) asks leave of the House to move the

[Mr. Speaker]

Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the appeal in the Australian courts in the case of the Attorney-General v. Heinemann Australia Pty. Ltd. and Peter Wright."

I listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman said, as I listened also to the exchange of questions to and answers from the Attorney-General earlier today. I regret that I do not consider that the matter the hon. Gentleman has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Register of Members' Interests

4.3 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As all hon. Members know, you are responsible for entries within the Register of Members' Interests—responsible in the sense that hon. Members must give what they honestly believe to be the truth and nothing but the truth. The Register is then compiled under your general direction. As a matter of curiosity, I wonder whether there will be an entry for the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) as a result of the new moonlighting job that he obtained at Oxford on Saturday. [Interruption.] Hon. Members must be fair. I am asking a serious question.

I was a little puzzled about the ballot. It was not run along the lines that Conservatives regard as proper and right for trade unions. Precise figures were leaked after the first day. It was not even an exit poll. People were queuing up in kinky dresses. There was no proportional representation, yet the winner was one of those who stand by the idea of proportional representation. I should have thought that, as the right hon. Gentleman received only 40 per cent. of the ballot, he would demand a run-off. The turnout was abysmal. It was worse than the turnout for the House of Commons on a bad day. It was almost like the turnout for the House of Lords.

There are many inconsistencies with Establishment-type figures. They preach to the nation about trade unions having proper ballots, yet when it comes to their having a ballot they do not even——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What does this have to do with the Register of Members' Interests?

Mr. Skinner: It is quite simple, really, Mr. Speaker. I am asking you, as the man in charge of the Register, whether the name of the victor will be entered into the Register of Members' Interests as the new Chancellor of Oxford university, and whether it will enable him to keep away from this place any more than before. Many considerations should be taken into account. The principal point concerns what I said earlier. There are contradictions here because people want to tell the working class how to run its affairs, but when it comes to having a ballot of their own, there is the biggest cock-up of all time.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that it is a different point of order. I hope so.

I say to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that I understand that the election took place only last week. Whether this appointment is put into the Register of Members' Interests will be for the Select Committee.

Standing Order No. 20 Applications

4.7 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Those hon. Members who listened carefully to what you said when turning down the application by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) noticed that you used a form of words that was rather different from the courteous way in which you normally turn down such requests. You said that you had taken account of what had happened during questions to the Attorney-General. Are you not on rather dangerous ground? Does that not imply some sort of value judgment from the Chair as to whether such questions were answered satisfactorily? Some of us who have been begging that Downing street should refer the case of Lord Glenamara to the Security Commission might think that they were answered most unsatisfactorily. With respect, Mr. Speaker, do you not think that you should be careful in making judgments about requests for early debates that involve questions on which there is a difference of opinion whether they were satisfactorily answered?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has given me some good advice. In future I shall stick strictly to the words on my brief. I was merely seeking to explain to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that we had had an exchange on this matter today. I was not making a value judgment on it. I thank the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for his suggestion. I shall take it to heart.

Orders of the Day

Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.7 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The immediate spur to this proposal has been the arrival of over 800 people claiming asylum in the three months up to the end of February. So this is not a Bill about Tamils alone, or about Sri Lanka alone. It goes wider than that. Its aim is to make sure that our immigration control remains effective in the face of rapidly changing international pressures. We have to reconcile that aim with our international obligation to help the genuine victims of persecution.

We start—I hope the whole House starts—from the conviction that a firm immigration control is essential for harmony in our nation, and in particular in our cities. It has to be administered fairly, humanely, and where necessary, compassionately, and I believe that it is. But it has to be kept firmly in place, and that means from time to time strengthening it as new points of pressure on it become clear.

I say at the outset to Opposition Members—without rancour; they have not yet shown their hand on this Bill—that it is simply no use pretending that it is possible to have it both ways. They cannot proclaim in general terms that they want effective control while opposing everything that is needed to keep it effective. People will soon see through that. There is no point in agreeing that there must be a bucket, but on the sole condition that it has plenty of holes in it. Yet that is the present stance of the Labour and Liberal parties on immigration control. I was particularly irked, as he knows, by the stand taken by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) when I made my statement a fortnight ago.

This country is not alone in wanting immigration controls to work effectively, nor are we alone in facing growing pressures, particularly from the Third world. A powerful combination of pressures now arises, because for the first time large numbers of people across the world have the means, the knowledge and the will to leave their own homes in the Third world and seek greater security, comfort and prosperity elsewhere.

These pressures can affect many parts of our immigration system. That is why we decided last year to extend the visa requirement to five countries of the Indian sub-continent and west Africa. The need for this was clearly explained and fully debated in the House. Immigration control at the ports had come under sustained pressure over a period of many months. In the first eight months of last year, some 8,500 people from these five countries were refused entry at Heathrow and Gatwick. That was nearly 50 per cent. more than in the same period the year before. In the following six weeks, the pressure at the ports became more intense — indeed, becoming a rush of people who were not eligible for admission but who hoped to gain a foothold here before the visa deadline took effect.

The House will recall the angry huffing and puffing that greeted our proposal for visas. We were told that it was not necessary and that it would not work. No adjective was too severe for it. But now relative silence has fallen because the benefits of the new arrangements are plain. The great majority of people who want to come here are bona fide, and for them the new system is a considerable improvement. The arrangements in Ghana and on the Indian sub-continent have been operating now for five months, and over 90 per cent. of applications are dealt with on the day that they are received. I think that that is remarkable. The system has therefore confounded its early critics. Visa holders can travel here, confident that there are unlikely to be any difficulties when they arrive. The arrangements have reduced congestion at the ports and have done much to restore the effectiveness of our controls.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: I shall give way to the hon. Member now, if that is what he wants.

Mr. Winnick: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He has given me due warning. Does he not recognise that the reason why there has been little criticism since the new system has been operating is precisely because of what he has just said: that in the main these applications have been dealt with very quickly indeed—as he stated, on the day itself? If that can be maintained, there will be less criticism than when the system was introduced. However, a great deal will depend upon whether there is delay, bearing in mind the very lengthy delay that arises when people apply for permanent settlement. I do not know whether the Home Secretary has touched on this point already, but will he try to avoid the completely false accusation that because the Labour party criticises the Government from time to time it is not fully committed to effective immigration control? The right hon. Gentleman knows that that is not so and that we are totally committed to such controls.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's first point was very fair. The effectiveness of the system obviously depends on how well it is run, but that is a very far cry from the racist accusations that were being tossed about freely last autumn when the Government introduced this system. As for the hon. Gentleman's second point, I have touched upon it. This is the bucket with the holes in it. We cannot say that we are in favour of effective immigration control if we then oppose every step that is taken, as it becomes necessary, to keep that control effective, yet that is what the Opposition parties do. I have touched on that point, and there may be occasions when I have to touch on it again.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Does the Home Secretary have evidence or information about those who would have been able to enter this country under the ordinary system and who would not have been refused entry but who, because of the problems connected with travelling from villages and staying overnight in Islamabad or elsewhere, have been unable to apply for a visa and therefore have been unable to obtain visas? Does the Home Secretary have evidence that there are people who fall into that category?

Mr. Hurd: I do not have any such evidence, although I rather expected that there might have been some. That is partly because visa applications can be dealt with by post and partly because people have overcome the problem to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

In recent months, however, we have been faced with a fresh loophole. It applies mainly to people who require visas but who nevertheless arrive here without them and resist immediate return to their country of origin by claiming asylum. As I have already said, from December 1986 to the end of February of this year, over 800 applications for asylum were made by people arriving at our ports—nearly twice the number for the whole of 1984. Of those 800, nearly 500 were from Sri Lanka. In December and January, some 370 Sri Lankans arrived without valid visas and claimed asylum—more than half the total number of Sri Lankans who were granted visas in Colombo in those two months.

The House will know of the circumstances of the arrival of the group of 64 Tamil asylum seekers on 13 February, most of whom were refused entry. I announced to the House on 3 March that I had decided to refer their cases to the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service. Thereafter, fresh individual decisions will be reached in the light of all the relevant facts. I expect to receive representations on these cases by 18 March—the day after tomorrow—and I do not propose to make any comment on them today. Indeed, it would not be right or possible for me to do so.

We are not alone in facing such pressures. In West Germany, 100,000 people applied for asylum in 1986—a huge number compared with ours. In France, 26,000 applications were made last year, and the French Government announced last August that they would re-examine their regulations because of the problems of such an influx. In October last year Denmark passed urgent laws to refuse access to the asylum procedure for those who come from a third safe country. Sweden has followed suit. In 1986 it received 14,500 applications for asylum, of which 1,700 were refused at the frontier as manifestly unfounded.

On 20 February this year Canada introduced new measures to control asylum abuse, and most recently Belgium, which was facing 500 to 600 arrivals seeking asylum each month, has just introduced legislation to refuse access to some asylum seekers, to transfer decision taking from the United Nations high commissioner for refugees to a Belgian authority and to impose financial sanctions on carriers bringing people without the proper documents to Belgium. I understand that the Dutch are also proposing to introduce legislation soon, to the same effect.

This is not, therefore, in any way an isolated problem. I believe that we have to work with other countries to come to a more sensible international understanding of how these matters can be better arranged. Under our presidency of the European Community, a special working group on immigration, including asylum abuse, was set up. That initiative has gone forward under the Belgian presidency, and I can tell the House that last week the group agreed specific recommendations that included reference to the liability of carriers on much the same lines as the Bill that is before the House. These recommendations will come before a ministerial meeting, which I hope to attend next month.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): When anybody comes to this country pleading political asylum, does the right hon. Gentleman not agree that a lengthy process is involved to test the validity of that claim and that it is very likely that anybody who arrives without papers is a political refugee? It takes a long time to establish the truth. It is difficult to convince the public that we are upholding traditional British standards if we do not give refugee status to those who legitimately ought to have it. If we do not make that clear to people as soon as they arrive, that puts our great British tradition in jeopardy.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has put very succinctly the case against the Bill and I intend to deal with it, but I do not accept that in all cases one can draw that conclusion. If we allowed for delay in all cases, that delay would impose the decision because at the end of the day it would be impossible to send people back to the place from which they came.

To conclude the international part of my speech, I hope that during discussion of the Bill there will be no ignorant pretence that this is the proposal of a harsh or inhumane British Government. Other countries more seriously affected than ourselves have already acted as we propose to act. We should be strongly and rightly criticised if we delayed our own action until the trickle became a flood, as more and more people began to use the loophole. That is the background against which I ask the House to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Of course it is not the whole answer and we must continue to be vigilant and ready to take further action if that turns out to be necessary. The Bill reinforces the existing responsibility of carriers for the passengers that they bring to this country. It also gives effect to the decisions already agreed by Parliament about the documents people should have when they arrive.

Carriers are already responsible under the Immigration Act 1971 to pay for detention, accommodation and maintenance costs when certain passengers are refused entry. They are required also to pay for removal if directions are given within two months of entry being refused. The present Bill works within that principle. It is intended to ensure that people who cannot show that they have a claim to entry because they do not have the basic travel document and the necessary visas are not accepted by the carrier for travel. Responsible airlines already check on those things because they know of their liability to pay detention and removal costs and because it is simply not in their interests, or in the interests of their passengers, that people should be delayed or detained when they arrive here. The Bill aims to ensure that all carriers follow the same good practice.

Clause 1 enables a charge of £1,000 to be made for each passenger who requires leave to enter the United Kingdom, and who arrives at our immigration control without a valid passport or other travel document and without a valid visa where one is required. The clause provides for that level to be varied by order subject to the negative resolution procedure of this House. The charge of £1,000 is more or less in line with what other countries are imposing but if, after experience, the figure needs changing, we shall change it.

Subsection (2) of clause 1 provides that no liability will be incurred if the carrier can show that, at the time of embarkation, the passenger produced to the carrier the necessary valid documents. In the same way as carriers' liability for detention costs is interpreted, the clause provides that any document should be regarded as genuine unless its falsity was reasonably apparent.

Clause 2 provides for the Act to cover the whole of the country and, as I announced on 3 March, provides for liability to the charge—this is important—to start from 5 March.

I hope that carriers will recognise the need for this legislation and respond positively to it. I welcome the constructive comments made by British Airways following my original announcement. It already has checking procedures for flights to other countries and will now review the checks that it makes for travel here. I hope on reflection that those who have expressed concern about the procedure will also come to see that it makes good sense. We do not expect carriers to spot clever forgeries, but it is reasonable to expect them, for example, to be able to look at a passport, check that it is current and that the passport photograph is convincing——

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. He may know that British Caledonian is a constituent of mine and that it has told me that it does its best to ensure that the correct travel documents are carried. What steps will he take when a foreign airline tells the immigration authorities that it took every step to ensure that the detained person had the correct travel documents? How can my right hon. Friend check whether that was true?

Mr. Hurd: Those concerned will have to make a judgment. If they think that that is not so, they will go ahead and levy the necessary penalty and it will be for the carrier to decide whether it wishes to make representations or to have the decision reviewed in the courts. I know that British Caledonian opened with a statement containing some reservations about that. I hope that, to some extent, the later discussions that we have had will reassure it.

The immigration service is ready to give carriers any advice that they need on documentation. It has recently approached carriers to offer help on what documents are required for travel to this country, and what carriers should look for. I understand that the response to that has been good, and that the immigration service will undertake a programme of visits and discussions.

Obviously, the Bill will make it much more difficult for those who want to come to this country, but who have no valid grounds for doing so. That is its intention. It is also intended to stop abuse of asylum procedures by preventing people travelling here without valid documents and then claiming asylum before they can be returned. That also is its intention.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On that point, if asylum seekers are fleeing from terrible oppression, by the very nature of that oppression they would be unable to get the relevant documents agreed by their own Government and would be unable to come here. Is the Home Secretary saying, in effect, that he is not prepared to entertain applications from people fleeing from such oppression?

Mr. Hurd: Before I finish I shall go on to consider the way in which genuine refugees come here at present, because that will cover the important point that the hon. Gentleman has made.

If we turn a blind eye to the abuse of asylum procedures and to unregulated and disorganised arrival in this country, we provide a ready market for the racketeer. Clearly, he is already in the market. We risk the breakdown of a properly organised asylum policy which successive Governments have maintained and developed over the past 30 years.

That policy is firmly based on the United Nations convention of 1951. That convention laid on us a clear obligation towards refugees, which it defines as follows: a person who

"'owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country'."

The second part of the definition refers to those without nationality. Where individuals qualify under that definition, the convention provides that they be accorded various special protections and benefits in their country of refuge.

The convention itself does not tell Governments how to carry out that obligation and it does not deal with machinery or rights of appeal. It states clearly a general principle which we accept, and which, incidentally, is more definite and far-reaching than anything current in the 1930s.

I recognise that there are hon. Members, those connected with agencies and people in Third-world countries who would like us to go further. They would like us to grant asylum to anyone who arrives here from a part of the world which is suffering economic or social hardship, civil commotion, famine, natural disaster or war. However, we cannot do that. That change to make that extension beyond our obligation under the convention would lead to a huge, general and open-ended commitment, inconsistent with immigration control or harmony in our nation. It would call into question the whole basis on which the notion of refugee status, to which the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) referred, has up to now been acceptable to the people of this country. We cannot put too great a weight on that tradition if we want it to survive.

The Canadian Minister of Employment and Immigration said in February:

"We want a positive immigration programme that permits the orderly entry of immigrants and refugees, but we cannot maintain such a programme if we allow abuse of our refugee programme to continue".

That is the position of this Government towards refugees. The necessary balance can be struck fairly and well only if we return to a properly ordered and regulated system for dealing with asylum.

I come to the hon. Gentleman's point and to the entirely right concern of some hon. Members about the effect that this Bill might have on genuine refugees. I understand that concern, but it is ill founded. I should like to examine the way in which genuine refugees actually get here. Until recently, over 90 per cent. of all applications for asylum were made by people who were already in this country on a genuine, legitimate and properly documented basis, but who, because of a change in the circumstances of their home country, were unwilling to return. That group will not be affected in any way by this legislation.

A small proportion of people find temporary refuge in other countries and apply at British posts abroad to come as refugees. They can be admitted if their claim to asylum is well founded and this country is the right place for them because of personal contacts and relationships. It is right that we should act carefully in these cases and satisfy ourselves that we are right to accept responsibility for them. Where we do so, they will be issued with the necessary papers to travel here. That group will not be affected in any way by the legislation.

We are also able to make special arrangements from time to time for groups of people still living in their country of origin. For example, a previous Conservative Government began a programme in the 1970s which admitted 4,000 Chileans, mostly direct from Chile. More recently we have admitted under the orderly departure programme direct from Vietnam the close relatives of Vietnamese already here. Indeed, we have a special provision for Sri Lankan Tamils who may obtain a visa in Colombo if they are suffering from severe hardship and have ties with this country. Those groups will not be affected in any way by the legislation.

Finally, there are cases of individuals coming from behind the iron curtain or elsewhere, such as Shcharansky who crossed on foot from East to West Berlin and later visited this country on an Israeli passport; and Irina Ratushinskaya who travelled here on a valid Russion passport with an exit visa.

Such individuals will not be affected in any way by the legislation. The Government will continue to honour their commitments to the convention. However, we must retain proper latitude over the means. The convention, perhaps wisely, did not prescribe machinery, perhaps foreseeing that the circumstances of 1951 might change, as indeed, they have. The convention left the discussion of such means and machinery to the member states who adhere to it.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I apologise to the Home Secretary for having missed the opening part of his speech and hope that he will forgive me if he has already covered this point. If, for example, the captain of a British vessel finds a group of people, obviously without travel documents, on the high seas having escaped from their country and he takes them on board and lands them, will he be caught by the legislation? I am thinking of people such as the Vietnamese boat people.

Mr. Hurd: The captain would have time to communicate with us and to discover what the position and reaction would be. As I have already said, this is a discretionary power. It is possible to construct theoretical occasions when the legislation would bite on genuine refugees, and I do not deny that. For the past five minutes I have tried to set out how genuine refugees arrive here in practice and to show that all those methods would not be affected by the legislation. Obviously, the Vietnamese boat people, for example, did not arrive here originally; they went to other countries, then there were international discussions and we played our part in that and in receiving some of them.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): There are less theoretical cases which the Home Secretary has not addressed—for example, Kurdish refugees and refugees from Iran, Tigré and Eritrea who cannot apply for documents in their home countries. The Minister of State is aware of that and has been helpful towards Kurdish refugees from Iran. The problem is that they cannot go through the procedure of applying for the relevant travel documents. They can leave the country only on false documents or by crossing frontiers without producing documents.

Mr. Hurd: My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State has told me that he arranged for those people to come, so they fell exactly into one of the categories that I mentioned. Many Kurds leave the country where they feel they are being oppressed. They are then in other countries and if they feel that there is a particular reason to exercise the right of aslyum in the United Kingdom, they can make representations from the safe country to which they have gone. Those cases do not fall outside the categories about which I have been speaking.

It is possible to construct hypothetical cases of genuine refugees on whom the legislation would bite; that is what I mean when I talk about balance. Are we to allow our legislation to be affected in order to meet those theoretical cases when actual cases and ways in which refugees come here are not affected by the legislation? If we allow our provisions to be as wide as that, we would leave open the loophole of which I have spoken. I should like to assure the House that that loophole presents a genuine prospect of difficulty for the United Kingdom and it is already in reality a great difficulty for many of our European and north American partners.

There have been long discussions in the United Kingdom about an independent right of appeal for those claiming asylum whose claim has been turned down. The Select Committee on Race Relations and Immigration recommended in 1985 that there should be such an independent right of appeal and my predecessors spelt out in measured terms why they could not accept that. That conclusion holds and has been much strengthened by the increased figures that I have given to the House. The nature and scale of the problem has increased enormously since those exchanges took place. I ask the House to come to grips with reality. If the appeals procedure is to make any impact, it must be thorough. If it is not thorough, it is not convincing. If it is thorough, it will take time. If it takes time, delay will often decide the issue in practice, and the House should realise that.

Whether those concerned are detained—we have little enough accommodation for this purpose—or whether they are temporarily admitted with the risk that they will evade the control—whatever happens to them while they wait—it will in practice become increasingly difficult as days pass to send them away. In effect, the delay dictates the decision. For example, recently the Indian authorities refused to accept back some 17 Tamils originating in Sri Lanka who spent some time in India and then came to the United Kingdom. Their applications for asylum were refused and India refused to take them back on the ground that they had spent longer in the United Kingdom than in India. That is an example of what I am describing.

The experience of other countries strongly suggests that a formal right of appeal before removal would lead to a substantial increase in unfounded applications. Anyone who wishes to follow that intellectual path should first have a word with the Canadian authorities. More than 28,000 people were refused at our ports last year and it would take only a small proportion of those to claim asylum—that would be an obvious move for them, if there were an independent right of appeal—to overwhelm any appeals system. Therefore, I would not favour such a system if we are seriously concerned to protect the controls.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The Home Secretary has just referred to accommodation. Does he recall that within hours of the Zeebrugge disaster it was leaked that the Home Office was proposing to have a ferry moored off the coast of Weymouth for detention purposes? Clearly, that was a proposal to return to prison hulks. Will he take this opportunity to say that the Home Office had no intention to proceed along that path and that that proposal has been cancelled?

Mr. Hurd: No, I will not take any such opportunity. We are extremely short of suitable accommodation for detention. There is a good deal of public criticism of occasions such as the present one, when we use hotels for people under detention. That is not satisfactory. Nor is it satisfactory that such people should go to prisons because they have not been convicted of any crime. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman was one who criticised us last autumn when, during the visa problem, some people were imprisoned. We need more accommodation specifically designed for detention. Whether we can reach an agreement with Sealink about a particular vessel I do not yet know. We have not yet reached a decision. But, providing that the accommodation is of the right quality, there is no reason why that should not be a better alternative to the present position.

As the House knows, part of our response since 1983 has been a limited arrangement involving reference to UKIAS. Although, for the reason I have stated, events make it impossible to continue the arrangement in its present form, we have no intention to sweep it away without replacement. We intend that there should be discussions with UKIAS about how the present arrangements should be revised. It would be an excellent idea if those discussions also involved the United Kingdom representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. There should be a continuing role for UKIAS, but, as I said on 3 March, I do not believe in the expectation that such referrals will be automatic.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Hurd: I shall not give way again to the hon. Gentleman. I have already done so and I should draw my remarks to a close.

Whatever fresh arrangements are devised, it is unnecessary and undesirable for Heathrow to remain the main place at which large numbers of undocumented people make claims for asylum, yet in recent years the number of asylum applications at the ports has grown from about 400 in 1984 to about 1,850 in 1985, swollen by the arrival of Sri Lankans before visas were introduced. Very few have been found to be eligible as refugees under the 1951 convention. It is likely that some of that small number did not have the documents required by this legislation, but it certainly does not follow that this country was the only, or even the right, source of refuge for them or that they could not have made proper arrangements before their arrival here.

This Bill seeks to ensure that people abide by the requirements, particularly the visa requirements, which have been approved by Parliament. It puts no new requirements on any traveller. The same number of people will remain subject to immigration control, the same number will be required to produce valid documents, and the same number will require valid visas. It is surely sensible government to move in a measured and determined way quickly to repair the gap which has appeared in our control. We cannot have an orderly system of control without such action. I am sure that we should keep our system of operating orderly arrangements for asylum in the interests of all genuine refugees.

This legislation is necessary, considered and well constructed. There are ample precedents for it in other countries not normally regarded as illiberal — New Zealand, the United States, West Germany and Canada. It is already proving to be an effective deterrent here. Carriers have already started to check more carefully and responsibly the papers presented to them by their passengers who want to come here. In the first week of March, when the provisions came into operation, there were only 12 asylum applications from those arriving at the ports, compared with an average of about 60 a week in the previous three months. Most of these people would not have had valid visas. If the improvement continues, this short Bill will be doing its work.

The Bill is not ill considered or hasty. It is an essential and timely response to the new problem faced by our immigration control. We have accepted the responsibility to act when it is necessary to ensure that the control operates as Parliament intended. I believe that we have the support of the majority of the House and the overwhelming majority of people outside in that contention. What I hope will result is a better service for the ordinary passenger, greater assurance that immigration problems can be considered calmly and in advance, and a decent, humane and orderly consideration of genuine asylum applications, free from the threat of exploitation and abuse. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"this House, while condemning racketeers out to exploit for financial gain the vulnerability of people seeking to leave their own country for another in circumstances where they regard themselves as under threat, declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which, drafted in haste, fails to take account of the predicament of genuine refugees from dictatorial or authoritarian regimes who may not be able to acquire the necessary travel documents."

The Bill arises out of the case of the 64 Tamils who arrived at Heathrow last month, but I want to emphasise from the start that our attitude is based on much wider considerations than the merits of the Tamils' case. We believe that the Government are profoundly mistaken in seeking to enact what, despite the denial of the Home Secretary, we regard as a hasty and ill-thought-out piece of general legislation in reaction to one episode with which the Government have found it difficult to deal.

I should like to emphasise also, despite the rather snide implications of the Home Secretary, that neither the Bill nor the Labour party's attitude to it relates in any way to the general issue of immigration control. We in the Labour party repeat our commitment to firm immigration control, which should be based on neither racial nor sexual discrimination.

Seldom, however, can a Bill with such wide implications for treatment of would-be refugees seeking asylum in Britain have been based on such invalid assumptions relating to a single case or group of cases.

The background is well known. Last month, a group of 64 Tamils arrived at Heathrow from Bangladesh claiming asylum as refugees, and a speedy decision was taken to remove them. I was contacted by UKIAS and, in turn, I made contact with the Home Secretary's office to ask for a stay of removal while the cases were properly studied.

If my request had been granted, none of the Government's subsequent difficulties with the courts would have arisen. What is more, the outcome would have been exactly the same as has followed the intervention of the courts. My request was rejected, however, and the Government proceeded to take action to remove the Tamils.

When the matter was raised in the House on 17 and 18 February, the Minister of State repeatedly made unequivocal and prejudicial statements about the Tamils' claim to remain. The columns of Hansard are littered with outright statements that the right hon. and learned Gentleman made. I shall quote just one or two, but I could quote many:

"we are satisfied, on the basis of their own accounts given to immigration officers, that they have no claim to refugee status. We are therefore arranging for them to be returned to Bangladesh without delay . . . I have to make it quite plain that they are not refugees, that their claim to refugee status has been examined and found wanting and that the information available to the Government from the British high commission in Colombo gives no reason to suppose that people . . . will be harassed or ill treated . . . it was quite obvious, from the examination carried out by the immigration officers at the port, that the claims made by these people were manifestly bogus." — [Official Report, 17 February 1987; Vol. 110, c. 769-70.]

The right hon. and learned Gentleman made similar statements later in those exchanges and the following day.

Those statements were made after initial interviews which, in many cases, took no more than 20 minutes. As we know, circumstances arose and, following them, an application for judicial review was granted. The Home Secretary was then obliged, first in a letter to UKIAS and then in a statement to the House on 3 March, to disown and repudiate the prejudicial statements of the Minister of State and to agree that the cases of each of the 64 applicants should be re-examined individually. They were not any more "manifestly bogus", but cases which had to be examined individually because there was the most cursory initial examination.

The Secretary of State also said that the cases should be referred to UKIAS. After two weeks of turmoil and confusion, the Government were compelled to do what, if they had heeded my initial request, they could have done sensibly and with good grace.

The Home Secretary was then forced by the Prime Minister, who was in her usual "Somebody has got to be summoned" frame of mind, to take some action—any kind of action—and the result is the Bill that we have before us. We should be clear that the Bill imposes on all airlines a duty to interpret and implement Britain's immigration rules, with the prospect of a £1,000 fine per passenger if they get it wrong.

One hundred and forty nine airlines fly into Britain from at least 246 ports of embarkation. It will now be necessary for officials from all those airlines and all those ports of embarkation to be experts in British immigration law and to implement it faultlessly—something which Britain's own immigration and entry clearance officers are incapable of doing themselves, to judge from the high proportion of successful appeals against their decisions in many countries of origin.

Some of the officials who will be given the role of surrogate immigration officers, or entry clearance officers, will be officials of authoritarian or dictatorial countries. Officials of the KGB involved in the working of Aeroflot will be interpreting and implementing British law, not simply in the case of their own nationals, but in the case of passengers from other countries who have stopped over in Moscow and wish to fly on to London.

Similar duties will be put on shipping officials. The General Council of British Shipping sent me and perhaps other hon. Members a memorandum today about the difficulties that our shipping lines expect to encounter. I shall read it in full because it is a case that the Government must answer and deal with if there are not to be enormous difficulties for shipping lines and their officials. The council says:

"The General Council of British Shipping is seriously concerned at the proposal to impose a penalty of £1,000 on carriers bringing passengers to the United Kingdom whose travel papers are not in order. In particular, they are concerned that this will apply to ferry passengers embarking at European Community or other near European ports.

In order to avoid the penalty, ferry operators will be required to set up a system of examination of passports and visas in a zone from which the passenger cannot depart except to join the ship, provided of course that the country of embarkation is prepared to provide such a zone. The inspectors, who will in many instances be foreign nationals, will require a detailed knowledge of UK Immigration Law and documentation, and of passports world-wide, a greater degree of expertise than can be expected from the type of personnel employed in checking tickets. It seems doubtful that this is what the Government, on consideration, would wish. Its target is much smaller but the operator can only be sure of avoiding such penalties (and indeed others, such as accusations of discrimination) if it examines the documents of day trippers and school parties with the same vigilance as it examines those of persons thought to be attempting to enter illegally.

Quite apart from expense, even if the system could be set up, annoying delays to passengers would appear inevitable. Lord Brabazon of Tara, in the recent debate in the House of Lords, acknowledged the problems of dealing with a large number of people in a short space of time; a detailed passport examination raises even more difficulties."

It continues:

"The whole process would of course be repeated, perhaps two hours later, by the Immigration Officers in the UK. Shipowners know, to their considerable cost, that these are sometimes deceived, but they are the proper persons to decide whether papers are valid. A reporting time of 45 minutes for cars is normal. To be required to examine passports and compare photographs with the physical appearance of perhaps 1,200 passengers, either in cars, coaches or trains, cannot be seen as anything other than an intolerable burden on an industry already facing intense competition. Under the proposed regime, they would have a revising function, the main burden having been placed on the ferry operator who already bears the burden of returning such passengers to the port of embarkation or, in some cases, to distant parts of the world.

In GCBS view, the Bill should not apply to intra-community travel. If the Government cannot accept this, an assurance that the penalties would not be applied in the case of such travel should be sought. This would be compatible with the Community intent to eliminate barriers to intra-community travel."

That is a very serious objection, put up not by people who wish to torpedo immigration policy but by those who will face the practical consequences of the ill-thought-out Bill that the Government are seeking to rush through the House in a few days. Overseas airline and shipping officials will have to become experts in scrutinising documents for possible forgery. Under clause 1(4) carriers are absolved from a possible fine only if the falsity of the document is "reasonably apparent". In other words, the Bill excludes those who have gone to incompetent rather than to accomplished forgers. No doubt this will have a salutary effect on the standards of excellence of forgery in certain countries, and people unable to obtain passports and visas legitimately will become prey to the higher prices commanded by those who can promise to fool airline and shipping officials.

It is not as though British immigration law is simple even for our own officials to interpret. For example, the United States is a non-visa country for visitors, but for those wishing to establish themselves in business or to join relatives in this country visas are required. The same applies to other non-visa countries. How are airlines and other carriers to decide whether a visa trip or a non-visa trip is intended? Are they expected to conduct interrogations?

Conversely, not all nationals of Commonwealth visa countries require visas for every purpose. How will their rights be protected? There are others, not claiming to be refugees, whose interests are also at stake. Last autumn, when visas were imposed for four Commonwealth countries and Pakistan, the Secretary of State in an invidious little passage at the beginning of his speech—designed, as always, to try to make some capital out of the situation—specifically agreed that there might be cases of great emergency in which a passenger might not have time to apply for, let alone obtain, a visa, for instance, on hearing of the sudden mortal illness or death of a relative in this country.

The Home Secretary specifically agreed on procedures to protect the interests of visa nationals in such circumstances. His own guidelines to protect people in such a predicament, as quoted to his hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley), state:

"If the passenger was refused entry because he did not have an entry clearance required under the Immigration Rules action to remove the passenger will only be deferred if at the time of intervention the Member demonstrates that there are exceptional and compelling circumstances (eg recent bereavement or sudden grave illness here in the immediate family). In such cases and in cases of refusal where no entry clearance was required action to remove the passenger will normally be deferred for a period of 12 working days to enable the Member to submit written representations."—[Official Report, 6 November 1986; Vol. 103, c. 540.]

That carefully worked out guideline is now a load of rubbish because the airlines will not carry people who do not have the documents, although the Secretary of State himself admitted that they might have perfectly valid reasons for having failed to obtain them. All those assurances will go by the board because if a person with difficulties of the kind specifically recognised by the

[Mr. Gerald Kaufman]

Secretary of State in November tries to obtain a seat on an aircraft, the airline is likely to turn him down rather than risk a fine under the Bill.

There are also people from visa countries who claim to be exempt from immigration control because they are British citizens by descent and thus, whatever their travel document, do not require a visa to enter the United Kingdom. Will such passengers now have to prove to the airline that they have a British parent and, if so, how? That is why we describe the Bill as ill thought out and oppressive. People whose grounds for not obtaining a visa have been recognised as valid by the Home Secretary will be prevented from travelling because of the fines laid down in the Bill. The Bill must be amended in Committee to take account of all those potential anomalies because some are likely to cause great human hardship or distress.

Even when a person gets through the new barrier with all the documents required by the Secretary of State—either valid or well forged, as the Bill lays down—his claims will have to pass tougher tests without the protections that previously existed. Even if the person's documents are in order, his chance of being accepted as a refugee will be subject to greater hazard in the future.

In the debate on refugees on 31 March 1983, the Minister of State said:

"I believe that there is a strong case for formulating arrangements for the notification of asylum cases to an agency at an early stage when a negative decision is contemplated. The refugee unit at the Home Office will in future give formal notification to the UKIAS refugee councillors of all cases when no other agency or hon. Members has previously intervened and a negative decision has been proposed." —[Official Report, 31 March 1983; Vol. 40, c. 522.]

The Home Secretary has completely abandoned that commitment, made by the Minister of State at a calmer time. The Secretary of State kicked that pledge right out of the field in his announcement on 3 March and in his deplorable and misleading statement today about the Government's response to the Home Affairs Sub-Committee on Race Relations and Immigration.

Despite the statement by the Minister of State in 1983 recognising the strong case for notification and referral, the Home Secretary now says:

"Accordingly, the present arrangements under which my Department refers cases to UKIAS will be revised and I shall be inviting UKIAS to join in discussions to that end . . . and for the avoidance of doubt I must place it on record that in future there will be cases which will not be referred to UKIAS and that therefore applicants for asylum can have no expectation in future that as a result of the arrangement arrived at in 1983 or otherwise there will in their cases be such a reference. Similarly there will be instances in which early removal is necessary in the interests of immigration control and it would not be right for me to defer removal on a Member's seeking to put a stop on the case. It follows also that those who seek to challenge in the courts decisions to refuse asylum cannot expect that they will automatically be allowed to stay here until proceedings are completed." —[Official Report, 3 March 1987; Vol. 111, c. 733.]

The Home Secretary has withdrawn the pledge on reference to UKIAS, withdrawn the right of an hon. Member to put a stop on and withdrawn the opportunity of effective judicial review. That is the effect of his announcement on 3 March. The way in which he has tried to mislead the House is quite deplorable. In withdrawing those three protections he is withdrawing safeguards that his Department told the House and the Select Committee were the proper safeguards against wrongful decisions.

This afternoon the Home Secretary has referred in the most deliberately disingenuous terms to the Home Affairs Sub-Committee's report on refugees and asylum. He certainly acknowledged that the Sub-Committee recommended a right of appeal before removal for those who sought asylum on arrival at a port of entry in the United Kingdom. I noted the Home Secretary's words carefully. He said that his predecessor had spelt out in measured terms why he would not accept that appeal recommendation.

What were the measured terms that the Home Secretary thought he could get away with by describing them as such this afternoon? What did the Government reply to the report? They rejected the appeal proposal because they said that for this category of applicants there were other safeguards—representations by hon. Members, judicial review and the UKIAS referral procedure. The Government replied:

"The referral system is providing an effective safeguard and a satisfactory substitute for formal appeal rights . . . In practice . . . the referral procedure is providing a broader safeguard than a formal appeal to the immigration appellate authorities."

The Sub-Committee on Race Relations and Immigration proposed a right of appeal. The Home Office rejected that because it said that there was a right of reference to UKIAS, a stop right of Members of Parliament and a right of judicial review. The Home Secretary withdrew all three rights on 3 March and now has the effrontery to say that he still rejects the right of appeal even though he has taken away the safeguards that his Department said were a valid substitute for appeal. That is a shoddy way in which to try to mislead the House, and I hope that he is thoroughly ashamed of himself. I did not think that I could feel so strongly about anything that the Secretary of State said. I have considerable personal respect for him, but I was horrified to hear how he dealt with this issue this afternoon.

The Home Secretary should think again about the matter. Having relied for a period on those three safeguards and having now rejected them, the Government should introduce the right of appeal before removal as recommended by the Sub-Committee on Race Relations and Immigration.

Another problem relates to refugees who wish to claim asylum but will never get here because the airlines and other carriers will not take the risk of carrying them. On 3 March the Home Secretary told the House:

"The Government remain fully committed to their obligations under the United Nations 1951 Convention to genuine refugees as defined in that Convention. The decisions on individual cases which I make as Home Secretary will respect that obligation."—[Official Report, 3 March 1987; Vol. 111, c. 733.]

Of course, the Home Secretary is bound to say that because he is bound by the immigration rules. Those rules state:

"Where a person is a refugee full account is to be taken of the provisions of the convention and protocol relating to the status of refugees."

Article 31 of the United Nations convention on refugees says:

"The Contracting States shall not impose penalties, on account of their illegal entry or presence, on refugees who, coming from a territory where their life or freedom was threatened in the sense of Article 1, enter or are present in their territory without authorisation, provided they present themselves without delay to the authorities and show good cause for their illegal entry or presence."

I acknowledge immediately that that would not apply to the current case of the Tamils because they did not come directly from Sri Lanka, but our attitude to the Bill is not governed by that case. I said that at the beginning of my speech, and it is irrefutable that the Bill violates that paragraph of the convention. The Bill breaks the Home Secretary's undertaking of 3 March, because the convention states:

"The Contracting States shall not impose penalties . . . on refugees who . . . enter or are present in their territory without authorisation, provided they present themselves without delay to the authorities and show good cause for their illegal entry or presence."

But, of course, the £1,000 fine is a penalty and the Government are consequently violating the convention.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): No.

Mr. Kaufman: We do not know whether they are refugees until we find out. The Minister is suggesting that none of them is a refugee, but that is manifestly bogus.

Mr. Waddington: The right hon. Gentleman has not yet realised that the penalty of £1,000 is imposed on the carrier, not the person of refugee status.

Mr. Kaufman: That was a clever little interruption. The person seeking refugee status is penalised by the penalty on the carrier, of course. It was the kind of remark that the right hon. and learned Gentleman could get away with in the courts as a nice little joke to the judge, but it does not help people who are fleeing in fear of their lives.

Mr. Waddington: That is silly.

Mr. Kaufman: No, it is not silly. The right hon. and learned Gentleman made some prejudicial remarks about people who lost their lives as a result of the penalties that he championed so strongly.

Mr. Corbyn: Is it not right that of the 58 cases that the Minister of State attempted to decide in advance of the court decision, not one of the individuals concerned could have entered this country had the Bill been law at that time?

Mr. Kaufman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The Minister of State prejudged the cases by saying that they were manifestly bogus, whereas the court declared that they were not manifestly bogus. The Home Secretary is now having to look at every individual case himself. The Minister of State is completely wrong and my hon. Friend is right.

What is more, the Bill violates the statement of the position on refugee procedures in the Home Office memorandum of 17 December 1984, which stated:

"A valid claim for asylum overrides the normal requirements of immigration control that other immigrants must satisfy in order to enter or remain here."

Nothing can be plainer than that Home Office commitment and nothing can be plainer than the Home Secretary's breach of it in the Bill. The Bill is posited on the assumption that a would-be refugee would have no difficulty in obtaining a visa from the British post in his country of origin. The idea is laughable. Can hon. Members envisage the position? Someone is on the run from the secret police in an eastern European country or another visa country. He breaks off from his escape or emerges from his cover, strolls into the British mission, applies for and obtains a visa in a few minutes without difficulty or delay, and then resumes his escape.

Under the United Nations convention, a person seeking a visa in his own country cannot be defined as a refugee. The convention defines as refugees

"persons who fulfil the conditions of paragraph 2 of this section."

Paragraph 2 states:

"As a result of events occurring before 1 January 1951 and owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence as a result of such events, is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to return to it."

On 6 March, the Minister of State summed up perfectly for us the position of Jews and others under the German Nazis, when he said:

"In 1938 the British Government imposed a visa requirement on Germans and Austrians. From that time onwards, Germans and Austrians fleeing from Nazi persecution came here with visas, having satisfied the British authorities that they had the wherewithal, or that they had people here who were prepared to look after them." — [Official Report, 6 March 1987; Vol. 111, c. 1209-10.]

That, he implied smugly, was that. The fact is that for many people that was that. Nine days ago in Glasgow, a Jewish woman told me how, in the 1930s, she had luckily obtained a visa and got away to Britain. Her parents were unable to obtain a visa and did not get away. They were victims of the same nice, tidy smugness as would penalise those who suffer from this Bill and from the same contemptible complacency of today's Home Office Ministers nearly half a century on.

The position could be the same even with passports. Indeed, the demand that airlines should always turn away passengers without passports conflicts with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, which envisages that the absence of a passport will be the norm, not the exception, for genuine refugees.

The United Nations handbook on procedures states:

"It has sometimes been claimed that possession of a passport signified that the issuing authorities do not intend to persecute the holder, for otherwise they would not have issued a passport to him."

That is how the commission approaches the matter, as it confirmed to me only today. The trouble is that, under the Bill, such a person would not get here for his or or her case to be considered on its merits. That person would not get here because in the Bill the Home Secretary hands over his obligations on refugees under the United Nations convention to foreign airlines and foreign shipping companies, including Aeroflot, South African Airways and the rest.

The least that the Government could do would be to amend the Bill so that the carrier will be absolved from the fine in respect of any person without proper documents who is subsequently accepted as a bona fide asylum seeker. That would not solve the problem, but it would ease it.

Even countries which the Home Secretary cited in support of his measure provide safeguards. Australia does not fine airlines where the cases of passengers are referred to the independent refugee determination committee, whatever the outcome of the case, so let not the Home Secretary cite Australia without providing a similar safeguard. Denmark does not fine airlines if a passenger faces return to a country where he or she would not be safe, so let not the Home Secretary cite Denmark in his support.

It is sometimes claimed that Britain has an outstanding record on acceptance of refugeees. There have been times when that record has been outstanding, when it has enhanced our reputation for humanity in the eyes of the world. But there have been other times, as when refugees from Hitler were excluded from this country when they could have been saved, when our reputation has been less glorious. Sadly, the Bill takes us into one of those less glorious times.

Ministers will not care. They have abandoned any standards of decency on this matter, at any rate until the general election is over. The Bill is not about keeping out a few bedraggled victims of seedy racketeers—racketeers whose trade in human flesh we all condemn. The Bill is about having a shoddy little debate in which racism can be stirred up in the hope of winning a few votes. At every general election, Tory Members cannot resist playing the race card. They are doing it again now, and it is especially lamentable that this Home Secretary, of whom people expected better, should have lent himself to this shabby manoeuvre.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is coming to the end of his speech, but since he told us that he would be unable to stay until the end of the debate, perhaps he will allow me to say this. I have listened with great care to his speech, but he has not addressed what I regard as the nub of the matter, which has nothing to do with elections or the race card. It is simply that a tradition of granting political asylum, as embodied in the United Nations convention, is in danger of being overwhelmed right across Europe by the sheer scale of applicants. Denmark has gone much further than we propose, and is declining to entertain applications for asylum from people who come via a third country. That alters the entire aspect, but the right hon. Gentleman has not tackled it yet.

Mr. Kaufman: I acknowledge that there is a problem — [Interruption.] The way in which Conservative Members leer and giggle about these matters is one of the most nauseating aspects of their approach to the issue. This is the most despicable parliamentary Conservative party that I have encountered during the past 17 years. When I mentioned Shcharansky in a previous debate, one hon. Member was quoted in Hansard as saying that it would be right to keep him out of the country, which shows the ugly undercurrent among Conservative Members.

Mr. Waddington: There is no need to be so unpleasant.

Mr. Kaufman: Not as unpleasant as the right hon. and learned Gentleman is, without effort.

Mr. Waddington: Nasty.

Mr. Kaufman: However hard I may try to be nasty, I could not succeed as effortlessly as the right hon. and learned Gentleman does.

I agree with the Home Secretary that there is a problem. He acknowledged that the problem is not as great as it is for several other countries, although it is possible that, as other countries deal with their problems, it may grow in Britain. But why, instead of slamming down a little Bill overnight, did not the Home Secretary go to the UKIAS or to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees? Why did he not come to us and say, "Let us sit down and try to find a solution to the problem as quickly as possible."? But he did not want to do that. The reason is that Conservative Members glory in and are enjoying the Bill, because they believe that it is a way of playing the race card once again.

The Home Secretary teaches us the lesson that we should have learnt by now: that in the end Conservative Members, liberals or hard-liners, wets or drys, are all the same. Let them make the most of this electorally—I am sure that they will. If any of them still have consciences, let them live with them.

5.18 pm

Mr. Timothy Raison (Aylesbury): It is something that in his closing, intemperate remarks the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) acknowledged that there is a problem to be faced, and of course there is a serious and very difficult problem. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said, the Bill is not exclusively concerned with refugees. However, the background to the Bill is the problem of refugees, which is inescapably growing, and we must give a lot of thought to ways of tackling it.

Behind it all lies the spread of civil wars and other wars, and tyrannical regimes. There is also the problem of economic refugees—people who wish to flee from their country, not because they are being actively persecuted, but because the regime in which they live is, to put it mildly, increasingly distasteful and hostile. There is also the problem of whether we are right to go down the path of orderly departure, to which my right hon. Friend referred. I have always been a little anxious about this. I see why it was introduced for Vietnam, and for Chile before that but it has about it something of the flavour of almost sanctioning the entitlement of Governments to persecute their citizens. We must think about that hard and carefully.

It is right that we should be discussing these matters with our European partners, and it is to be welcomed that the newish United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Mr. Hocké, should be showing clearly that he is prepared to ask fundamental questions. As it happens, he has asked me to go to a seminar or conference that is to take place shortly to talk about these things, and we have to face some important and basic questions.

We know that the pressure of intense migration has led to the introduction of visas for India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Nigeria and Ghana. In the case of Sri Lanka and the Tamils essentially it was the refugee problem that caused that to come about. Now we have the Bill, which is designed to strengthen the effect of the visa system to control the surge that would take place if we did not take steps to prevent it.

I do not particularly object—I never have—to the idea that carriers should bear the cost of taking back those who are refused entry, nor do I object to the visa system as a method of controlling the surge. I do not think that the principle of the Bill is necessarily unreasonable, although the practicalities of it will have to be examined carefully in Committee. However, I am deeply concerned that we should not weaken our traditional commitment to do our share in helping refugees. I hope that the Government and my right hon. Friend will be able to give reassurances on two aspects of the policy that goes alongside the Bill. We must look at the Bill in conjunction with the general system for handling refugees when they appeal to us to take them in.

The first of these questions is about access to this country. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made it clear that in the past the majority of refugees accepted here have been people who have been here already—students, and others, for example, whose circumstances have changed because of what has been happening in their home countries. Some refugees will certainly try to escape here directly, and we recognise certain groups as having particular claims on us, notably through family connections. We recognise that they have a certain amount of entitlement to take refuge in this country and to come here to do so.

However, we need some assurance about how far in practice genuine potential refugees will will be able to secure visas in the countries of their origin. Will they be able to go to the British posts in their country? This point was raised by the right hon. Member for Gorton. Will that work effectively? Will the fact that they are still in their own country allow them to be considered for refugee status? After all, the 1951 convention defining refugee status talks of the refugee being "outside the country of his nationality".

In Sri Lanka, for example, how many people are reaching our post in Colombo, or perhaps some other way of getting in touch with our authorities and applying for a visa on refugee grounds and then succeeding in getting one? We need to know the answers. I recognise that the answers can relate only to the recent period because until not long ago, Sri Lankans were able to come here to claim status when they arrived here. We want to know whether it is possible, in practice, for such people to work their way to Colombo, get in an application for refugee status, and if so how it is dealt with, particularly in the light of the point that I have just made about the definition of the status of the refugee.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I can answer the right hon. Gentleman's question. I have here a letter from the British high commission in Colombo, dated 10 July 1986, to an applicant. It says:

"You have applied for entry clearance with a view to admission to the United Kingdom as a refugee but there is no provision in the immigration rules for entry clearance to be granted for this purpose."

Mr. Raison: The answer may be that he has to apply for entry to the United Kingdom for consideration for refugee status. That may be the procedure. I should like to hear from my right hon. and learned Friend when he winds up the debate how the procedure works, because that is an important matter.

Today I received an answer to a parliamentary question which makes it clear that the proportion of those seeking refugee status applying outside the United Kingdom has in the past been small. In the year October 1985 to September 1986 the number of applicants outsidr the United Kingdom was 50, of whom 30 were granted refugee status, 10 were refused asylum but granted leave to remain on exceptional grounds, and 10 were refused asylum. That was a small number, but under the new system it may increase. We need to know where we are.

My second major concern is what happens to would-be refugees if they intend to get here by one means or another. This is very much the issue recently raised by the affair of the Tamils. It is true that the numbers likely to do so will, in all probability, be much reduced both by the introduction of visas and by the consequences of the Bill, but it is also true that refugees, who may be desperate, find ways to travel and get here, as do their rather more bogus counterparts, and this is the problem that we have to face. People will continue to turn up at our ports and it is important that we should think carefully about what they do when they get here. Up to now, as the parliamentary answer to which I have just referred shows, a significant number of those allowed to stay have been people who have applied at the ports rather than in their country of origin.

It is here that I am concerned about the possibility of erosion of the safeguards that we have established. The convention does not require any kind of appeal system. We are party to the consensus of the executive committee of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, which called for a system of formal reconsideration of a refusal at the port of entry. We have operated that since my right hon. Friend made his announcement in 1983.

We have responded by three particular means, which were mentioned by the right hon. Member for Gorton. One is intervention by UKIAS. The second is Members' representations, and the third is judicial review. All those would happen before removal. The system put forward by my right hon. Friend was accepted by the protection division of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees as an adequate way to deal with the problem.

The question now is that will happen to the system. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in his statement of 3 March, clearly foreshadowed changes that could be significant. The right hon. Member for Gorton has just quoted the passage to which I would have referred, so I shall not repeat it. However, it is important to consider carefully what my right hon. Friend said then, and I hope that he will think carefully, as I know he will, about the remarks made during the debate today about the system. We want to know rather more precisely what it is that my right hon. Friend has in mind. I cannot say whether my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State will be able to spell that out, but I should welcome such a response. I accept that there should be proper consultation with the UNHCR and UKIAS. I hope that by the time we have considered the Bill in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading we will have a clear idea of exactly what is proposed in place of the system agreed in 1983.

I recognise, as do most hon. Members if they are honest, that there is a genuine problem of abuse, but we know that it is difficult to be sure of the facts. The courts have said that entry by false means does not in itself lead to the conclusion that a person is not a refugee. A person may come here by wangling, but that does not take away from the fact that he is a genuine refugee. The High Court has made that clear and we should all accept it.

The reports about the 64 Tamils, who in a sense are at the heart of the controversy, show that a substantial number fall into either the category of people who would be expected to be granted refugee status or the category of people who are likely to be given permission to remain here under the discretionary power. Until we know the outcome of these cases it is not possible for me to know the answers, but there are signs that a number of the Tamils are people who, in normal circumstances, would be allowed to stay for one reason or another. If that is so, no doubt they will be allowed to stay when the process of examination has been completed.

I ask my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to retain some way of reconsidering refusal of entry to possibly bogus applicants before removal. I should be anxious about a system which firmly stated that immigration officers on their own, and without any reconsideration, can decide that certain people have to return home immediately. If the Bill is passed, as I expect it will be, the problem of pressure is bound to decline, but we should not get ourselves into a position that is out of line with the UNHCR executive committee's resolutions. We should find a way of adhering to them.

There is a real problem with the applicant who abuses the system. I do not press for a formal appeal system to operate within this country in cases of abuse or when people arrive here without visas, and I do not believe that we should introduce a system providing for a fully fledged formal legal appeal, but I press for the present system, as set out in 1983, essentially to remain in being for most people, with the possibility of using the three alternative approaches that I have mentioned.

There should be some way of rapidly considering the cases of those whom the immigration service feels are bogus entrants. I have in mind a system of notifying representatives of UKIAS or of the UNHCR in this country that Britain proposes immediately to send back someone because we think that he is applying on completely bogus grounds. That would at least enable some sort of discussion to take place with the representatives of the UNHCR or of UKIAS about the case and, if they accepted that the applicant was bogus, he would immediately be removed. If the UNHCR or the UKIAS wanted to contest the case, there would be a clear obligation on them to use a mechanism that would operate rapidly.

It would be wrong to set up a mechanism that would enable people to remain in this country indefinitely and to start playing the all too familiar game of operating the immigration rules when there is no genuine ground for doing so.

I would not favour accepting a system whereby Members of Parliament were able to weigh in on the process. There should be a swift, effective way of considering these cases. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will be willing to consider this proposal carefully.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler), the Chairman of the Race Relations and Immigration Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, is present. I take it that he will take part in the debate. I am not certain exactly what the Select Committee recommended in its report. Who is better placed to tell us than my hon. Friend? It is not entirely evident that the Select Committee was talking about a fully fledged system of appeal. It talked about the way in which the abuse problem could be prolonged by some kind of appeal system. In paragraph 105 the Select Committee stated:

"We recommend that the Home Office decide in principle to extend the right of appeal to all asylum applicants, and, for types of case where the applicant currently lacks a right of appeal exercisable within the UK, to establish procedures by which leave to remain is withheld in obviously bogus cases, and by which such refusals of leave can be rapidly reviewed if appealed against; and that it set up a working party to determine how such procedures would operate."

The Select Committee says that the right of appeal should be extended to all asylum applicants, but it does not specifically say that that should happen in this country before removal. I am not sure what the Committee means. The Select Committee talks also about refusals of need being "rapidly reviewed" if appealed against. I do not know whether by "rapidly reviewed" the Committee means the formal appeal process, or whether it means something much more akin to the process that I have described. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North will explain what the Committee had in mind.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will think carefully about the points that I have made. If he accepts my proposal that there should be a quickfire method of dealing with the bogus or the disputed cases, that might meet with the acquiescence of the UNHCR. I dare say that it would prefer something more, but I think that a system could be set up that would command sufficiently broad assent to work, and we would then be able to say that we have not back-tracked from the type of principle for dealing with refugees which I think we have generally adopted. What I have said is parallel to the Bill rather than concerned with its substance. I hope that it will be possible to find a satisfactory and honourable way of resolving this difficult problem.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I wish to follow the civilised remarks of the right hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison)——

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not a grave discourtesy to you, Sir, and to Parliament that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who opened for the Opposition, should find more pressing business outside Parliament than to listen to the debate, especially after the sort of speech that he offered us?

Mr. Meadowcroft rose——

Mr. Kaufman: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. First, I am doing no more than the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done on a number of occasions. Secondly, I did notify the Home Secretary. Thirdly, it will be acknowledged that the Bill came up suddenly and one was not able to plan one's arrangements accordingly. Fourthly, the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) knows very well that whatever my other shortcomings—of which I am sure he is fully appraised and able to describe at length—one of the things that I do not generally do is dodge fire.

Mr. Meadowcroft rose——

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it not be in order for the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who is now leaving the Chamber, to apologise to my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) inasmuch as everything that the right hon. Gentleman accused Conservative Members of feeling and saying was certainly not borne out by my right hon. Friend's speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I call Mr. Meadowcroft.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I was about to say that I was pleased to be able to take up the civilised comments of the right hon. Member for Aylesbury and to commend 90 per cent. of the speech of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who, I believe, spoke in good faith. I am only sorry that his measured terms were undermined by his final comments. In dealing with these issues there is nothing to be gained by endeavouring to divine ulterior motives. Nothing annoys me more than those who try to use a crystal ball, as it were, to determine the meaning and intent behind my comments. By the same token it does no good to try to impute motives to others. Many of the comments that we make on sensitive issues such as the one before us give the appearance that something additional is meant, but to say that somebody has said something deliberately for that purpose is unfair. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman went over the top, and that was of no value to the debate.

No one on either side of the House has a monopoly of virtue or an exclusivity of compassion. The right hon. Member for Gorton, who, sadly, has had to leave the debate, should have had drawn to his attention the position of the Kenya Asians in 1968. Promises had been made and it may well have been that people were under stress in Kenya. The Kenya Asians then found that the promises that had been made to them were not kept by the then Labour Government. It seems that no one is beyond reproach.

My complaint about the Bill is that the Government are seeking to follow their Back Benchers instead of endeavouring to lead and initiate. It is serious that at this stage in the Parliament the Government are seeking to placate the opinion of Conservative Back Benchers. I have a particular moment in mind. On 5 March, during Home Office questions, I asked the Minister of State whether he believed that the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service, or the British Refugee Council, would connive in the irregular entry of immigrants. The Minister of State dodged around, as it were, without saying yes or no, and during that time there were a number of cries from Conservative Back Benchers to the effect that they believed that UKIAS would behave in that way. That is a clue that explains why the Bill has been introduced.

The Home Secretary said that the Bill was sparked off by the Tamil case but that it had wider connections than that. In tacking it on to one issue, such as the Tamils, there is the problem of retrospection. There are great dangers in that course. Airlines and shipping lines can hardly be expected to know of the debates that we are to have in this place. They are certainly not to know of the debates that will take place in Committee. They will not know what is in our minds when it comes to the interpretation of what appears to be a valid passport. These are sensitive issues and it is of concern that the Bill will be retrospective.

I followed the argument of the right hon. Member for Aylesbury about the Vietnamese refugees. His concern suggested that international agreement to take refugees amounted almost to tacit assent to the repressive actions in their countries. This is not the same problem as is faced by those who seek to placate terrorism. Where entrenched and clearly ideological or racist action is taking place within a country that provokes the sort of despair that leads people to take to sea in open boats, the least that the international community can do is to come to terms with reality and to ascertain whether there is some way of persuading individual countries to accept their fair share of the refugee problem.

If the issue goes wider than the Tamils who arrived at Heathrow, one of the Government's arguments must be questioned. The Government contend that refugees can go to a neighbouring country and obtain documents, but not all countries are signatories to the United Nations convention. There may be neighbouring countries to a dispute where assent to human rights and human international conventions is far from the level and depth that we would wish in Britain. That would make it difficult for the Government to say to refugees that they should go to a neighbouring country.

If all countries took the same action as the Government are endeavouring to take by means of the Bill, how can a refugee travel? If all shipping lines and airlines found themselves facing a potential fine of £1,000 and if someone were found to be travelling without documents or with obviously forged documents, the result would be that no one would be able to travel to this country or even to a neighbouring country. If every country took the same line as ourselves, there would be no means of travelling in an emergency in the way that people are forced to do when fleeing from terror. To say that we shall take unilateral action despite what might happen elsewhere, and to excuse doing so on the ground that someone can travel easily to another country and then travel on properly with documents, seems to go against the spirit of the international attitude that we should advance. If we do not play our part in coping with the problems of the world's refugees, how can we expect others to do so?

In some instances it is unreal to expect refugees to travel in safety to a British embassy or high commission. There are places where those entering or leaving a British embassy will be watched. There are places where people will not feel safe to visit the embassy even if they are safe in doing so. In many instances the belief in terror matters rather more than the terror itself. All hon. Members are familiar with that attitude from dealing with their case work. In the light of events in the last few days in India, it seems that Tamils would not necessarily be safe in attending an embassy or high commission there or elsewhere.

There is a great need for some form of referral system. The Minister of State wanted to return 58 Tamils on 17 February. No doubt he would have wanted to return 64——

Mr. Hanley: When the 58 Tamils were stopped at Heathrow or threatened with deportation, one of them announced on the television news that he had not applied for a visa in Colombo because the British high commission was "ringed with troops". The British high commissioner has since said that there was only one policeman outside the high commission to his knowledge. Are we not in danger of accepting some slightly exaggerated statements?

Mr. Meadowcroft: I appreciate that argument. It is not my argument that all the 64 or 58 were genuine. I am saying that some of them may have been genuine. It appears now that some of them are regarded as genuine. It may be that circumstances were exaggerated for the sake of individual cases, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that there is no way of testing the genuineness and the validity of a case without the possibility of referral; otherwise the issue will rest entirely on the judgment of one official.

The Minister of State has told the House that he believed that all the Tamils were involved in a racket based in Malaysia. It has transpired, however, that the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, through his representative in London, has said categorically that a number, perhaps a minority, are genuine refugees. If the Minister had had his way there would have been no referral. So strong was his belief in his case that he was not prepared to refer it to outside inspection. If he was so confident of his case, surely he could have referred it to an outside body such as UKIAS for inspection. If his case had been weak, he would not have dared to refer it. Now that it has transpired that a minority of the Tamils are genuine refugees, the case for ceasing to refer individuals to UKIAS in future has been fatally undermined.

The Sub-Committee on Race Relations and Immigration said that a formal appeal system was not needed because of the availability of referral and of Members' representations. That has now been called in doubt however, because various provisions have been set aside. Surely fairness and justice demands some measure of appeal. There is a belief in the rule of law that runs throughout the House and one that Conservative Members frequently talk about. Confidence in the judiciary, the courts and the legal process will not be undermined because there are appeals and because appeals occasionally overturn the original finding. No one claims that appeals are fatally flawing our system of justice. Appeals are accepted as the norm, and that is why we have appeals built into the general system. Surely we cannot accept the appeal system within our ordinary legal processes without accepting that it should be available to refugees.

Mr. Hurd: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that if we took his advice we would run a serious risk that anyone arriving at our ports for settlement or for any other purpose would soon realise that if he said, "I want to be treated as a refugee," he would be here in practice for quite a long time? That is the problem that the Germans have had to face, and it has become a serious problem for them.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I appreciate the Home Secretary's point, but my argument is that we have to resolve the problem by international rather than unilateral action. If we take unilateral action, it simply means that other countries will take the same action, and we shall be left with no way of solving the problem. Refugees may well still be refugees. Unless a process of determining that is adopted, and accepted as fair, we shall not be resolving the problem; we shall simply be hiding it.

I hope that I am not irking the Home Secretary, as he said earlier that I was. I am sorry if my rather warm remarks on 3 March irked him, but perhaps it was right for them to do so if that expressed some of the feelings of hon. Members about the treatment directed at people in the most vulnerable circumstances.

Perhaps that is the difficulty. I accept that in different circumstances, when we are not dealing precisely with the refugee problem, there may be a good reason to have a debate about the whole issue of immigration and the status of people who should be entitled to come here. However you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would certainly soon be shouting for order if I endeavoured to set out the policy on such cases.

The problem is that every time the Government introduce new legislation or orders to deal with immigration, the parameters of the debate are changed. It then becomes impossible to discuss who should be allowed to come to the country and who should not as if that had not happened. To take it to extremes, no party in this House can debate what immigration policy should be as if nothing had happened since 1962. The difficulty is that every incoming Government must accept the rules and regulations as they are at that time and try to work backwards or forwards from them, or simply take them on board. The difficulty is that it changes all the time. Perhaps that is why no Labour Government ever repealed any of the Acts that they voted against in the first place—because the circumstances had changed. Once an artificial barrier has been erected, to take it away causes further difficulties.

If the Home Secretary is right, there may be more refugees genuinely seeking to get out of countries. The problem may be not that more people are trying to fool the system and to enter the country irregularly, but simply that there is an increase in genuine refugees. If that is so, we must have a procedure with which to determine whether they are genuine.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Has the hon. Gentleman reflected on what controls should be imposed, or is there to be an open-ended commitment, regardless of the number of people who may wish to enter the United Kingdom?

Mr. Meadowcroft: Of course I have reflected on that. I have had discussions with the United Nations High Commission representative in London, and with other agencies. I concluded that we must reach an international settlement that takes on board the existing position. That means that we must deal with the Tamils specifically, as we dealt with the Vietnamese and the Ugandan Asians. If that gives us some breathing space to look at the broader issue—for instance, whether UKIAS can deal with more referrals—it must be done. However, I do not believe that we should use the general issue of immigration to undermine the refugee principle. That would do despite to people in an especially vulnerable position.

I worry about the other side of the coin for Conservative Members. Whereas they may accuse the Opposition of wanting to ease immigration generally, the difficulty for Conservative Members is that if pride in colonial heritage and in the Commonwealth is uppermost in their minds, that inevitably increases the desire of those in danger, or believing themselves to be in danger, within the Commonwealth to come to this country. Because there has been immigration of people whose families are now threatened, that will increase people's desire to come to this country. It would be hiding from that fact, and extremely dangerous, to say, "Because we have taken so many people and the country is overcrowded, we cannot do so in future."

Hon. Members on both sides of the House would not be here if it had not been for provisions of refugee legislation in the past. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki) has a background of being in the Ukraine, and his family had to suffer tremendous repression. The right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) comes from a family who entered this country as refugees, and he lost a member of his family because of Hitler. Other people in the House and outside it have come from that background.

The Home Secretary mentioned Mr. Shcharansky. People of note get out in ones and twos, but they have papers because the Soviet Government have allowed it. But that would not cover someone attending a scientific conference or a sporting or artistic event who managed to abscond and boarded an aeroplane or ship. They would not be carrying papers allowed to them by the Soviet Union. Such people cannot obtain the documents that our Government require. But Conservative Members will probably feel more sympathetic towards such cases than towards some that we are seeing now.

Mr. Waddington: My right hon. Friend's point was that those fortunate enough to have left the Soviet Union have left as a result of being granted an exit visa by the Soviet authorities and an entry visa to come into this country. It is difficult to imagine circumstances in which anyone in Russia has been lucky enough to get to an aeroplane, or anywhere near an airport. Mr. Shcharansky walked from East Germany into West Germany. In the other case quoted by my right hon. Friend, Britain had granted a visa after the Soviet authorities had granted an exit visa.

Mr. Meadowcroft: There have been cases in which people have been given asylum after absconding from other events.

Mr. Waddington: If someone has come here to attend another event, what bearing has that on this carrier legislation? That person would have an exit visa from, for instance, the Soviet Union to come here as a visitor for that event.

Mr. Meadowcroft: He might well have gone to a third country, from which he would have no exit visa. He would have only a visa for that other country, and would not be able to travel any further.

The crucial point is that such issues, whether or not they are popular, often depend on international consensus. It worries me that Conservative Members are upsetting that consensus on a very serious and delicate issue. The Home Secretary said that he believed that his proposals were supported by a majority of hon. Members, and by an overwhelming majority outside the House. That may be true, but with some issues that should by no means be an overriding concern. We should not set public opinion aside lightly, but some issues, although they are important to a relatively small number of people, are crucial to those individuals. We should try to do what is right: we should maintain the international conventions, and treat people with fairness and justice. I do not believe that this legislation goes anywhere near that.

5.59 pm

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I assure the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) that the United Kingdom has always adopted a generous and liberal policy towards those seeking asylum. That is still true today. I know from my work as Chairman of the Race Relations and Immigration Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Home Affairs that by comparison with any other country we can be proud of our record of support for the United Nations convention. Not one Socialist East-bloc country has signed the convention, whereas we were among the first to accede to it, and since our accession in 1967 we have been scrupulous in its observance.

I know from my work in and contact with the Western democracies in Europe and North America that there is a serious and growing problem of immigration from so-called Third world countries and others. That is the nub of this issue. It is perfectly understandable that people in over-populated and impoverished countries — where often there is poor government, bad management and no economic prospects — will seek the advantages of the affluent West. No one could have more sympathy than I and, I suspect, most hon. Members, have with that ambition, but the fact remains that it is impossible for the United Kingdom — indeed, any Western country — to allow in a steady and persistent influx of persons from other countries.

In recent years, the United States, Canada and all the EEC countries have had to consider ways of containing immigration and preventing illegal immigration. As these procedures have tightened, the tactics of those who wish to enter the Western world for economic reasons have changed. This has resulted in an increasing black market for forged, altered and counterfeit passports and travel documents. Most Western countries now have stringent visa requirements. I am glad to say that the visa system that we have adopted in recent months has been outstandingly successful, due to the remarkable efforts of our overseas offices, as well as our offices at the immigration ports and airports in the United Kingdom. The visa system is working, and consequently it is reducing a great deal of the harm and hurt of the people who wish to travel from poorer countries.

The one loophole that has been exploited—in recent months in particular—is the claim to refugee status. A refugee, as I understand it, is someone who does not want to leave his home country but is forced to do so because of a genuine belief and expectation that were he to remain he would be killed or tortured. He harbours a determination to return to his home country at the earliest opportunity, and seeks to do so in the future. The wave of so-called refugees who have been seeking to enter the Western democracies do not fall into that category. The evidence is overwhelming that many of these unfortunate people are seeking to leave their own country for economic reasons and not strictly for reasons of oppression.

The 64 Sri Lankan Tamils who arrived at Heathrow from Bangladesh on 13 February had travelled first from Malaysia to Dhaka and from there to London. They had obtained sanctuary in Malaysia and, secondly, in Bangladesh. If they had been genuine refugees, as I understand the meaning of the term, fleeing from the prospect of being killed or tortured, they would have obtained the sanctuary and protection that they pretended to seek in either of those countries. Their course of action and all that is known about them demonstrates that they were not genuine refugees. The conduct of the immigration service and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State seems to have been correct in the circumstances.

The 64 Sri Lankan Tamils had been organised by an agent who had travelled with them from Malaysia to Dhaka. All the Tamils travelled on forged or mutilated passports, or had no passports, having destroyed them on the journey. None of them had the required United Kingdom visas, yet they would have had the opportunity of obtaining those documents through the United Kingdom authorities in Malaysia or Dhaka, where we have a high commission which is skilled in the granting of such documents in proper cases. They claimed asylum on arrival in the United Kingdom and the Government, satisfied that the Tamils had no claim to refugee status, attempted to return them to Bangladesh.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West called for international understanding of the problem. I wish that there was a willingness for international understanding. The difficulty that is faced by the United Kingdom and other Western democracies is that some countries use any excuse not to accept back into their territory persons who are not genuine asylum seekers and who have no right to be in the Western country in question.

The problem that is faced by my right hon. Friend and his officials is that if he does not turn round the bogus refugees in a very short time the United Kingdom and its citizens will be left with a responsibility for those persons, which is improper and does a grave disservice to the genuine asylum seekers, to whom we traditionally give sanctuary. On this occasion the Government were prevented from doing what they believed to be their duty by a High Court order staying any action to remove them. The Home Secretary, as he said in the debate, decided to refer the 64 cases to the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service and reach fresh decisions on each case.

It is a matter of regret that UKIAS did not use far more professionalism and objectivity in examining these cases. It does no good to the cause of the genuine asylum seeker if organisations that are funded by the taxpayer — as UKIAS is, to the tune of 90 per cent., with 10 per cent. coming from an official body which deals with refugee issues — do not exercise their special obligations and responsibilities in a manner that takes into account the interests of the country and the whole concept of fair immigration control, because the two go hand in hand.

I hope that the management of UKIAS will look further at that aspect of its affairs. It is only right that my right hon. Friend should invite it to consider the progress of these matters in the way that he has done.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The hon. Gentleman mentioned one or two of these matters earlier in relation to what I had said. Is he saying that UKIAS should say that there is a quota and that once a certain number is reached the national interest requires that we send the next ones back? I cannot understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying about the national interest compared with an individual's right. If UKIAS is seeking to interpret the rules as they stand it must make its own judgments on the individual. If that is not done — the hon. Gentleman spoke earlier about our splendid record — we shall find ourselves in the position of the Western powers at the end of the war when, in the national interest, they sent Slavic refugees back to Russia, to a certain death, rather than accept them.

Mr. Wheeler: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not pursue what happened after the second world war, as historically, that is so distant as not to be relevant to the situation in which we find ourselves today.

The point that the hon. Gentleman raises about how many refugees should be admitted into the United Kingdom or any other Western democracy is a serious one.

I perceive that the Western democracies — the United States, Canada or any of the EEC countries — are now saying that, in practice, there is a limit to the number of persons that they are prepred to allow into their countries as refugees. A consequence of a tightening-up of this specification is that the United Kingdom, with its more liberal policies for admission, is becoming more vulnerable to persons coming from other countries. The problem is to determine who is the genuine refugee and who is not. The 64 Tamils could have been returned to Dhaka in Bangladesh, where they could have applied for visas to the United Kingdom and safely remained there, as they were not at risk from any activity in Sri Lanka while they were resident in Dhaka. The same applies to Malaysia. The Tamils could have been processed properly within the system there and lived in safety.

Mr. Raison: I wonder how my hon. Friend is able to make that judgment on UKIAS handling of the problem. The essence is that the Tamils did not see the officials in the first instance, but they have subsequently been able to see them. I understand that the Tamils are still being interviewed and, as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said, representations can be made until Wednesday this week. What is the evidence for saying that UKIAS has not handled the cases correctly?

Mr. Wheeler: I understand the facts that I have presented to be correct and they have not been challenged. The 64 Tamils travelled in an organised way. They either had no documents, or the documents that they had were false, forged or mutilated. The evidence is overwhelming that the Tamils were far from genuine in that sense. They came from two Commonwealth countries where they were not at risk and where they could have obtained sanctuary from oppression, if that was their first objective. Apparently they did not seek that sanctuary in the kingdom of Malaysia or in the republic of Bangladesh. If they had done so they could have applied to come to the United Kingdom through our high commissions in the normal way and their applications would have been considered.

Mr. Raison: I am not sure that that meets my point. The question of how the Tamils got here, or whether they should have been interviewed in Malaysia of Dhaka, is not UKIAS's responsibility. UKIAS had a responsibility to interview those involved, once that was possible.

The court's view, which I do not challenge, is that the crucial question is not how the people got here — I am sure that there was racketeering — but whether they are refugees or people whose conditions are such that it would be wrong to send them back. That is at the heart of the matter. That is what UKIAS has been involved in. I do not think that UKIAS has mishandled the case. I understand that a substantial number of those involved deserve refugee status and should be considered for the right to remain here.

Mr. Wheeler: My right hon. Friend will concede that if at the end of the inquiry into the individual cases the granting of asylum is considered appropriate, the next question that will arise is to which country that will apply.

Will it be the land in which they first arrived—Malaysia—or the second country to which they travelled—Bangladesh? My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has great experience in the management of immigration control procedures and he will apprehend my argument. It is important.

Mr. Winnick: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, whose speech has been interrupted on a number of occasions, for giving way. I apologise for interrupting him again. This is a matter for debate and I have my own views. I accept that the number of people whom the United Kingdom can accept must be limited. The hon. Gentleman is a fair-minded person, however much we disagree, but is he aware of any criticism by the Home Office or any other agency of the way in which UKIAS has handled the Tamil cases, or any other case that has been referred to the refugee unit in the last three years? The hon. Gentleman was the Chairman of the Sub-Committee which examined UKIAS and which came to the view that the organisation was well run and did a proper job.

Mr. Wheeler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. As the House knows, he plays an important part in the management of UKIAS, as he is its honorary chairman. I cannot comment on individual cases and I have no other comments to make on UKIAS in today's debate. My point is that UKIAS has a special responsibility. It is recognised by the Home Office as the intermediary in handling appeal cases. It has to use its time and resources carefully. My point is that in the situation that I have described, involving a particular group of Tamils who could have gained safety in other countries, we must question whether time should be spent on involvement in their affairs when there might be other cases on which the asylum issue should be more genuinely explored. That must be considered carefully.

When my Select Committee considered the subject of refugees and asylum in 1984 and 1985, it reported and recommended that the Home Office should consider the extension of the right of appeal to all asylum seekers. That is the point to which my right hon. Friend referred in his excellent speech. It recommended extension for cases where the applicant currently lacks the right of appeal exercisable in the United Kingdom to establish procedures by which leave to remain is withheld in obviously bogus cases and by which refusals of leave can be reviewed rapidly if appealed against.

In their response the Government acknowledged that this is a most difficult issue and said that they understood the need for immense care in handling such cases. As it has turned out, the Government's grave concern about this aspect of the procedure is well illustrated by what has happened at our ports of entry, in particular at Heathrow airport.

The difficulty is that in 1984-85, when my Select Committee considered the matter, we were beginning to understand the strength of pressures placed upon Western countries in particular and the difficulty that we in the United Kingdom would face as other countries tightened their procedures. I recall a visit to West Germany when about 100,000 people entered through east Berlin, claiming to be refugees. The West German Government had to care for those people, although they believe that they were not genuine refugees, but economic refugees. West Germany had to look at ways of dealing with the problem and the Government were concerned because they could see no end to the numbers that would arrive. There are compelling economic reasons in many Third world countries why people should move to improve their quality of life. We in the House would not disagree with that.

The experience of the Select Committee in 1984-85 and the current events of 1987 are such that I now firmly hold the opinion that the traditions of this country and the care that we extend to asylum seekers must remain an important part of our government and culture. Indeed, the evidence since 1979 under this Government is that more than 8,000 individuals from all over the world have been granted asylum. Over 6,000 more who failed to qualify for asylum have been granted exceptional leave to remain.

The balance must be struck between protecting the genuine refugee and preventing abuse of the United Kingdom's generous and liberal immigration and refugee policy. In the light of current developments in the Western democracies, the United Kingdom has no alternative but to bring forward the measure which the House is now considering. There are similar provisions already in operation in many other Western countries, including Canada, the United States, Australia, New Zealand and West Germany. I also know that other Western countries are taking steps to exercise the tightest possible control against abuse.

I do not believe that the passing into law of the Bill will in any way operate against genuine asylum seekers as defined by the United Nations convention; nor will it prevent Jewish refugees from the Soviet Union or any other oppressive society from gaining entry into the United Kingdom. If we are to maintain a liberal asylum policy, we must have proper controls over the bogus. That is at the heart of the problem.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) spoke about an appeals procedure that could be almost instant and could be operated at the port of entry. I wish that I could devise a system that would hold the certainty of independence and objectivity, but would minimise the possibility of delay: a system that would operate instantly, that is within a matter of hours, but would not defeat the Government's need for effective control over immigration.

The number of people who are already referred for further inquiry is causing major difficulties over accommodation and the subsequent bureaucratic investigation of their cases. I am afraid that I can see no practical alternative, given the circumstances that face the Western world in 1987. None of us can deny the pressure of numbers wanting to come. However, it must rest with the Executive to act as the point of refusal in the first instance, and the point of review in the second instance—at the port of entry. There can be no alternative to the operation of such procedures. I can see no way in which the United Kingdom will have effective control unless we follow such procedures.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): There can be no doubt that the Bill was conceived in panic, is being rushed through this House in great haste and, if enacted, is unlikely to be workable and is probably in breach of international conventions.

When the Home Secretary opened the debate he made some reference to the visa entry system, and I would like to comment upon that system. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to portray an abundant degree of complacency about the system. It is certainly true that a large number of visa applications are being granted without personal interviews. At present a larger proportion of applications are being accepted than before the visa entry system was introduced. Certainly the figures I have been given bear that out. That leads one to the inevitable conclusion that either the quality of the decisions made by immigration officers at Heathrow and elsewhere, prior to the visa system, were as bad as successive reports suggested, or there is now a clear political direction to British posts overseas to grant a large number of visa applications.

There are many anomalies within the visa entry system. Indeed, later this week I shall be writing to the Minister of State about a constituent of mine who has been waiting since the middle of January for his 10-year-old nephew to have his visa application approved. I also think that renewed consideration should be given to establish a post in Mirpur to deal with applications from that part of Pakistan.

On the substance of the Bill, I support those speakers who have urged that this country should have a proper appeal system. That was first recommended by a committee more than 20 years ago. There is an overwhelming case for the introduction of a proper appeal system that would work quickly and effectively. The Government would not have got themselves into their present difficulties if there was such a system and it was operating satisfactorily.

There is concern about the Government's proposal to use a ferry moored off the coast at Weymouth as a floating detention centre or perhaps as a prison hulk—that is how many people described it when the proposal was first made. I have been advised by the Library that it appears that a moored passenger ship used for such a purpose falls into a legal limbo. Even the Library hinted that that may well be the reason why the Home Office has chosen to consider that proposal. Whatever the motive, I had hoped that, in his statement, the Home Secretary would have announced that the proposal was scrapped. I am sad that that is not the case.

Today it has been announced that there is a crime committed in this country every minute. Our prisons are so full that there are rumours circulating that the Government are shortly to announce an amnesty for 6,000 prisoners, convicted of minor offences. That is an appalling commentary on the Government's performance in dealing with law and order. That they should seriously propose the introduction of prison ships, moored off the coast of Weymouth, to deal with people who, for one reason or other, are refused entry to the country is appalling.

Mr. Corbyn: Hurd's hulks.

Mr. Madden: This is a nasty little Bill. It has been condemned by a number of organisations. The United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service states:

"UKIAS regrets the introduction of this Bill. As drafted, it will place serious obstacles in the way of bona fide asylum-seekers with a genuine fear of persecution, who seek asylum in the UK."

The Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants states:

"We believe that rushed legislation directed against asylum-seekers, which seeks only to secure their exclusion from the UK, is likewise no basis for a fair and just refugee policy, which must ensure that genuine refugees have the opportunity of asylum in the UK and do not face arbitrary return to countries where they may be in danger."

The Immigration Law Practitioners Association states:

"This Bill is unnecessary, unworkable and in contravention of this country's international obligations."

We are all aware that the Bill is being introduced following the Tamil case that led the Government into embarrassment, into the courts and resulted in an even more embarrassing U-turn.

The Home Secretary and the Minister of State have come to the House time and again to seek to persuade it that action is necessary to deal with rackets and racketeers. They have refused to accept that Tamils in Sri Lanka face real dangers and have true concern about their safety and that of their families.

I believe that the Home Office should consult the Foreign Office about the degree of the danger that is faced by Tamils in Sri Lanka. In The Observer yesterday, under the headline, there was an extremely interesting article about Mr. Michael Borlace who was employed by an extremely mysterious organisation known as KMS. The article stated:

"Revealed: Briton who led Contra mercenaries,"

"President Jayawardene of Sri Lanka, in the strategically important Indian Ocean, also sought British help to keep him in power against minority Tamil 'terrorists.' Because India tended to support the Tamils, Britain did not send troops. Their dispatch would have been politically controversial. But KMS was allowed to send a private force, eventually numbering 100 men, to help establish and train a 'special task force' of Sri Lankan troops."

In the article the Sri Lankan Minister for national security is quoted as saying:

"We have to accept that our own forces are not as experienced in this type of operation as the British are. We heard about the KMS when it was used by the Sultan of Oman to help with his terrorist problems."

The article concludes:

"Last year—amid reports of atrocities in Sri Lanka which eventually led to unease among some KMS 'trainers'—Borlace and a team of five were pulled out of Sri Lanka and sent covertly to aid the Contras. That too was rapidly to end in recriminations and an international political scandal that engulfed the US President, although not, so far, the British Prime Minister."

No doubt it is only a matter of time before that happens, but I have every confidence that embarrassment will not shroud our Prime Minister until after the general election.

The House has heard much about rackets and racketeers in the case of the Tamils and in other instances, but the Bill is almost a charter for the racketeers. It is a bonanza for them and for the printers of bogus documents, because they will be compelled to become more sophisticated racketeers and forgers.

The crooks must have cheered when they got the first wind of the Bill. The Minister of State and the Home Secretary, who have told us so much about the racketeers and the rackets, must be told that the Bill does nothing to deal with the racketeers and their rackets.

The Minister of State has demonstrated his powerlessness in regard to rackets and racketeers in Malaysia, but why does he not do a little more to bust an immigration racket that is a little nearer home and which he could do something about? Serious allegations have been made by me and the Chinese chamber of commerce in Northern Ireland against a senior RUC officer and others in Belfast.

Why has that officer not been suspended from duty pending an outcome of inquiries into those serious allegations involving an immigration racket and five-figure sums of money? Will the Minister of State explain in his reply to the debate why that officer has not been suspended, or inform the House that he has been suspended, as he should have been in January and February when the detailed and serious allegations against that man and others were submitted?

Conservative Members often claim that they have had no correspondence on matters about which Opposition Members claim that there is considerable anxiety. I assure Judge Argyle, who seemed over the weekend to make some extremely intemperate and prejudiced remarks about my constituents, that the letter that I am about to read is from a constituent who is white and is a well-known lecturer in law. He says:

"As the recent Tamil case indicated, even the High Court does not share the Government's view that because a person has bogus travel documents he cannot, for that reason, be a genuine refugee. Such bogus documents may indicate to the contrary, that he is afraid to approach his Government to get genuine documents. I am sure you will, but I do urge you, nonetheless, to oppose the Government's attempt to frighten airlines into acting as an additional arm of the Immigration Service. Heaven knows, the IS does not do a very sensitive job, but what kind of a job will the airlines do?"

That constituent is very concerned about the Bill, as are many of my constituents. I believe that a large section of British public opinion is worried about a nasty, mean little measure which cuts across the traditional view of this country. Those who believe that they face genuine danger and seek political refuge for themselves and their families have looked to us to consider their case with sympathy and understanding and to give them refuge. I hope that the Bill will be removed, because it is a shoddy, shameful, nasty little measure which does nothing to assist the United Kingdom's reputation throughout the world and which even this Government may be ashamed of within a short time.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I welcome the Bill, which follows similar legislation in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Brazil, the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany.

Hon. Members are right to ask why the Bill is necessary. We know that, although it was triggered by the 64 Tamils, the problem goes much deeper. It arises because of the changing nature of refugee movements, caused by the ease of air travel, and because there is no single definition of a refugee.

I am a member of the Migration and Refugee Committee of the Council of Europe. The Committee is closely involved with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and we have recently been examining the movement of refugees in South America. One of our recent reports, which has not yet been put before the Council of Europe, deals with the definition of refugees. We outline six definitions. There are the ultra-sound asylum seekers, who are de jure refugees and are recognised as such under the 1951 United Nations convention and the 1967 protocol, and are given asylum in a third country and enjoy the economic and social rights that flow from that recognition. That is the gold standard of a refugee.

Secondly, there are also the UNHCR refugees who fit in under the 1951 convention and the 1967 protocol and have the added bonus that the UNHCR feels that they should be recognised as refugees.

Thirdly, there are quota refugees. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred to direct exchanges from the Eastern bloc and there are similar procedures in Chile and Argentina. Those people are quota refugees.

Fourthly, there are de facto refugees — a category within which I suspect the Tamils fall. Such refugees do not come under the 1951 convention or the 1967 protocol, but they are unwilling to return to their country of origin, on the ground of reasonable fear.

There are two other categories. The Council of Europe committee calls one group discreet refugees. They do not fall under any of the previous four categories, but they believe that they have a special status and right to be recognised as refugees.

The final category is economic refugees, and that category is all too well known to the House.

It is clear from these categories that the problem is not straightforward, and it is not surprising that we encounter difficulties in tackling the issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Paddington (Mr. Wheeler) referred to the 100,000 refugees who wanted to go to the Federal Republic of Germany. Clearly, there is a large-scale problem. As my hon. Friend said, the majority of those people were seeking economic gain.

In the past six years the number of people seeking asylum in the United Kingdom has tripled. Two years ago only 10 per cent. of the people granted asylum sought it at the port of entry. That percentage has changed dramatically, and I understand that the latest figures show that about 50 per cent. of those wanting asylum seek it at the port of entry. That is where the situation in Sri Lanka and the Tamils come to the fore.

By way of background, I have lived and worked in Sri Lanka and India. I have lived in Pakistan and visited most of south-east Asia. I go to Sri Lanka every year, sometimes as a guest of the Sri Lankan Government, and sometimes under my own steam. I go at least once, and usually twice a year. I have been to the United Kingdom high commission in Colombo on every visit. I went when the new visa controls came in about 18 months ago. I questioned immigration officers, our high commissioner, Tamil politicians and the Sri Lankan media, both favourable to and against the Government. A few weeks ago, in January, I checked on the situation.

Today, there are no queues of people waiting for visas. The only time there were queues was when we initially brought in the visa requirement. There are no delays. Maybe a person will arrive with not quite the right papers. He is given another appointment a few days later so that he can be speedily dealt with. He does not go through the whole rigmarole again. He is given an immediate appointment to clarify the query. I have never had a complaint from any Tamil. I know many Tamils and some Tamil politicians in Sri Lanka, but none has complained about the visa provisions.

Hon. Members who do not know Sri Lanka may look at a map, see that it is quite a way from Jaffna to Colombo, and ask how anyone can get from Jaffna to Colombo, which is several hundred miles away. The fact is that they do get there. One has only to look at an analysis of the applications, as I did, to know that people from Jaffna are applying and that they go to Colombo. It is not for me to ask by what means they get there.

Mr. Corbyn: Although I do not doubt the hon. Gentleman's extensive knowledge of Sri Lanka, he has said that Tamil people travel from Jaffna to Colombo. He said that he does not know how they get there. Will he comment on the number of assaults committed upon people who travel by bus or train in an attempt to get from Jaffna to Colombo, or the sheer difficulty of many Tamil people in getting through Elephant pass, off the peninsula and on to the main part of Sri Lanka?

Mr. Morris: I cannot comment on the number of assaults any more than the hon. Gentleman can. No record is kept, and there are difficulties.

Mr. Corbyn: But they happen.

Mr. Morris: They happen, particularly at night. If one is unwise enough to travel at night, when terrorists attack Government troops, one is bound to find oneself in difficulty, as any hon. Member who has done national service or been in the armed forces would know. First, I look at the facts on the ground, at the high commission in Colombo. Many people from Jaffna apply in person at the high commission. They do not apply in Jaffna.

Mr. Corbyn: A few years ago——

Mr. Morris: I have been to Jaffna. Let me make it clear that I did not go last January, but I have been to Jaffna and Trincomalee on many occasions.

Secondly—I do not wish to take it any further than this — I asked the high commissioner the specific question that another hon. Member raised. I asked what happens to the applicant who is afraid that, by entering the British high commission, he may be recognised as a political dissident, someone who is vehemently opposed to the Government of Sri Lanka, and may well be on a wanted list because he has undertaken a robbery or committed some other error. I was told—this does not surprise me, having worked in many countries — that there are means whereby, through the Tamil community, applications can be dealt with without having to go through the front door of the British high commission.

The right hon. Member for Gorton, the Opposition spokesman on immigration matters, suggested that one has to go through the front door of the British embassy to get out of eastern Europe. That is absolute rubbish. My second name is not Wolfgang for absolutely nothing. The right hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that the people who sought to get out of eastern Europe before and between the wars did not necessarily do it through the front door of any British embassy. It has long been part of the heritage and success of our asylum policy that our contacts go deep in any country in which there are difficulties.

Mr. Bidwell: The hon. Gentleman is obviously introducing into the debate considerable knowledge about Sri Lanka and the two antagonistic communities. Has not what he said rather contradicted his observations? He alluded to the exodus of Jews and other persecuted minorities in Europe who did not go through the front door, as he put it. Is that not precisely what is occurring with Tamils coming here and claiming refugee status? Additionally, the more he shows how complicated it is to assess claims for refugee status, the more he shows why we cannot immediately return people who have come here. It is necessarily a long process to determine the pros and cons. In the cases in which I have intervened, if addresses in my constituency are given, it seems that the current Home Office policy is to allow most of those who claim refugee status a period without necessarily granting full political refugee status.

Mr. Morris: I re-emphasise the point that there are no complaints about the visa system in Colombo today. People from the north and the east get to Colombo. All I am saying is that, underneath, a safeguarding provision operates for those who may be "wanted" by the Sri Lankan Government because they have undertaken a robbery, which is not uncommon, the money from which is being used to support the Tigers. In the circumstances, I can understand why the Sri Lankan Government would want to arrest them, and equally I can understand why the persons involved may want to get out.

Why did the 64 Tamils not apply for visas, as hundreds of other Tamils have done? If they are good and genuine refugees, and they were in the north or the east, why did they not go to south India, as the majority of Tamils in their situation have done? Why did they travel to Colombo? If they travelled to Colombo, as they clearly must have done to get to Malaysia, why did they not use the system and get a visa, which they can quickly get from the high commission? These questions must be asked. It must be put on record that it is not the policy of the Sri Lankan Government to force any Tamil to leave the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) asked why, having gone to Malaysia, which is a member of the Commonwealth and does not have visa requirements, and having got the sanctuary that they sought there, they did not stay in Malaysia. There are many Sri Lankans in Malaysia. Why did they choose not to stay there in Dhaka?

The time has come to ask one or two questions about some of the rackets that are going on and that need to be brought out into the open. I asked to see the visa stamp in our high commission. I suppose I should not have been surprised, but I was surprised that the high commission has already had to change it twice. It has had to put on the most sophisticated watermark that it can find because it is already being reproduced on a facsimile basis by highly creative Sri Lankans, mainly of Tamil origin, I believe.

It is also common knowledge in Colombo that students come to the United Kingdom to do a course but never take their finals because they know that if they took and passed them they would be asked to return to Sri Lanka to follow their particular trade or profession. That racket has been going on for years.

I have to ask my right hon. and learned Friend why a man like Viraj Mendis is able to hoodwink the authorities, year in year out, and claim that he is persecuted when my Tamil friends tell me that he had only the most junior role in the political movement in Sri Lanka and that he is by no means a leader of it, let alone worthy of lance corporal status.

I have a large immigrant community in my constituency and I have many friends among the Bangladeshi community. We have taken in for temporary asylum about

2,000 Sri Lankans and we have said that all of them can get a job, that they do not need permission to go on a Manpower Services Commission training course and that they can avail themselves of the National Health Service, of the other health services provided by local authorities and of social security benefits. Opposition Members ought to realise that my Bangladeshi constituents in Northampton are just as concerned about the taxes that they pay as the indigenous community in Northampton, and they wonder why money should be spent on bogus asylum seekers. Any hon. Member who has had to deal directly with those who are seeking asylum——

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Morris: No. I have already given way once to the hon. Gentleman.

Any hon. Member who has had to deal with those who are genuinely seeking asylum is more than happy to give them as much help as possible to make their stay in the United Kingdom normal. The Vietnamese boat people are as good an example as any. They are very welcome to stay here, but the nearly 2,000 temporary asylum seekers from Sri Lanka do not, by any yardstick, fall into that category.

When assessing the position one has to consider India's responsibility. In one sense, every Sri Lankan is an Indian; all of them came originally from India. However, today Sri Lanka is a sovereign democratic state. It is overshadowed by India, but India envies the success of Sri Lanka. Hon. Members sometimes forget that one needs to distinguish between the Indian Tamils and the Sri Lankan Tamils. The Indian Tamils are to be found in the hill states. There is no question of refugee status in their case. The vast majority of them want to stay on the tea estates and they have now been granted citizenship.

Mr. Corbyn: But they do not have political rights.

Mr. Morris: They have political rights now. That is what we are talking about today.

Mr. Corbyn: Then they were a long time coming.

Mr. Morris: Lots of things take a long time.

In the past the Tamils were discriminated against because of the language problem, and they suffered; but having worked in Bengal I know that the Bengalis also suffered when Hindi became the official language of India. However, that is in the past. The Tamils are intelligent people and they do well in any walk of life.

The terrorists are active in the north and in parts of the east of Sri Lanka. For the last three or four years India has actively connived at military camps in India as well as at refugee camps, although claiming at the same time to be a mediator. India has no control over the terrorist movement in Sri Lanka, because the avowed aim of that movement is to set up a Marxist state. Is it any wonder, in those circumstances, that the Sri Lankan Government react? At the beginning, the Sri Lankan army was pretty hopeless. The Tigers are better trained, organised and financed, but I do not know where the money comes from. Atrocities are carried out on both sides, and the atrocities of the Tigers are worse than the atrocities committed by the indigenous army. The terrorists are underwritten by India.

Peace proposals of 19 December are on the table. They are supposedly supported by India but they are still rejected by the terrorists. However, despite the strife, slowly but surely the Tamils are returning voluntarily from south India to Sri Lanka. About 4,000 Tamils have already done so. Those are not my figures, or Sri Lankan Government or press figures; they are Indian figures. They are based on information that has come from the Indian immigration authorities. Since Christmas, 4,000 Tamils have returned voluntarily to live in the north of Sri Lanka, which suggests to me that the situation must be improving. It is reported that the Swiss Government are recommending that more than 40 Tamils should be returned to Sri Lanka. Switzerland does not have a hard-headed, Right-wing Government who are determined to throw out everybody that they possibly can. The Swiss weigh up matters. If the Swiss Government are thinking of returning those Tamils to Sri Lanka, it suggests that the position is improving there.

My view on the 64 Tamils and the 2,000 temporary asylum seekers is that the British Government have been duped. I question the so-called perfect stance of the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service. The other morning while driving to the House, I was listening to a radio programme during which the director of UKIAS, Mr. Michael Barnes, was interviewed by the BBC. He said that a significant number of the 64 Tamils had been tortured. It is not the role of an independent body like UKIAS to state categorically that people have been tortured. It is entirely appropriate to say that allegations of torture need to be investigated, but it is completely wrong for the director of an independent body to state in the media, when evidence has not been produced, that people have been tortured.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is it not equally wrong for the Minister of State to say without any evidence that the Tamils were bogus refugees?

Mr. Morris: The hon. Gentleman tempts me to look again at the case that I have been deploying. I do not know whether he has been in the Chamber for the whole of my speech. I think that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was absolutely right to say that one does not tear up passports and documents if one has nothing to hide. One does not avoid going to south India, where all one's colleagues go if they are under political pressure, but instead goes all the way down to Colombo, through all the difficulties that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) pointed out, unless one is adopting a slightly bogus approach. Furthermore, one does not leave other colleagues in Malaysia—there are many Sri Lankans in Malaysia—and move on to Dhaka, and after that to the United Kingdom, unless one has something to hide.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Morris: No. I have given way several times to the hon. Gentleman. He will have his chance in a minute, and I am sure that he will take it.

Mr. Corbyn: This is an important point.

Mr. Morris: Yes; this is an important subject. I rarely speak on it, and today I intend to have my full pennyworth.

The right of asylum to this country is precious. Many hon. Members have commented on Chile and Vietnam. I will go a long way to support any genuine case, but I doubt whether there are any genuine cases among the 64 Tamils. I doubt also whether there are many genuine cases in the 2,000 or more temporary asylum seekers. If Sri Lankans, of their own volition, are returning to India, as hundreds have been doing so since Christmas, should not the same happen here?

As I have said—I do not often boast—no one in the House knows Sri Lanka as well as I do. Perhaps I shall need to bring the case of a genuine refugee from Sri Lanka to the attention of my right hon. Friend. There will be people who are violently opposed to the present Government and, in the future, there may well be some absolutely genuine cases. However, when I make that case to my right hon. Friend, I shall make it on good evidence and with facts. It will not be the trumped-up support of Left-wing hon. Members who get on any band wagon they can find to undermine the democratically elected Government in Sri Lanka.

As a postscript, perhaps it is time that my right hon. Friend told the Indian Government that if they are genuinely concerned about peace, it is time that they closed their camps in south India, patrolled the strait of Palk, stopped the kidnapping of young people and got the Tamils to accept the proposals on offer. That done, peace will follow. If the Indian Government do not do that, India will rue the day and Britain certainly will not pick up the pieces.

To the relief of some Opposition Members, I finish on the issue of the English language, which is at the heart of the problem. As more and more people throughout the world have English as their second language, we must ask ourselves whether we in this country, which is the home of English, will allow everyone throughout the world who has English as his or her second language to seek sanctuary here. That would be an unrealistic policy, but it is the implication behind what is happening today with the Tamils.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): In accordance with the conventions of the House, I should declare an interest, although it is non-commercial. Needless to say, I am the chairman of UKIAS.

As we know, there is a long and honourable tradition, going back many centuries, of giving asylum to victims fleeing political and religious persecution. My fear, like that of my hon. Friends, is that the Bill will undermine that long tradition.

In the memorandum that was submitted by the Home Office in December 1984 to the Race Relations and Immigration Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, reference was made to the tradition of asylum here. That does not mean that Britain should be in a position to accept a large number of refugees. That certainly is not, and has never been, my view. Therefore, one must accept that, at the end of the day, the number of genuine refugees that the United Kingdom will accept will always be rather small. I hope that the Western European countries, including our own, will act in concert, in trying to bring about joint co-operation to assist those in genuine fear of their lives, and not, as is happening at the moment, that one country after another in Western Europe is virtually closing its doors to refugees.

There should be no doubt that those who have a real fear of persecution or worse if returned to their own country directly, or sent back to a country which would return them to their own land, look upon the countries of democratic Western Europe as safety nets, if only as temporary ones.

I am reminded of what happened when the coup occurred in Chile in 1973. That was an army coup, or at least a coup that was carried out by the armed forces against the democratic Government. The reaction of the British embassy was to close its doors. There could have been no doubt that the people who were seeking refuge at the British embassy were genuine refugees. As we know, the army carried out killings and atrocities. It is to the great credit of my party that when we came to office in February 1974 we made it much easier for Chilean refugees to come to Britain. I shall never apologise for that.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of those people whose entry to the British embassy was denied because the gates were slammed had sought asylum temporarily in the Mexican and Cuban embassies and that they were subsequently admitted to this country only after trying to get into the British embassy in the first place?

Mr. Winnick: I entirely accept my hon. Friend's point.

In the absence of an appeals system for asylum applicants who are turned down at ports of entry in the United Kingdom, surely it is all the more important that the referral system to the refugee unit of UKIAS should be maintained in full? Like my hon. Friends, my criticism tonight to the Home Secretary is that that referral system will apparently be eroded and somewhat undermined. I regret that. It is a crucial safeguard for cases in which the passenger is seeking asylum here on the grounds that his or her removal could lead to grave dangers that the referral system remains.

The question is raised also whether, under the Bill, asylum seekers will actually reach the United Kingdom in the first place. Although some applications for asylum are successfully made abroad—I do not question that—that decision would be discretionary and taken outside the formal immigration rules. In the main the application will be made only when the passenger is in the United Kingdom. It was clearly because the Sub-Committee recognised how vital the referrals system would be in such cases that it recommended that the Home Office should decide, in principle, to extend to all asylum applicants the right of appeal before they are sent back. What was the response of the Home Office——

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman will admit that the Sub-Committee said that that should include all asylum cases that were not clearly bogus and recommended a speedy departure for those that were bogus.

Mr. Winnick: I do not question that. However, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, who is a member of that Sub-Committee, will recognise how important it is, whether an application is bogus or not, that it should be the subject of referral unless it is blatantly bogus. I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman on that. However, where so much is at stake and, where the person is claiming that his or her life could be in grave danger, surely the hon. Gentleman would agree that a system of referral is necessary?

What was the response of the Home Office to the Sub-Committee's report? It rejected outright the need for such an appeals system in those asylum cases. It would be wrong for me to give the impression that I do not understand or that I minimise some of the difficulties that would be involved if there was a full appeals system for asylum seekers. UKIAS, as an organisation, would recognise the need for such an appeals system. I go along with that to a large extent, but I recognise some of the difficulties that would undoubtedly arise. I also accept that such a formal appeals system would, as the Home Secretary said today, probably increase the number of people applying.

The main argument put forward by the Home Office in rejecting the Sub-Committee's recommendation of an appeal system was based on the fact that there were other adequate safeguards, namely representation by Members of Parliament, judicial review and the UKIAS referral procedure. In response to the Sub-Committee the Home Office stated:

"the referral system is providing an effective safeguard and a satisfatory substitute for formal appeal rights . . . In practice therefore the referral procedure is providing a broader safeguard than a formal appeal to the immigration appellate authorities."

Obviously, if the Home Office, rightly, places so much emphasis on the referral system as a subsitute for an appeal system one must question anything which would undermine the referral system.

As we know, this procedure did not operate for the 64 Tamils. I do not know whether I am being over-generous, but I imagine that the Home Secretary, if not the Minister of State, rather regrets the original decision that the referral system should not operate. They know of the application for judicial review and the climb down by the Home Office. Indeed, there is no other way to describe it.

Understandably, UKIAS and, I am sure, the UNHCR, take exception to the comments of the Minister of State during exchanges on 18 February. He said that UKIAS gave the impression that it did not wish to stamp out immigration rackets and that it was "determined to bend all its efforts to allowing racketeers to succeed."—[Official Report, 18 February 1987; Vol. 110, c. 910.]

I regret those remarks because there is no justification for them and when the Minister replies I hope that he will apologise or, at least, withdraw them. UKIAS does not wish in any way to act as some sort of apologist for racketeers or to bend any rules. The Home Office unit that deals with refugees, and is in contact almost daily with the UKIAS refugee unit would, I am sure, agree that there is no evidence of any attempt to bend the rules.

So that there should be no misunderstanding I stress that we should have the utmost contempt for those who trade in human misery and fear. Last night I watched a television series about the second world war and it showed black marketeers in action. They always appear when there are food shortages, wars or people fleeing for their lives. Such people always have been and probably always will be prepared to use any means to gain a profit, no matter what misery may accrue. I do not suppose that even the most fervent advocate of free enterprise on the Conservative Benches would be in favour of such racketeers.

Racketeers of course are not in the least concerned about refugees, whether genuine or otherwise. A clear distinction must be made, however, between those who trade in human misery and fear and the passengers themselves. I do not know which is the case in relation to the 64 Tamils, but we know, and the Home Secretary should know, that people who are fleeing for their lives will do anything to get any sort of document because they are frightened. Have we not seen enough in 20th century Europe, let alone in other parts, to understand what happened on countless occasions before and during the second world war when people would use any means to get documents, probably completely false, in order to reach a place of safety?

I criticise the handling of the 64 Tamils because no distinction was made between the possession of false documents and their case for genuine asylum. Initially that was not recognised, but eventually the Home Secretary made a statement accepting that their cases should be referred to UKIAS.

During 1986 the Home Office referred 441 cases of asylum seekers to UKIAS. That is hardly a huge number and it would not swamp the United Kingdom. Of them, 155 came from Sri Lanka, 148 from Iran, 38 from Afghanistan, 30 from Ghana, 18 from Pakistan and the remainder from several other countries. I resent the criticisms of the hon. Members for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) and for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) about the refugee unit of UKIAS. As I tried to explain in interventions on the speech of the hon. Member for Westminster, North, it is not for UKIAS to decide national policy over how many refugees and others should be admitted. Indeed, it would be strange for such an organisation to make such decisions. Similarly, it is not the funtion of UNHCR to decide how many refugees should be allowed entry. That must be determined by Parliament. That is our function and, finally, that of the Government of the day to decide by their majority here. There is no doubt about that.

I know of no criticism of the way in which refugee counsellors at UKIAS have carried out their day-to-day duties. If there had been any criticism either before or since the case of the 64 Tamils, surely as chairman it would have come to my notice at meetings of the executive committee or by the director informing me? The work is carried out on a professional basis, as one would expect. The people concerned are interviewed in depth and reports are made to the Home Office with recommendations where appropriate. If hon. Members have a criticism of Labour Members, so be it, but it is unfair to criticise an independent organisation which has no wish to bend any rules.

Mr. Michael Morris: May I make it clear that I have not previously criticised UKIAS and that I have used the organisation on many occasions? But does the hon. Gentleman agree that the director of UKIAS should not have broadcast on radio to the nation that in a significant number of these cases people had been tortured in Sri Lanka—a statement which may or may not be true—until the evidence had been given to the Home Office for assessment? Moreover, who is to say who did the torturing in Sri Lanka? There is clear evidence that the Tamil Tigers have done far more torturing than the Government forces have ever done.

Mr. Winnick: I did not listen to that broadcast which goes out just after the morning 9 o'clock news when I am on my way to the House. Perhaps if I had known that it was to be broadcast I would have listened, but I am not fully aware of what the director said. However, the director, who is incidentally a former Member of this

[Mr. Winnick]

House, would be careful about what he said. One of the difficulties is that the hon. Gentleman is very keen to defend the Sri Lankan Government. I am not in a position to defend them or otherwise. I accept that the hon. Gentleman has a detailed knowledge of the country, which I do not have as I have not taken the closest interest in it. He may be right or wrong. Whatever may have been done in that country, I oppose terrorism as a means of changing things. There should be no doubt about my views on that score.

The right hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) quoted the decision of the executive committee of the UNHCR at its 34th session, to which we were a party, when it discussed matters concerning asylum. I hope that the Home Secretary will note fully what it said:

"an unsuccessful applicant should be enabled to have a negative decision reviewed before rejection at the frontier or forcible removal from the territory. Where arrangements for such a review do not exist, Governments should give favourable consideration to their establishment."

That is important, and anything which tends to undermine it should be deplored.

I agree with my right hon. and hon. Friends that, to a large extent, the Bill is a panic reaction. I trust that it was not meant to be a pre-election attempt to play the immigration and race relations card and to demonstrate that the Labour party is not in favour of effective immigration control. As I said during an intervention in the Home Secretary's speech, we all know that, whether in government or opposition, the Labour party is committed to effective immigration control. [Interruption.] I do not know why the Home Secretary is tut-tutting.

Perhaps the Home Secretary will give us some idea whether the Bill's Committee stage is to be taken on the Floor of the House. Irrespective of whether it is taken here or upstairs, I hope that the Government will be willing to respond to constructive amendments. If we are to have the Bill, it is vital to maintain the referral system and to overcome some of the obvious difficulties of asylum seekers reaching the United Kingdom.

For the reasons that I have given, and bearing in mind the nature of the Bill, we are perfectly right to pursue our reasoned amendment.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Perhaps predictably, the debate has ranged widely over immigration policy, the status of refugees and the role of the independent service, although the Bill is a fairly narrow measure. I plan to concentrate on its contents and to seek some assurances from my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State.

Before doing that, however, I should like to say something about the background. Like most of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I believe that the Bill is in accord with international trends. It cannot be said that we are taking initiatives that are at variance with the approaches to this vexed problem that have recently been adopted by other countries in Western Europe and elsewhere. The Bill takes note of the need for the humanitarian treatment of genuine refugees.

There has been an understandable indication from Conservative Members that we must consider the growing tendency of what the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) rightly called the trade in human misery. We must therefore recognise the need not to give the impression that we have, or can have, an open door. A balance has to be struck between humanitarian acceptance of some people seeking asylum and the pressure of public opinion, which we are supposed to represent, to limit the number of people whom we accept.

The Bill achieves that balance. Its basic requirement is that airlines and shipping companies must accept responsibility for people who arrive without proper documents. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said that 149 foreign airlines are effectively being asked to become experts in United Kingdom immigration rules. That is far from the purpose or likely outcome of the Bill. What is likely, however, is that airlines which have been prone to overlook immigration details relating to United Kingdom procedures because their commercial interests run along the lines of carrying passengers rather than concerning themselves too much whether they will be admitted at one of Britain's airports would be required to balance the commercial pressure to fill an aircraft seat against the need to recognise that, if they do not take appropriate measures, their commercial interests may be affected when a passenger arrives in Britain.

I do not see that that is other than the correct approach. It is not at all a bad thing that airlines and shipping companies which bring people to the United Kingdom should be engaged in a partnership with the Government to control the traffic that is at the heart of this brief Bill. I therefore support the Bill's purpose, but some airlines, British and foreign, are worried about one or two of the details.

Perhaps I should declare an interest, in that I advise British Caledonian Airways, to which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary referred. The questions that I shall ask, however, are asked on behalf of all airlines, which increasingly accept the need for the Bill, but which are understandably anxious for clarification about where they stand in regard to some of the details.

What would happen to a passenger in transit through the United Kingdom, perhaps merely transferring from one London airport to another? The passenger might say, when he is boarding in a third country, that he wants to transit through the United Kingdom and therefore to be freed of the necessity for complete immigration documents which would normally be required. If he then changes his mind, perhaps because his aircraft is diverted or delayed, and says when he arrives in the United Kingdom that he wants to stay, what happens? Airlines have a right to know whether they will be liable. Perhaps my right hon. and learned Friend will give some thought to how an airline will be able to prove that the passenger indicated on boarding an aircraft in a third country that his intention was merely to transit through the United Kingdom. That is a detail, but it is of considerable importance to the operation of the measure.

Secondly, airlines are asking whether the £1,000 fine per passenger will be in addition to the detainee costs, which are already a source of considerable financial pressure to some airlines, or whether the fine will somehow be set off against those costs. Hon. Members may know the answer, but so far I have heard nothing to tell me whether that would be an acceptable way to proceed.

Thirdly, what mechanism is proposed for airlines to dispute the fine in specific cases, such as the transit cases to which I have referred? It is important to have a mechanism that is practical in its operation. Although one appreciates the urgency with which the legislation is being introduced, it is incumbent upon the Government to let us into their thinking about the detailed operation of the Bill.

Finally, in relation to clause 1(4), how can we ensure that acceptable proof will be forthcoming as to the falsity of a document? How can one define "reasonably apparent?" Who is to judge whether the appearance of a document was such as reasonably to persuade airline personnel at the port of embarcation that it was the genuine article? What kind of evidence will be acceptable, and who will exercise judgement?

I do not know how many Members have wide experience of embarking on aircraft in certain Third-world countries, but in the period immediately preceding boarding a jumbo jet headed for this country there is, to say the least, some confusion. Airlines in those countries may also have greater difficulty training their personnel to be as vigilant in checking travel documents as their counterparts are at British airports.

For all those reasons, therefore, although the general aim of the Bill is acceptable and the detail is understandable, I believe that some points still need to be dealt with. My right hon. and learned Friend may say that they should be dealt with in Committee, but although we are today discussing the principles of the measure I believe that a deeper understanding is required of certain areas before one can accept the principles. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will be able to give me some reassurance. I appreciate the reasons for the measure, and it is right and proper that it should be dealt with as a matter of urgency, but I hope he will accept from me that it would be wrong if, in a few months' time, we discovered that the operation of the legislation had not been given adequate attention at this stage.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Many organisations have stated their opposition to the Bill. Although the Bill was conceived in enormous haste and the Government are attempting to rush it through Parliament, there has nevertheless been a significant amount of lobbying and a considerable number of declarations of opposition. I have received such declarations from the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service, the British Refugee Council, the Immigration Lawyers Association, Rights and Justice, the Iranian Community Centre and many others, including organisations in my constituency, such as the Islington Indian Association.

A common theme of all the objections is that the Government have created difficulties in the way in which they have sought to deal with the Tamil asylum seekers. They have created a racist hype in the media about the problems that Tamil asylum seekers have gone through and they have decided that the best way out is not to consider the causes of the problem or the ways in which, historically, people have sought asylum but to push through this nasty, shameful little Bill. In future, people seeking political asylum in this country will be able to get here only if they have a valid exit permit from their own country, if that is required, and a valid entry document for this country. Those conditions would certainly have excluded many of the people who have gained asylum in this country in the past century.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) pointed out, many Jewish refugees fled from Russia in 1905 and from Nazi Germany in the 1930s. If the Bill had been law at that time, they could not have come here. There are also the victims of the Iran-Iraq war, the Fascist junta in Chile, and so on. The list is endless. The Minister should come clean about it. He should be honest enough to say that he is turning his back on all the asylum problems in the world. The racist connotations of not having anything to do with the problems of the Third world show that the Minister is working in concert with other European Governments to turn their backs on problems which in many cases were created by west European Governments in the first place.

The situation in Sri Lanka is given as the main reason for the Bill, but it is only part of the reason—albeit an important part. In my view, the Tamils have been used as scapegoats. For the past three years the Government have constantly told us that everything is normal and satisfactory in Sri Lanka and that it is quite all right for people to go back there. If that is so, why are so many Tamil asylum seekers leaving prosperous livings in Jaffna, Trincomalee, and other areas of Sri Lanka to come here? I know that some of those who have been granted exemptional leave to remain, although not political asylum, are living in appalling conditions. They are living in utter misery. Have they really left good jobs and careers in Jaffna because they prefer to live in a bedsit in north London, or is there some other reason?

The other reason is the political oppression in Sri Lanka. There is no doubt about that at all. The hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), who clearly has great knowledge of Sri Lanka, constantly maintains that there is no problem, when it is obvious that there is a serious problem. He would do well to talk to those who have sought political asylum here before he makes such sweeping statements.

Mr. Michael Morris: I have never suggested that there is no problem in the north or the east of Sri Lanka. There is fighting going on there day and night. That is common knowledge. I believe that the hon. Gentleman has been to Sri Lanka a couple of times——

Mr. Corbyn: Just once.

Mr. Morris: From even one visit he should know that two thirds of the population live perfectly quietly, Tamils side by side with Sinhalese, Moors and Moslems, and that there are a million Tamils living absolutely harmoniously with their Sinhalese neighbours.

Mr. Corbyn: There are certainly places in Sri Lanka where people live harmoniously together, and there have been times in the past when the whole country has been fairly harmonious. Nevertheless, there have been communal riots on a number of occasions. There were appalling attacks on Tamils in 1983 and there have been appalling problems ever since that time. It does no good to ignore that. It also does no good if the British Government, instead of seeking to bring peace to Sri Lanka, as they claim, are busy training Sri Lankan army officers, supplying arms to Sri Lanka and allowing KMS to recruit mercenaries to go into Sri Lanka. Far from bringing peace, is that not simply stoking up the fires of war, and is that not one reason why the British Government should look at the matter with a little more care?

[Mr. Corbyn]

The build-up to the Bill was especially disgraceful. Considerable numbers of Tamil people have been arriving in Europe to seek political asylum. Some of them are from prosperous backgrounds, while some come from great poverty, but they have one thing in common. They come to Europe with nothing, seeking political asylum. Attempts have been made to place every obstacle in their way, from the visa requirement, to the restriction on interventions by Members of Parliament, to the introduction of the Bill.

When the Home Secretary tried to bundle those asylum applicants out of the country in that disgraceful and hideous way, there was a demonstration at the airport. Fortunately, those people did not leave and the case was referred to the courts. The Home Secretary contested the matter all the way through the courts, and only when he lost did he concede that he has an obligation to examine each case in detail. But he can do nothing with grace, so he introduced the Bill as his method of backing down in the face of the court's judgment.

If only one of those applicants is shown to be a legitimate applicant for political asylum who is subsequently granted refugee status in Britain, the Home Secretary should resign. He is trying to throw out people who may have a legitimate right to be here within the terms of the 1951 convention. We have seen many handstands from the Secretary of State, and if only one of the cases is found to be just, he should resign.

Although the Government have tried to emphasise their anxiety about Tamil asylum seekers, they have failed to notice that other European countries have taken many more Tamil asylum seekers than has Britain. The number involved is extremely small, but I understand that the Government are trying to get together with other European countries to turn their backs on the Tamils altogether. The Indian Government have taken many asylum seekers. The attitude of Europe, led by the British Government, towards asylum seekers in general has been disgraceful. They were heavily censured by Mr. Poul Hartling, the former United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. He said that the growing xenophobia of European Governments and of the European media towards asylum seekers did them no good, and he compared the number of asylum seekers which the poor countries were prepared to accept with the attitude of European Governments.

Although I hope that the Bill will be defeated, I have my doubts in that respect. The Government should think for a moment about the effect that it will have on asylum seekers from other places. Earlier, I mentioned the Iran-Iraq war. I have supported several people who have applied for political asylum, some of whom have had horrendous difficulty in escaping the horrors of that war. They have crossed from Iran to Iraq, fled to a third country and then applied for political asylum here. The Kurdish people, who seem to be persecuted throughout the middle east, would have no opportunity to apply for political asylum here, because they could not get here to do it. They would not have valid exit documents, because in Turkey, even the existence of Kurdistan is denied, never mind the Kurdish language or the use of Kurdish names. If they reached a third country and applied to travel to Britain, they would be caught by the Government's privatisation of immigration law—handing responsibility to the airline—and could not obtain tickets to travel here. What will happen to those people?

It is all very well for the Home Secretary to say repeatedly that Britain can play no part in what is happening in other parts of the world. It is just not true. The British Government play an enormous part in what happens in other countries. I have mentioned the Government's military involvement. The bombing of Kurdish villages in Iraq during the past few weeks originated from NATO bases in Turkey. Britain supplies military equipment to Turkey. Who is supplying arms to the Fascist dictatorship in Chile? The British Government are almost alone in the world in being happy to continue supplying arms to the Government of General Pinochet.

I hope that the Bill will be understood for what it is—a squalid, nasty little measure to refuse the right of political asylum to genuine seekers of asylum. Had the Bill operated from before the first world war, many Jewish people who fled from pogroms in central and eastern Europe or from the horrors of Nazism would not have got into Britain.

The Government say that they are introducing the Bill to crack down on immigration racketeers. That is not true, because the Bill encourages people to use forged documents, provided tht they are good forgeries. Bad forgeries are out, but good forgeries are acceptable.

Mr. Tony Banks: Perhaps the Government could get some advice on forging British passports from Mossad, which seems to be very good at it.

Mr. Corbyn: Absolutely. It is extraordinary that a Bill should be introduced that seeks to differentiate between the standards of forged documents.

Ministers should understand that when people are fleeing for their lives to seek political asylum abroad they will resort to forged documents. Indeed, hero films are made about people using forged documents to get out of Nazi Germany and other places. People make money explaining how these things are done. Is it surprising that they go to immigration racketeers who are prepared to fly them abroad? Films have been made about this. Films were made about events when Israel was founded in 1948.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that the history of the smuggler goes back to the Scarlet Pimpernel?

Mr. Corbyn: Quite. My hon. Friend makes his own point on this.

Nothing is more evil than the exploitation of those who are already exploited, and asylum seekers are, by their definition, already exploited. The Bill does nothing about that evil. It simply makes the victim a victim for the second time—but this time a victim of the British Government.

Many of the organisations which oppose the Bill highlight the need for an independent appeal against decisions made by immigration officers. Until fairly recently, an asylum seeker arriving in Britain who was denied admission by an immigration officer had several courses open to him. He could ask for his case to be put to the Minister, and the Minister would have to consider it. He could ask a Member of Parliament to stop his removal. That was inadequate, but at least it was something. The asylum seeker could also ask for his case to be referred to the UKIAS. Those three safeguards have been removed by the Bill. A member's right to intervene is now apparently a concession which the Minister can remove at any time. Are we satisfied that the Minister will have an even-handed approach to Conservative Members and Labour Members? He certainly did not in the Tamils' case. As cases will no longer be referred automatically to the UKIAS, will its role as an advisory organisation constantly diminish and be brushed aside?

The Bill does not provide ministerial control, but provides for asylum cases to be dealt with by immigration officers at the port of entry. We have debated many times the record of immigration officers at the port of entry and their rather subjective analysis of whom they believe to be trying to evade the immigration laws. It is still the case that there is a much greater likelihood of being stopped and severely questioned at any port of entry if one is coming from Bangladesh than if one is coming from South Africa, Canada or Australia.

In the 34th executive session of the UNHCR, the British Government, unless they now wish to deny it, endorsed the following:

"Recognised the substantive character of a decision that an application for refugee status is manifestly unfounded or abusive, the grave consequences of an erroneous determination for the applicant and the resulting need for such a decision to be accompanied by appropriate procedural guarantees and therefore recommend that . . . an unsuccessful applicant should be enabled to have a negative decision reviewed before rejection at the frontier or forcible removal from the territory. Where arrangements for such a review do not exist, governments should give favourable consideration to their establishment."

The British Government supported that recommendation, but the Bill is the direct opposite of it.

In the third report of the Home Affairs Committee in 1984-85 on "Refugees and Asylum, with Special Reference to the Vietnamese", appeal rights were referred to in recommendation 22, which said:

"The Home Office should decide in principle to extend the right of appeal to all asylum applicants".

The Government responded:

"The main category of asylum applicants without such a right of appeal is those refused entry at the ports. For this category of applicants there are other safeguards: representations by Members of Parliament, judicial review and the UKIAS referral procedure."

The sordid series of statements from the Secretary of State and from Ministers over the past month have taken away all those safeguards. The Secretary of State has said that he is prepared to remove people while judicial review is pending, which means that people cannot stay here. He has already curtailed, and in some cases removed, the rights of Members to make representations and he has removed the UKIAS referral procedure.

I hope that the Bill will be rejected, although I have my doubts about that. As others have said, some of the motives behind the Bill are the sheer racism of the British media, and the worst examples are in the Murdoch press in its reporting of the Tamil asylum applications. The language used was deliberately emotive. The Government have refused to recognise the world concern about the refugees and asylum seekers and the need to do something about them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) spoke about the proposals to bring in prison ships—Hurd's hulks as they will be called. They will be used to hold these people in detention pending investigation of their cases. What greater condemnation can there be of the Government's attitude towards the problems of divided families, or, more important in this debate, asylum seekers and refugees than that the Government should be contemplating spending money buying a ship in which to lock up these people while their cases are being considered?

The House has to look seriously at the problems of asylum seekers. It is no good turning our backs on them and closing our eyes. That will not wish the problem away. The problem is there, for all sorts of complicated political or commercial reasons. Wishing it away will not solve the problem. All that the Minister is trying to do is to appeal to the basic sense of xenophobia in the media, in the country and throughout Europe. They want to turn their backs on the problems of the rest of the world. I hope that there will be a greater sense of civilised values on this side of the House when we come to vote against the Bill than has ever been shown by the Tory party.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Like a number of hon. Members, I declare a partial interest. As has already been said, one hon. Member was a refugee and there are some who are the children of refugees. I am the grandchild of two refugees. My grandfather left the Soviet Union not with papers properly prepared for him by the authorities, but with a bullet inside him.

I am a member of the Race Relations and Immigration Sub-Committee of the Home Affairs Select Committee. My most fulfilling work in Parliament has been serving on that Committee. I have enjoyed the non-political companionship of people deeply dedicated to race relations and to studying dispassionately the immigration laws and the practices that the Government adopt in carrying out those laws. We have not had the sort of histrionics that we heard earlier from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). We have dealt with these matters in a calm and rational atmosphere. The cries of racist bias and of pandering to the vicious majority and so on are not heard. We discuss matters based on facts. The Sub-Committee consists of three Conservative and two Labour Members of Parliament, and we hope that we carry out an honourable role for the benefit of Parliament.

Our report on refugee status and political asylum, with special reference to the Vietnamese, has already been mentioned, but it must be remembered that that report was produced with evidence from 1984 and published at the beginning of 1985. The immigration and refugee statistics that were used as the basis for that report were the figures for 1983. It must be admitted that circumstances have changed since then. Not only that, but the pattern of those asking for refugee status in the United Kingdom has also changed inasmuch as the major problem of the Vietnamese boat people was not that of direct asylum seekers in this country. Those people went to Hong Kong, so the practice today of people actually arriving here in the United Kingdom seeking asylum in large numbers has caused a different picture to be painted and a different set of problems to be faced.

Mr. Bermingham: I am a member of the Sub-Committee and was also a signatory to the report. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that when we considered the report we looked also at the question of eastern European refugees coming, for example, through Austria after fleeing from Czechoslovakia and elsewhere, and that the principles that we enunciated about asylum have not changed in the past three years?

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman is a trusted friend and colleague on the Committee and I value his work greatly. Together we visited the Traiskirchen refugee camp where, for some time, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki) waited while his refugee application was being processed. I do not deny what the hon. Gentleman has said, but he may have misheard me or not quite picked up what I said. The difference has been that over the past three years, instead of dealing with refugee applications from a large number of people in Hong Kong, in the past six months many people have been arriving in the United Kingdom and claiming refugee status at ports of entry. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree with that.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that those who fled here from eastern Europe or Germany in the 1930s, or from South America in the 1970s, came direct to the United Kingdom, made their applications here, and did not use an intermediate stage, as the Vietnamese did?

Mr. Hanley: Yes, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I am talking about the main point of pressure compared with 1984. Then it was the Vietnamese boat people; now it is the Tamils. If the hon. Gentleman casts his mind back a few years, he will recall that the Ugandan Asians were direct applicants to the United Kingdom and were dealt with specially because of that. I am not trying to make any grandiose claims or statements. I am merely setting out the fact that the report, to which the hon. Gentleman is a co-signatory, did not contain any reference to the Sri Lankan situation because that was not then a major problem.

The number of people who applied for refugee status from Sri Lanka in 1983 was 226, more than ten times the previous year. In 1979 there was one applicant from Sri Lanka for refugee status, so the Government are confronted with a very different problem now. The recommendations of the Sub-Committee on Race Relations and Immigration must be seen in the light of the circumstances in the spring of 1985, based on research in 1984. I very much regret the fact that the Liaison Committee cannot find sufficient funds to allow the Sub-Committee to go to Sri Lanka to investigate the matter directly.

While the Sub-Committee was studying these matters, its members spoke to people in a number of European countries—in the Netherlands, where the treatment of refugees and of immigrants of all sorts is second to none, in Belgium, France, Switzerland and Austria. In Switzerland we discovered that 1,800 Tamils had been admitted within the previous four months. I am sure that all hon. Members agree that Switzerland is hardly regarded as particularly racist. It is a welcoming, peace-loving country. We found that the number of Tamils who had gone to Switzerland was so large that the country could not provide for them and was considering expulsion.

One reason why the Tamils were coming so quickly was that they had apparently learnt in West Germany that they were entitled to a daily financial allowance, immediate housing and other rights while their cases were being considered. It is therefore important to consider the countries through which those Tamils had passed. Many had bought tickets through Aeroflot and had then been passed from Sri Lanka to the centre of the Soviet Union, where they changed planes and were taken to Moscow.

Many of the Tamils were then taken from Moscow to East Germany where, in a wicked exploitation of the border position between east and west Berlin, they were passed from east to west Berlin since there are no border controls on those entering west Berlin from the east. Once they were in west Berlin, the numbers were mounting up so greatly that they were passed to West Germany and from there, because the numbers were so vast that there was fear of possible outbreaks of violence in the area where they had been housed, they were passed to Switzerland and to other countries bordering West Germany, including Austria.

Many Tamils coming from Sri Lanka have not been able to prove their refugee status. Many may be able in time to prove that they are genuine refugees, as I am sure will some of the people who have recently arrived in Britain. It is not necessarily true that a person who claims refugee status is entitled to do so. It seems that many Opposition Members do not want to admit that many of the Tamils are jumping on to the bandwagon which, as we can see from the Bill, could hurt genuine refugees. I hope that the Opposition realise that that will be on the consciences of the bogus refugees for the rest of their lives.

The Bill has been introduced because of suspected abuse by many hundreds of people. One important point in the current problem of the 64 Tamils who were to be deported from Heathrow is that they passed through Malaysia and Bangladesh on their way to the United Kingdom. There is no doubt that they would have been safe in Malaysia or in Bangladesh, but there is little doubt that their economic position would be better in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Malaysia is not a signatory to the United Nations convention and that the Tamils were only in the transit lounge at Dhaka airport and never entered Bangladesh?

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman is aware, of course, that both are Commonwealth countries. I should have thought that most reasonable people would recognise that a person who feared for his life in a country such as Sri Lanka would, as soon as he reached Malaysia, welcome the fact that he was not under threat. Is the hon. Gentlaman saying that Malaysia, because it is not a signatory to the United Nations convention, would therefore have persecuted these people? Is he saying that they would have been expelled from Bangladesh?

Mr. Corbyn: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there are cases of people being sent back to Sri Lanka from Malaysia and that, if they had come directly to the United Kingdom, they would have been sent back?

Mr. Hanley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that bogus applicants are sent back, wherever they are discovered?

The benefits that can be claimed by a person with refugee status — some can be claimed even when a person is under investigation — are immense. One can understand the pressure on a person to claim refugee status in a country which he feels will be most generous to him.

It is sad that the right hon. Member for Gorton said that the Government are racist in introducing this legislation for base motives. He should recognise that, in 1984, 50,000 immigrants were allowed settlement in the United Kingdom, 50,000 in 1985 and, provisionally, 47,000 in 1986. Admittedly, that is not as generous as the 70,000 and 80,000 under the Labour Government, but it is certainly not fair to say that the Government are racist when almost 50 per cent. of all those who have been granted settlement in the United Kingdom are immigrants from the Indian sub-continent and from the New Commonwealth. It is certainly not fair to say that the Conservative party is a racist party when last year alone there were 29,000 Sri Lankan visitors.

Mr. Madden: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the figures he has mentioned for 1986 represent the lowest figures in 24 years for those granted settlement in Britain?

Mr. Hanley: I certainly accept that the figures are the lowest for many years, but that is not evidence that the Government are racist. If no people from the sub-continent were allowed permanent settlement, I could understand that accusation. But when I was in India with the Sub-Committee, I asked how many British citizens had been granted nationality in India since 1947. One official told me that there were fewer than 10. Another said that not a single person from the United Kingdom had been granted Indian citizenship. This country's record stands up very well.

This country's record on refugees stands up well also. Some Opposition Members have said that it does not. But since 1979 more than 8,000 individuals from all over the world have been granted asylum in Britain. Perhaps it would be a harsh Government who would say, "If you are granted asylum, stay. If you are not, go." But this Government do not do that. They allow exceptional leave to remain. That is a way of dealing with cases where there is no proven merit for refugee status. Nevertheless, the Government's compassion has allowed people in difficult circumstances to stay, usually in the long term, not temporarily.

In 1985, 907 Sri Lankan Tamils were granted exceptional leave to remain on an annual basis. In 1986, 1,600 Sri Lankans were granted exceptional leave to remain. The Conservative party is not, therefore, a racist party. The Government are not deliberately trying to expel all Tamils who come here. Those figures are in addition to the 20,000 Vietnamese who have come here. Many Opposition Members have said that some of the Sri Lankans want to come here because Britain is a Commonwealth country. I remind them that we have had no connection over the years with Vietnam. The Government's action towards the Vietnamese is purely humanitarian.

I have some assurances to seek from my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State. First, I hope that he will not fine airlines that bring in asylum seekers who are found to be genuine. The powers set out in the Bill are discretionary, not mandatory. Therefore, I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will judge each case on its merits. I hope also that he will not fine an airline where it is shown that it has been a party to bringing a person into the United Kingdom who otherwise would have faced death, torture or persecution. I am sure that in judging each case on its merits my right hon. and learned Friend will meet some of the fears and reservations that have been expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Secondly, I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will advise airlines that, should they be fined for carrying people who should not be allowed into the United Kingdom, the costs should be passed on as a form of contractual term to the agents who organised the parties. Some Labour Members have said that the traffickers in human flesh are not to be punished by the Bill; they have contended that the wrong people will be punished. It is only right that the airlines should pass on their charges to those who have organised such parties. That would be easy to do if the organisers ever tried to arrange a further trip for such passengers. The Sub-Committee has visited Bangladesh and it knows of so-called agents who provide a full package, including forged documents, for their willing customers.

Thirdly, I ask my right hon. and learned Friend for an assurance that asylum seekers will be able to apply for asylum in the United Kingdom at posts abroad. If the 64 Tamils had arrived in Malaysia and had been able to stay locally and have their cases dealt with by the British high commission, that would have been a sensible way of attempting to prove their asylum status. It would have been a sensible way for us to recognise our international obligations under the United Nations convention. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will guarantee that asylum seekers will be able to apply for asylum from third countries. I agree very much with what has been said about the difficulties of applying for valid documents in the country of departure, but I do not believe that in many cases applicants have bothered to ascertain whether they can obtain a visa in Colombo or not.

Fourthly, I ask for an assurance that my right hon. and learned Friend will brief airlines properly on what constitutes a bogus passport or travel document. Members of the Sub-Committee have been privileged and honoured to be able to investigate the department of the Home Office that looks into forged passports. We have been shown films and scientific techniques, many of which are extremely high-tech while some are not. I think that most members of the Sub-Committee, including the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), would agree with me that there are fairly easy ways of being able to spot a bogus passport. When we were at terminals 2 and 3 at Heathrow only two weeks ago we were able to find during one hour—this was agreed with the officials—five bogus passports. A quick eye had spotted one of them, but with a little training one could understand how the bogus passport could also be spotted by an intelligent airline official.

It is important that the airlines are briefed properly without breaching national security. To brief an airline on all the bogus elements that could be introduced to a passport would be to instruct on how to forge more successfully. There is a level of briefing, however—it is a level to which I believe the Bill relates—that is possible and proper. I hope that special video cassettes and training sessions will be introduced at Heathrow so that those involved can be informed properly of the more obvious types of forgery.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am following the hon. Gentleman's arguments closely and waiting to hear whether he believes that it is right in principle that an airline should be put in the position of having to decide whether someone should come to the United Kingdom, with or without documentation. In principle, does the hon. Gentleman think that such a provision is good?

Mr. Hanley: I believe that airlines should be responsible for their passengers. British Airways has to check the validity of the visas of all those who are travelling to the United States. It is a normal procedure. It is remarkable that in the past airlines have not made such cursory checks of passengers on certain routes. Such a checking procedure would be perfectly acceptable and not in breach of any human rights. It would be unfair, however, if airlines and shipping companies were not trained properly to discover certain of the more obvious forgeries. The equipment that can reveal whether the paper of a passport has been altered is extremely cheap. Airlines and shipping companies should have the opportunity of being trained to a level that does not damage our national security.

Fifthly, I ask for an assurance that my right hon. and learned Friend will ask, through his colleagues in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, for proper research to be carried out into the areas from where the refugees come and where they claim to be in danger. My right hon. and learned Friend might remember that I asked him about a week ago whether he had received a report from the high commission in Colombo on the problems in the areas from which the 64 Tamils had originated. He said that he had not at that time. It is vital that we use our Foreign and Commonwealth Office staff with experience of the locality to investigate the problems in the areas from which Tamils and others come. If persons are claiming that their lives are in danger—64 is a large number, and they come from the same area—surely we can use the Foreign and Commonwealth Office staff without endangering anyone very much. If it is held that asylum seekers come from an area where there is no great danger, surely there will be no harm to our own staff carrying out closer investigations in the area.

Much greater use could be made of staff in our posts abroad in trying to find out the genuineness of otherwise of the claimed activities in the areas from which asylum seekers originate.

Sixthly, when the Sub-Committee asked for an appeal procedure, it recommended that it should apply to all serious asylum seekers. It mentioned that bogus applications should be processed as speedily as possible and that research should be carried out into ways of dealing with them. The secondary interview section at Heathrow—the staff of which work extremely hard in difficult circumstances — should be able to conduct speedy investigations into asylum seekers.

I take this opportunity of paying tribute to the staff at our ports of entry, especially in the secondary immigration sections. They have to obtain files from Lunar house, or wherever, at short notice and absorb a tremendous amount of information. They have to use their intelligence and knowledge, which has been accumulated over many years in some instances, along with their experience. We are well served by those people. We are particularly well served by the people who work at Lunar house, who do an extremely difficult job, often reviewing documents and literature from a number of different countries in different languages and from countries where the backgrounds, habits, family ties and so on are so different.

Our system should be praised, not criticised. If, on balance, after a secondary interview, one of our Home Office immigration officers—or if abroad, a Foreign Office entry clearance officer—comes to the conclusion that a person is bogus and that there seems to be no good reason for an appeal to be granted, then speedy departure should be executed. However, that should not be to the country from which the person is claiming asylum because of torture or persecution. The non-refoulement clause, with which we and other nations agree, means that asylum seekers, whether they are bogus or not, should not be sent back to their country of origin. They should at least be given another chance to try again.

The three fail-safe clauses that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary mentioned as the reason why a full appeal procedure should not be upheld were persuasive at the time. The fact that the UKIAS would be able to interview cases where there was genuine doubt, that hon. Members' representations were part of the system, and that judicial review was provided caused the Sub-Committee therefore to accept the Government's conclusions.

In genuine cases where, after secondary interview, we believe that there is merit, there should be an appeal procedure. Those who hear a refugee appeal should be appointed by the Lord Chancellor's Department, not by the Home Office. I am grateful that my right hon. Friend has allowed immigration appeal cases to go to hearings with appointees from the Lord Chancellor's Department.

I still believe that the Bill is necessary, but only as long as it is discretionary and the Government exercise their discretion. I do not believe that the Bill could be justified if it were mandatory. There is not one hint or suggestion from the Government that they intend to do other than exercise their discretion wisely and to consider each case on its merits.

I shall remember tonight's debate for one reason—the speech of the right hon. Member for Gorton. It was a bitter, vicious, twisted and dishonest contribution. It concluded with some of the most disgraceful descriptions of Members of the Government and Conservative Members. The contribution that followed the right hon. Gentleman's was that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) who, in a calm and dispassionate manner, explained the problems in a way that we would expect of right hon. and hon. Members. This problem involves human beings; it is not a matter where cheap political stabs should be made by a cheap political individual.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that on reflection the hon. Gentleman might choose to withdraw that allegation.

Mr. Hanley: I shall withdraw it, but I wish that you had been here to hear his contribution——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was present, but whatever the right hon. Gentleman said at that time does not justify the remark that the hon. Gentleman has just made. I hope that he will withdraw it in an unqualified manner.

Mr. Hanley: I withdraw in an unqualified manner. What remains for the public to read are the words that the right hon. Gentleman used earlier, and I know that they will be as disgusted as I was by his final contribution. He insulted many millions of people in this country who understand that to get better race relations—which we all want—we need an honest and strong immigration policy. It is sad that many Opposition Members seem to believe in an open-door immigration policy, yet they also criticise the Government for unemployment, the lack of health care, the lack of education, and the lack of housing, and they fail to realise the pressures upon all those matters that unrestricted immigration causes.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Hanley: We are dealing with a human problem in a humane way. We shall meet each problem as it arises, but we shall not be guilty of trying to pander to base motives, which the right hon. Member for Gorton was doing.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can see that four hon. Members are trying to catch my eye. I understand that the Front Benches are hoping to start winding up the debate at 9 o'clock. With a little elementary arithmetic, all four hon. Members might get in.

8.26 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): The speech of the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) started with a review of the history of asylum, with which I could not disagree to any great extent, because I was a member of that Sub-Committee. It was with great regret that it degenerated into cant and political ideology and a meandering attack with little or no purpose.

The Bill, once again, is the Government's instant reaction rather than a thought-out solution to a problem. One asks, "What on earth has prompted all of this?" Legislation that is a reaction instead of being thought through is often bad legislation. This legislation says, "If you do not have the right documents the carrier is liable." That does not go to the heart of the refugee or political asylum seeker's problem.

History has shown that those who flee for their lives rarely, if ever, either take enough money or have the right documents. It is difficult in an east European country, a dictatorial state in south America or a dictatorial state in the far east to pop into the British embassy and get the necessary visa. The minute that one pops into the British embassy one tends to get arrested when coming out, because countries of that ilk do not wish to see their citizens flee from their territories. They have no wish to allow them to go. The political refugee is rarely, if ever, a man or woman with money and rarely a man or woman with documentation. How does the airline or ship check the documentation of the political refugee?

This country was once called the cradle of modern democracy. It was the hub of a civilised society that catered for the revolutionary who had fled his native state. It catered for the person who was at ideological war with his native state. Whether that ideological war was from the Left or Right mattered not to this nation. That is how we have had in our time extreme Right-wing and Left-wing dissidents. The House should remember that Karl Marx was once a refugee in this country.

Why is it, in the 1980s, that this country has begun to turn its back on an honourable history of catering for refugees and for those who seek political asylum? I am beginning to wonder—I say this with great sadness—whether this measure has been prompted by the colour of the political refugee. In pandering to that publicity campaign which is engendered by the second-rate media that we have, I wonder whether we do great harm to the true concept of the refugee. What is the ship's captain to do when he comes across a rowing boat which contains people who are fleeing, perhaps, from a far eastern country, a south American country, or from the Eastern bloc? Is he to say, "I say chaps, do you have the documents because if you don't I can't take you on board because that will cost me £1,000 a head."?

Mr. Tony Banks: Perhaps my hon. Friend was not here when I asked the Home Secretary precisely that question. He said that there would be time on a boat for the captain to radio ahead and find out. But what would happen if the captain were told over the radio, "I am sorry, we are not prepared to accept them, so if you bring them in you will be fined £1,000."?

Mr. Bermingham: I would hope that the captain would carry on regardless, but I fear that some ships' captains would not.

I intend to be brief. It is a brief Bill, but it is a sad Bill. It flies in the face of the Geneva convention. It flies in the face of what was said by the Select Committee of which I had the privilege of being a member. Three years ago that all-party Committee of the House recognised that even in the 1980s there was a need to protect political refugees. It seems that because of pressure, a mere three years later there is a pandering to a baying clamouring call at the Home Office door, "Exclude, exclude." In seeking to exclude a small minority of people who are subject to oppression this sledgehammer of a measure will fall upon refugees from the four corners of the earth.

We were once a nation proud of our determination to protect minorities and their rights, and to accept onto our shores those who are oppressed. It is a sad day in 1987 when we seek to exclude all the oppressed.

8.32 pm

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): The crux of the Bill, and the point that Opposition Members, including the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) have missed, is the balance that must be achieved between the right of the genuine asylum seeker and the right of our citizens to be protected from people trying to enter who have no right to come to our country and who are not, in any sense genuine-asylum seekers. It is important to get the balance right. That is what the Bill is about.

Most Opposition Members fail to see the difference between genuine asylum seekers and those who try to abuse the system. During the debate on the introduction of visas they made no discrimination and offered no recognition of the fact that people try to abuse the system in an attempt to come to the United Kingdom. Opposition Members are falling into the same trap tonight.

The Bill arises primarily because of the asylum seekers from Sri Lanka, but we are also talking about people from the Indian sub-continent, for example, who have sought to come here since the introduction of visas. Some have come here without valid visas in their passports. The numbers involved are large. A total of 502 people from India, 255 from Pakistan, 295 from Bangladesh have attempted to come here, but only a tiny proportion of them had valid visas. The majority did not have the required stamp.

[Mr. Geoff Lawler]

There is no political reason why people from those countries should seek to come here, evade immigration controls and abuse the visa system, but they have done that. The Bill tackles that problem, as it does the problem of those who claim falsely that they are asylum seekers.

It is no coincidence that the rapid increase in asylum seekers over the last few months coincides with economic pressure to emigrate from certain countries. The economic pressure is brought about by specific demographic factors and the large increase in the numbers of young men who seek a better economic life elsewhere. The potential for abuse has also increased and it affects the whole Western world.

The abuse is occurring in all countries which are attractive to potential refugees. For example, in Switzerland, whereas in 1980, 80 per cent. of asylum seekers were accepted, by the beginning of 1986 the figure had fallen to 8 per cent. In France the figure was 95 per cent. in 1976, but last year only 43 per cent. were accepted. Denmark, which had a record for never turning away anybody who turned up on its borders claiming to be an asylum seeker, has introduced visas. Belgium, which had 7,500 applicants in 1985-86 and which uses the UNHCR to determine who is genuine — the most unbiased determining body in the world — accepted only 52 of 7,500 as genuine asylum seekers. What more proof could one want that this is a serious problem which affects the whole of the Western world?

Mr. Meadowcroft: By demonstrating the small percentage of acceptances, does the hon. Gentleman not make the point that the system is working? The system is obviously able to discern between genuine and non-genuine cases. If the Home Secretary had had his way, all the Tamils would have been sent back, but when they were examined only a minority were considered to be in danger or to be genuine refugees. The system, if it is allowed to operate, obviously works. It is the Home Secretary who is not discriminating between the two types of case.

Mr. Lawler: The hon. Gentleman misses the point. Although a small number of cases are genuine, many people have gone to great expense not only for their fares but for forged documents. They may have been put in detention so the large majority who are not genuine suffer human misery and expense. Surely it is better to stop that misery occurring and to save that money.

The 64 Tamils who arrived were interviewed and it was deemed that they were not genuine refugees and were to be returned. As other avenues are blocked and tougher immigration controls are introduced it is natural that other means will be found to try to enter a country for economic betterment. There will always be people who are willing to gain entry to a country which they are not entitled to enter, and, unfortunately, there will always be agents who are ready to exploit them and to make the necessary arrangements—for a handsome fee.

Unfortunately, some airlines are ready to transport such people. Surely it is now time to stop these official stowaways and to stop trade in human cargoes. People are being taken round the world when the airlines know that they do not have the required documentation to enter the country to which they take them. It is time to put a stop to that irresponsible attitude.

Some of the Opposition speeches, including those from the Opposition Front Bench, show that in their opinion the airlines are totally incompetent and incapable of inspecting visas. When I go to America my visa is examined at the British Airways desk, or Virgin Atlantic or the desk of whichever airline I am using. I have no reason to doubt that other airlines are capable of assessing whether a person has a visa which at least looks like the genuine article. It is a slur on airlines throughout the world to suggest that they cannot examine documents. Some irresponsible airlines do not check, but responsible airlines have proved that it is possible.

Mr. Tony Banks: What happens when a person has no valid visa and claims, when he—or she—arrives at the airline desk in the country of embarkation, that he is in danger of his life and so wants to escape as a refugee? One is asking the airline to decide whether that person is a refugee. That is different from asking it to examine a person's credentials.

Mr. Lawler: The Home Secretary spelt out the ways in which a genuine refugee can seek to leave his country—he may turn up at the British embassy or consulate in that country. My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) has reminded us that this is a discretionary measure, not an obligatory one.

In supporting the Bill, I am not concerned about the bogus asylum seeker or visitor, nor the middle man who unfortunately profits too much from this trade in human misery. I am concerned about the genuine asylum seeker. Unfortunately as with visas, those who observe the rules are not the ones who cause extra controls to be imposed. However, it is to their benefit in the long run that this measure—as with visas—is introduced.

Opposition Members ignore the fact that if some action is not taken to prevent the abuse it is the genuine asylum seeker who suffers. Let us consider the Tamils. We were given graphic evidence of the racket that was perpetrated to enable those people to enter the country. What is the climate of opinion about other Tamils or any other refugees who may have genuine cause? Unfortunately, great resentment is built up among the home community —of whatever colour. One may talk to Indians, Asians or West Indians of various ethnic origins and discover resentment against people who try to come to the country and evade controls. That feeling must be borne in mind with regard to good race relations in this country, but the Opposition persistently refuse to acknowledge it. They are in great danger of seeking to damage race relations in Britain.

At the next meeting of UKIAS, I hope to be co-opted to the council. I am concerned about the credibility of this organisation and other organisations that have jumped in, feet first, and appear not to practise any discrimination or to recognise that certain people who seek asylum and seek to come here as visitors make bogus claims. I am concerned that those organisations and the Opposition always seek to oppose anything done to protect the genuine visitor or asylum seeker—they seek to oppose every form of control that we impose.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said that he was in favour of firm immigration control—that claim was repeated by other Opposition Members. If they are in favour of such control, it is about time that they spelt out exactly how they would implement that control. Everything that we have done to try to tighten the loopholes has been consistently opposed. The Opposition cannot oppose everything and still claim to be in favour of immigration control without spelling out what alternatives they would implement. How would the Opposition stop bogus asylum seekers or bogus visitors who come here to the detriment of the rest of our community and to the detriment of genuine refugees? If they do not impose any control, they will open the way for racketeers to profit.

The Opposition Front Bench has argued that we are encouraging racketeers because we are asking for better forgeries. The logic of that argument is that we do not need passports—if we have no passports the racketeers are out of a job. That is an absolutely nonsensical argument. We will make life much more difficult for racketeers because some of them will be unable to produce the required goods because their phoney, amateurish work will, I hope, be quickly discovered by airline officials.

In Committee, I hope that we shall have the opportunity to discuss what would happen to someone who requires a visa in an emergency. For example, one of my Muslim constituents may suffer a death in the family. A phone call may be made to Pakistan on a Friday or a Saturday because a visa is urgently required, but the embassy is closed. As a result of this necessary legislation, perhaps some hot line could be set up or access given to the British embassy on a Friday or a Saturday. The same practice could be introduced in other countries from which visas are required. In that way, we could deal with a potential problem in line with assurances given by the Home Secretary at the time when visas were introduced.

In the past financial year, the cost to the British taxpayer of removing those refused entry to the United Kingdom and returned home was £1 million. That figure is not insignificant in itself, but no value can placed on the cost of human misery and the damage done to the rights of genuine asylum seekers by those who try to evade controls and enter the country on bogus claims. If this Bill succeeds in some small way towards making airlines meet their part of the responsibility, it will significantly reduce those costs.

Many speakers have pointed out that the country has had a long history of accepting genuine political asylum seekers. I hope that that tradition will continue. It will continue as long as the threat of abuse is minimised and prevented. For that reason I give the Bill my strong support.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawlor) has accused us of not protecting the genuine asylum seeker. I contribute to the debate purely on the basis of protecting the genuine claimant.

I am interested in the principle of imposing a penalty of £1,000. That figure does not represent damages, compensation or a criminal penalty. Airlines already pay compensation to the Government for detention, and that is a considerable disincentive to carry the wrong people. The figure in this legislation does not represent compensation or a criminal penalty. In British law, it is extremely unusual to have a penalty of this nature.

If I came to the House and said that there ought to be a penalty of £1,000 for anyone causing a death at work through a breach of the Factories Acts, building regulations or the use of construction regulations, it would be opposed by the Conservative Front Bench. If we were to say that those who pollute our rivers and cause untold damage to wildlife as well as to human beings should suffer a penalty, that would be resisted. If we insisted there should be a minimum penalty of £1,000 on those who cause death by dangerous driving, or some other form of extreme anti-social behaviour, it would meet resistance. However, in the context of those who seek political asylum in this country the Government see fit to introduce a mandatory penalty that is unrelated to criminal law.

I am also concerned about the obligation on an airline to be liable to pay a penalty when a person arrives without a visa when he is required to have one under immigration rules. A great many people arrive without being clear, in their own minds, about entry requirements. They arrive as visitors from non-visa countries, but if one questions them closely and their true intentions are discovered, they will probably require a visa.

Let me give the House an example that I dealt with fairly recently. A young girl arrived from an African country and sought entry as a visitor. Her true intention was to stay as long as she could. If she had formed her views, it would have been clear that it was her intention to settle here. Therefore, under immigration rules she was a person who arrived without a visa but who required one because it was her intention to settle here. She was allowed to enter on a visitor's admission. She sought to remain permanently because of the conditions in her home country. Like many people, she told a story that was not as close to the truth as it ought to have been. Like the Cabinet Secretary, she was economical with the truth.

While looking accidentally at some Foreign Office papers, I discovered that the Foreign Office had evidence that the girl's father had been murdered by the African regime that ruled her country and that her foster father was missing and was also believed to have been murdered by the regime. When those facts were made apparent, the Home Office—to its credit—noted them and admitted the girl under the exceptional circumstances provision.

That is an example of someone who had a case for remaining here permanently, but who had not clearly formed the right intention in her mind. If she had been closely questioned in the African country, an airline official might have elicited what I found out when I spoke to her and, therefore, would have denied her entry because she would have required an entry certificate under the immigration rules.

Similar circumstances apply to many people who come as visitors, but intend to stay as students, business men or people of independent means. It would be wrong to introduce penalties where a judgment is involved and clear lines cannot be drawn. No great harm is done by admitting people as visitors and looking at their cases calmly and dispassionately.

If a duty is imposed on an airline, it will sometimes fall on a person who is unqualified to make the required judgment. Sometimes the duty will be exercised by an airline official who is cautious by nature. We have all come across public officials, civil servants and others who are excessively cautious and with whom we get very frustrated.

Some airlines have corrupt officials. I do not want to stigmatise individual countries, but there are some parts of the world where getting on an airline is an exercise in corruption. There are raffles for boarding passes and corruption is rampant. The Minister knows the countries to which I am referring and he ought to understand that the Bill will be another reason for corruption, not among those who, according to Ministers, want to cheat our system, but among those who operate the screening system. Should the screening system be at the door of the concentration camp or prison, or should it operate in the United Kingdom, where cases can be dealt with more calmly?

I talk with some feeling about refugees because the British Refugee Council has a residential hostel in my constituency and I have to deal with refugee cases, week in and week out. I have thought back over the cases that I have dealt with for the British Refugee Council and as a constituency Member and asked myself whether people who seek political asylum here should have to go through a trial by ordeal. Along with the penalty, we are almost reintroducing a medieval process.

People will have to go to British posts in the country that they are seeking to leave or take the risk of putting their case before an airline and getting it to take a chance. I remember a woman who was eventually admitted to the United Kingdom, after I had had a long argument with the Home Office. She was seeking refuge from the Soviet Union. Should she have gone to the British embassy in Moscow or taken a chance with Aeroflot? In many cases the airline is controlled by the Government from whom a person is seeking to escape. The right way was the humane way adopted by the Government. They considered the case carefully in this country.

We are told that people should make applications for visas and explain their case in the country from which they are attempting to escape. However, only this morning we heard on the news that some East Germans have been sent to prison for making inquiries at the West German embassy about emigration to West Germany. That is a good example of what may happen to people who have to run such a gauntlet. Not only were those people denied entry to West Germany, but they were imprisoned.

I have dealt with several applications for political asylum from people from Afghanistan. Are they really expected to present their case to the British post in Kabul or to take their chance with an airline coming out of Afghanisatan? It is a preposterous idea.

In some countries there is no British post. Some years ago the British Government and many others closed facilities in Haiti when Duvalier was in control, because they had so many applicants for political asylum. Ambadassors were stationed round Haiti and merely sent in on visits. It is cruel to suggest that people should make application in the country from which they wish to escape.

Ministers fail to understand the communications problems in many countries. We have two or three posts in Nigeria and a couple of posts in Ghana, but anyone who has tried to travel by road in Ghana will know that it is extremely difficult to get from one end of the country to the other. A person could exhaust all his savings and resources in making a journey to an embassy which, as far as I remember, does not even operate an appointments system.

The right way to handle the matter is to allow people to come to this country to present their case for political asylum and for us to examine it dispassionately. When people present a case for political asylum, it should be dealt with as quickly as possible. If a person comes here and presents a case for remaining and the case is dealt with slowly—it can take a year or two—the person becomes accustomed to living here and finds it extremely difficult to leave if the application is turned down for genuine reasons. In addition, the longer that a person coming from a country ruled by a dictator stays in this country, the greater becomes the risk of persecution if he has to go back. The finger of suspicion is pointed at people who spend a long time in another country and are known to have made an application for political asylum.

Another reason why the idea of making an application in the country from which a person hopes to escape is unsatisfactory is that ambassadors and diplomatic officials are loth to disturb cordial, if not friendly, relations between the British Government and the country from which political asylum is sought. It is natural that an ambassador will not want his staff to give political asylum visas to people from the country to which he is accredited. It will make his job much more difficult.

I can quite understand diplomatic officials refusing entry in those circumstances. That is why it is necessary to allow these matters to take place here. Even then, it is well understood that the British Government are often loth to give political asylum even to people from Russia, East Germany, Poland, Hungary and so on because they do not want to queer the pitch with a country with which they may have trade agreements or with which they are trying to establish a more cordial relationship. The Foreign Office and the Home Office often say, "We shall not give you political asylum, but we shall grant you leave to remain here under exceptional circumstances." That is political asylum by a nod and a wink, which does not queer relations between this country and other countries.

Mr. Bidwell rose——

Mr. Fraser: I shall not give way. I am bound to try to finish my speech by 9 o'clock.

If the problem of those who, rightly or wrongly, seek political asylum in this country were one of Californian film directors arriving at Heathrow, or of nabob Indian princes, or the modern equivalent of the Phanarian princes of the Ottoman empire, we would not be faced with the Bill at short notice. The inescapable conclusion is that we have such a Bill because people come from the poorer parts of the world.

Why the necessity for speed? Time and again, in our constituencies, as political parties, as the House, we face injustice. When we ask for time, we do not get it, and no rapid Bills are introduced. If we must make a choice, why put the person who seeks asylum at risk? There are adequate penalties already. A quick, objective, dispassionate examination of cases here is the answer. The Bill is wholly unnecessary and will be gravely understood in many parts of the world, to the disadvantage of the reputation of this country.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): To clear up any misunderstanding I make it clear at the outset—otherwise, Conservative Members will claim not to be clear on the point—that Labour Members believe in firm immigration control, but not immigration control that is racially or sexually discriminatory. I further make it clear that, of course, we are against racketeers who make money out of unfortunate people who wish to claim political asylum. I accept that the refugee problem is growing. Indeed, we have only to look at Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong—a territory, which, after all, is our responsibility—to realise how difficult the problem can be. I do not believe that we have addressed ourselves as firmly to the problem of Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong as we should have. I was interested in the speech made by the right hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison). I shall read it again carefully tomorrow. It casts at least some doubts on the Government's approach to the difficulties that have been described.

I have three concerns about the Bill. First, it is unsound in principle. Secondly, it will not work sensibly in practice. Thirdly, it has not been properly thought out. The press release issued by the Home Office, and indeed most hon. Members' speeches, suggest that the Bill is concerned only with refugees. However, on examination, one can see that it goes wider than that. I contend that some of the respects in which it has not been properly thought out relate to its impact on groups other than refugees.

If the Bill is given a Second Reading, what will be the arrangements for its further stages? Will it be debated in Committee on the Floor of the House or in Standing Committee? If on the Floor of the House, how soon and for how long will it be debated? Some hon. Members are concerned about the details, and want to be sure that there is adequate time in Committee to go properly into the details and not just rush through them.

The Bill has been reprinted. The second version of the Bill states:

"To be substituted for Bill previously delivered."

"Note: This Bill is being re-issued because Clause 1(5) was not printed in italics."

That is fair enough, but there is another difference between the two versions of the Bill to which the Minister did not refer. The latest version of the Bill states "A.D. 1987." The first version of the Bill stated "A.D. 1985." I wonder whether the Bill has been lying in the Home Office for a couple of years and has just now been trotted out. If so, has the misprint been hidden by an attempt to justify the second printing of the Bill? Perhaps I have an unduly suspicious mind. [Interruption.] The Ministers may laugh, but I think that they have been caught out.

There are other issues. I wonder whether the reason for the swift introduction of the Bill was the arrival of the 58 Tamils. I share the suspicion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that questions of electoral advantage underlie the hasty introduction of the Bill. I have before me a letter from the Home Secretary. It begins, "Dear Colleague." I hasten to say that I was not one of the colleagues to whom the letter was sent—nor, I am sure, were any of my hon. Friends. I believe that it was sent only to Conservative Members. It refers to the Home Secretary's justification for the Bill and to his view that increasing numbers of people from the Third world have become footloose.

The letter then refers to the five countries for which visa restrictions were imposed and refers to "the five countries from which the bulk of the mischief was coming."

The letter continues in a similar vein on a later page. It says:

"Sri Lanka just happens to be the main sore point at the moment."

It is a revealing letter that was sent to the Home Secretary's own hon. Friend's about the basis of the Bill. The Home Secretary looks at me in some astonishment. I have the letter here, if he wants to see it.

What is the real need for this measure? The Government already have the power to impose on airlines the cost of detention and the return fares. If the Government are certain that the Bill will achieve what they say they want it to achieve, I cannot understand why the Home Secretary is also anxious to acquire a ship to provide more detention accommodation. That point was clearly highlighted in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). At the very least, it seems to be a belt and braces exercise by a Government who are not entirely certain that this measure will have the intended effect. Or is it simply, as the Minister of State said in a speech in the House in October of last year,

"The problem facing immigration control over the past year could not have been solved by extra staffing. There is insufficient detention accommodation."—[Official Report, 27 October 1986; Vol. 103, c. 132.]

This country has traditionally been a haven for refugees. I refer to those who may have feared persecution for their religious or political beliefs, or for other reasons. However, in recent years we have taken very few asylum seekers, compared with other countries. In fact, 95 per cent. of refugees in recent years have gone to Third world countries. That helps to put the problem into perspective. My information is that in recent years Pakistan has taken over 3 million refugees and that the Sudan has taken over 1 million refugees. Compared with that, the number of refugees that Britain has taken is very small. According to the Government, we have taken 2,500 Tamils, compared with over 8,000 refugees who have gone to Holland and 20,000 to both France and Germany.

According to the figures that have been published by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Britain is very low down the league table in the number of asylum seekers that we have accepted, compared with other European countries. According to these figures, in the first six months of 1986 we took just over 1,000, out of over 80,000 for the whole of Western Europe. That figure is very much below the figues for countries such as Denmark, which took three times that number, Germany, which took 42,000, and most other countries which took more refugees than we did.

We must keep the problem in proportion and not become quite so hysterical as some people are at the thought that a few hundred people have applied for admission to this country. Of course we have to separate those who are genuine from those who are bogus, but we should not be quite so outraged when we remember that we have taken only a few refugees, whereas most other west European countries have taken far more.

As for the precise effect of the Bill on refugees, when the Minister of State referred in his speech to the 58 or 64 Tamils, he made a great deal of the fact that some of them had come with inadequate or forged documents. However, in a recent hearing before an adjudicator concerning an appeal against an asylum refusal by someone from an African country, the Home Office presenting officer said:

"How can you be a genuine refugee? You state on your own evidence that you acquired a passport validly obtained; how can you be a refugee?"

The Government cannot have it both ways. They cannot allow their officials to cast doubt on whether an applicant for asylum status can be such if he happens to have a passport, and, at the same time, claim that the Tamils who arrived cannot be genuine because they did not have proper passports. The Government are trying to have it both ways and they should not be able to do so. A happy footnote to that problem is that the appellant in the case that I quoted was successful and was allowed to remain in this country.

Turning to the more specific issue of the 58 Tamils, the Minister has said in the House on several occasions that none of them had a claim to stay as a refugee. Indeed, he was so certain of that that he deliberately short-circuited all the safeguards that the Government had claimed for people coming here as refugees. Other hon. Members have already referred to the report of the Home Affairs Sub-Committee and to the fact that there were three safeguards: the representation that could be made by Members of Parliament; judicial review; and UKIAS referrals. The Government have sought to prevent all three coming into force for those people.

However, to my mind there is now pretty clear evidence that at least some of those 58 Tamils had been beaten or tortured in Sri Lanka before they left. Some Conservative Members have cast doubt on that, but I have before me a statement from a doctor in Sheffield who examined six patients at Foston Hall in Derbyshire on 26 February. I believe that that is where many of those Tamils are currently being held. Although I do not want to detain the House to the extent of reading through all those reports, there seems enough evidence in that doctor's statement to suggest that several of the Tamils had been beaten in detention in Sri Lanka and that some had been tortured. Therefore, they appear to have a genuine claim for asylum status in this country. Indeed, the UNHCR in London is prepared to say that at least some are mandatory refugees; that is to say, they should have an undisputed right to claim asylum under the United Nations convention.

Mr. Wheeler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Can he explain why those people did not exercise their right to become refugees in the land that they arrived in first? I believe that, in the first instance, that was Malaysia and, in the second, Bangladesh, where presumably they would have been perfectly safe. Why did they move from two countries of safety to a third?

Mr. Dubs: I cannot answer that in detail—it is one of the issues that UKIAS is considering at the moment—except to say that I understand that neither Malaysia nor Bangladesh is a signatory to the United Nations convention on refugees. Therefore, those people would not have had an assurance that they would not be returned to Sri Lanka from those countries. Indeed, that is why their removal to Bangladesh at this stage has been opposed by people who say that that would be a short step to their being returned directly to Sri Lanka. That is part of what the argument has been about.

Therefore, I do not think that the fact that, in this instance, they went to one or two countries on their way is evidence that they could have sought asylum there. In contrast, when people come to this country from India and return there, they normally would be safe in India. That is why their security in India is not called into question, whereas the security of such people in those other two countries is called into question from time to time, and has been in this instance.

Mr. Michael Morris: Is it not a fact that Malaysia, as a member of the Commonwealth with Sri Lanka, does not require a visa for entry and that, like so many others, these Sri Lankans could have stayed in Malaysia?

Mr. Dubs: I am not aware that they could have stayed in Malaysia. I repeat that my understanding is that Malaysia is not a signatory to the United Nations convention. Therefore, there is not the safeguard that there might be in some other countries that those people would be safe if retured there. All that is the basis of an investigation into their particular claims and will no doubt come to light in due course.

In contrast to what some Conservative Members suggested earlier, there is evidence that some of those people were tortured and beaten up in custody in Sri Lanka and that the UNHCR believes that some are mandatory refugees. If they were returned to Bangladesh it is likely that they would be sent directly back to Sri Lanka, and Home Office Ministers do not deny the accuracy of that.

It is of particular regret that for the future the Home Secretary has said:

"there will be cases which will not be referred to UKIAS . . . therefore applicants for asylum can have no expectation in future that as a result of the arrangement arrived at in 1983 or otherwise there will in their cases be such a reference."—[Official Report, 3 March 1987; Vol. 111, c. 733.]

One consequence is, presumably, to prevent applications for judicial review in future. The reason why a judicial review was embarked on and why the courts upheld the rights of the Tamils was, perhaps, the Home Secretary had not adhered to his procedure. Now he has changed the procedure so that in future he will not be as embarrased as he was over the Tamils.

We do not condone bogus refugees or racketeers who exploit refugees for financial gain, but people applying for asylum have the right to have their cases considered fairly. Surely that is what the argument is about, because the Minister tried to prevent the cases of the Tamils from being considered. He will admit that they all had a brief interview—some people say not more than 20 minutes and others only 10 minutes—and much of the background in the case of each Tamil did not come out in the interview. Yet the Home Secretary decided to remove them without having the sort of information that he should have had.

We have a right to ask the Government several important questions and, indeed, some have already been asked. First, how can a genuine refugee gain entry to the United Kingdom? In his speech the Home Secretary suggested several possible ways, but most of them would not apply to the Tamils. In reply to a question from the right hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) I quoted a letter from the British high commission in Colombo to an applicant. It states:

"You have applied for entry clearance with a view to admision to the United Kingdom as a refugee but there is no provision in the immigration rules for entry clearance to be granted for this purpose."

That makes it clear why people, such as the Tamils, could not be considered for visas, had they applied to the British high commission in Colombo.

The Minister may reply, "There is a limited provision for hardship cases." How many people have been granted a visa to enter the United Kingdom under the hardship category? We know the numbers of people from Sri Lanka who have been granted visas to come here on holiday, but how many have been granted entry under the hardship category? I doubt whether the Minister can find more than one or two. No doubt he will tell us when the time comes. By telling people that they must have the right documentation before they can step on a plane, many people who would like to prove that they are genuine asylum seekers will not have that chance. Therefore, we shall be slamming our doors on those who are entitled to be considered as genuine refugees.

Secondly, even if a traveller on arrival in the United Kingdom eventually proved that he or she is a genuine refugee, what is to stop the airline nevertheless being fined? Many hon. Members have said that the fines procedures is discretionary, but it is a curious law that says, "Don't worry too much, if they are hardship cases, we shall not apply the law." That is not how it will work. The fact that there is a threat of a fine on airlines will mean that, if they are in doubt, they will say no. People will therefore be kept out. I should still like the minor assurance that if somebody comes here and proves to be a genuine refugee, the airlines will not be fined.

What instructions and guidance will the Home Office or the Foreign and Commonwealth Office give airline staff all over the world? Our immigration procedures are pretty complicated. I doubt whether any hon. Member, including Ministers, understands them fully, but we are asking airline staff to make quite difficult judgments at counters overseas about how our immigration procedures work. It is therefore no wonder that the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) asked a few quite sensible questions about how the Bill will affect airlines. I hope that the Minister of State will answer them.

Will the Home Office give airline staff guidance? Will British Airways and British Caledonian be given a little do-it-yourself guide to immigration rules and procedures? How are they to administer these new provisions?

It seems that the Bill is even more muddled than I have so far demonstrated, as its scope goes beyond refugees. We have already discussed the fact that it will apply to anybody who comes with an obviously forged passport, but what about non-visa countries? It is not clear to me after close examination of the Bill whether it is intended to apply simply to visa countries as defined in the appendix to the immigration rules, or whether it will apply to other countries, the citizens of which require a visa to enter the United Kingdom for certain purposes.

I have looked pretty carefully at the Bill and at the legislation to which it refers. Clause 2(2) says:

"In this Act any expression which is also used in the Immigration Act 1971 has the same meaning as in that Act."

Section 33(1) of the Immigration Act 1971 provides:

"'entry clearance' means a visa, entry certificate or other document".

The Bill refers only to visas. I presume, therefore, that it deliberately does not mention entry certificates. If I am wrong, the Minister of State will say so.

There are circumstances, however, such as are laid out in paragraph 27 of the immigration rules, in which people coming to the United Kingdom to seek employment have to have a visa. The possession of a work permit does not absolve the holder from complying with visa requirements. People can in theory get work permits for the United Kingdom from any country and people coming for work must have a visa.

It is therefore likely that airline staff would have to establish the purpose of a journey to discover whether the intending traveller ought to have a visa. A visitor from the United States, for example, could be coming on holiday, in which case he or she would not require a visa, and would therefore just buy a ticket. If, however, an American wants to work here, my understanding of the immigration rules is that he or she requires a visa.

This is a pretty complicated predicament to put before airline staff. They will have to elicit the purpose of the visit before deciding whether a person can travel. I hope that it is not as absurd as that. I simply put the question because it is the only interpretation that I can reach.

The danger is that airline staff will play safe and say, "This is a nightmare for us. It is far too complicated, so let's say no." Home Office Ministers have talked about other countries with systems of fines. I think that they will find, however, that those countries have a more or less universal visa regime. I do not advocate such a system, but it is certainly clearer for airline staff because there is then only one question—whether the passenger has a visa—and the dilemma remains only for refugees. We do not have a universal visa regime, so the burden on airline staff will be greater. The Minister said that there was nothing exceptional about fines and listed other countries with such a system, but I believe that several have special safeguards for refugees. The United States and Canada have a different approach, as do Denmark and Australia. Our system will be far more rigid. That is another reason why the Opposition are so concerned about the effects of the Bill.

The United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service has been harshly criticised, although it was well defended by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). All the information that I have shows that under the existing procedures UKIAS does not make representations if a claim is obviously not genuine. Moreover, it has traditionally not made representations regarding asylum seekers coming via India because there was no reason for people to fear persecution if they were returned there. In other countries, however, such safeguards do not apply. Of the latest 50 cases in which UKIAS was involved, it made no representations in 22 cases. Of the remaining 28 cases, 13 were granted leave to remain, four were refused and 11 are still pending. I believe that UKIAS has behaved extremely responsibly in this matter. I hope that the Minister will confirm that and not allow a slur on its reputation to remain.

I believe that there is great merit in the Sub-Committee's suggestion that there should be an appeals system in this country. The Government rejected that recommendation when it was made, but I believe that they should have examined it again in detail before introducing this legislation. If, as they claim, refugee pressure is increasing throughout the world we should devise a fair and decent system. I believe that the best course would be an appeals system here. The procedure could be speeded up to filter out people with no prima facie case so that the system does not become clogged. I believe that that would be a sensible and proper path. We should be devising a method of identifying genuine asylum seekers, which is at the heart of the problem.

[Mr. Dubs]

If the Government will not accept that solution, I hope that they will consider more sympathetically the role played by UKIAS in the past and allow it to continue in the future. The worse possible option is simply to slam the door on people who may be in danger for their lives and say that they cannot come here unless they can find some convoluted way of getting the necessary documentation together. In practice, the Government's action will fly in the face of the long established tradition whereby this country has provided a haven for people in genuine fear for their lives. The Government are slamming the door on that tradition. That is why many of us will vote against the Government and in favour of the Opposition's reasoned amendment.

9.29 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): We should be grateful to the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) for the helpful, restrained and sensible way in which he summed up the debate—so very different from the thoroughly unbecoming way in which the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) opened our proceedings, when he imputed evil motives to all and sundry and then skulked away without having the grace to stay to hear what Members of this House think of right hon. Members who behave as disgracefully as he did.

Mr. Dubs: I defend what my right hon. Friend said and the fact that he informed the Home Secretary in advance as to why he had to go away. When such an apology is given, the Minister of State should not be so churlish as to refuse to accept it.

Mr. Waddington: When a right hon. Gentleman telephones and says that he will be absent from the latter stages of the debate, one does not imagine from that message that he will spend his time in the debate making personal attacks on right hon. and hon. Members.

The Government are taking action to meet a serious threat to immigration control. We are taking action as other countries have been forced to take action. Today, more and more people can travel, and more and more people realise that, by travelling, they have a chance to improve their lot abroad. They or the agents to whom they go for advice have not been slow to realise that the willingness of Western countries to grant asylum to vicitms of persecution can be exploited to the advantage of people who are not refugees, but economic migrants. That point was made forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris).

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) said, the British people are rightly proud of our treatment of refugees. When we think of the Hungarians who came here in 1956, the Chileans who came here after 1973, the Vietnamese and the Iranians, we can be proud of our record. But nothing could be more damaging to the interests of genuine refugees and nothing more damaging to community relations than for the idea to get about that our hospitality was being exploited and nothing was being done about it. We owe it to genuine refugees to ensure that, while their interests are secured, those who try to abuse the system do not get away with it.

We observe the convention meticulously and will continue to do so. But there are some misconceptions as to what we are obliged to do and what we are not. First, we are obliged to give asylum to someone outside his own country who does not wish to return there because he has a well-founded fear of persecution. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees wants us to go very much further; he says that we should also give sanctuary to those who are "of concern". For instance, the UNHCR says that no one should be returned to Sri Lanka, whether a refugee or not. That should be borne in mind during our deliberations.

In The Times the other day, a Mr. Plender said that the argument between the Government and the UNHCR was not about numbers but about fair procedures. He was entirely wrong, because for a long time the UNHCR has been urging us to go much further than the convention and grant refuge to people who clearly are not covered by the terms of the convention. The House knows that we have recongised that there may be people who, although not convention refugees, should not be returned to the place from which they have come, and we have given many such people exceptional leave to remain. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) for emphasising that.

We do not and could not accept that anyone who turns up here from a troubled part of the world, such as Sri Lanka, can stay; yet that is what the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) suggested. How that is reconcilable with the cry that has come from Labour Member after Labour Member that they believe in firm immigration control, I do not understand. The absurdity of the proposition was emphasised by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South.

Mr. Bidwell: The right hon. and learned Gentleman alludes to those who have been allowed to stay, but is it not the case that the time is limited? In other words, it is not permanent leave to say stay, but limited leave to remain for 12 months. That shows that the Home Office has not made up its mind. The way in which the Minister referred to this exceptional leave suggests that it is not that way. The fact that the Home Office engages in such activity shows how difficult it is to determine whether one has refugee status. It was to this that I referred when I intervened in the speech of the Home Secretary.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension because a refugee does not have indefinite leave to remain but leave to remain for a definite period. Somebody who gets exceptional leave to remain gets his stay extended on an annual basis and eventually, if conditions in his country have not improved, he is allowed to stay permanently.

Mr. Madden: As the Minister chose to refer to me, I would be pleased if he would refer accurately to what I said. At no stage did I say that all refugees who seek to come here should be allowed to enter. I argued, I thought clearly, that there should be a speedy and effective appeal system to which applicants for asylum would be referred and through which their applications would be dealt. If applications are found to be justified then they should be allowed to enter, and if found to be bogus they should not be allowed to enter. I would have thought that that would be clear to anybody who listened carefully to my speech.

Mr. Waddington: I understood the hon. Gentleman also to say the first thing.

We are obliged to examine claims for asylum. We are not obliged to give someone refused asylum on arrival here a right to appeal to an independent authority before removal. I shall try to explain why successive Governments have not gone down that road of giving a right of appeal to someone who is refused recognition as a refugee at a port of entry.

There were 28,000 port refusals in 1986. If there had been a right of appeal against refusal, each one of those 28,000 could have put up his hand and said, "If you refuse me entry, I shall utter the magic word 'asylum'." Each would then have had the right of appeal. That is the critical reason why successive Governments have shied away from giving a right of appeal to unsuccessful claimants for asylum.

Experience abroad shows what happens when one gives that formal right of appeal. In Canada, as the result of such a right of appeal, recently, even after the Canadian authorities had worked out what they called "a fast track system" to deal with what was thought to be abusive claims to asylum, so great was the pressure of the system that eventually they had to introduce other measures.

There is a very good reason why, over the years, successive Governments have shied away from giving a right of appeal in this country. It is not apparent to me yet how such a system could work in practice. Where it has operated abroad, it has usually resulted in the most appalling problems.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes was entirely right when he referred to the report in 1985 by the Sub-Committee on Race Relations and Immigration, mentioned that it was based on evidence taken in 1984 and talked of how much the position had changed since then.

Mr. Tony Banks: Surely the Minister cannot be seriously suggesting that a significant number of the 28,000 people refused entry in this country would then have said that they were going to claim refugee status. The overwhelming majority were people coming here as visitors, who were then refused entry. I have a file in my constituency — I have put many of these cases to the Minister — showing that people, having been refused entry, make a voluntary departure. The Minister cannot seriously claim that a significant number of those 28,000 claimed refugee status.

Mr. Waddington: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is not being honest with himself. There is an argument, which is going on even now, that we should give a right of appeal in this country to people who are refused entry as visitors. I ask hon. Members to face this question. If we continue to resist the plea to give a right of appeal in this country to people who are refused entry as visitors, how on earth can we give a right of appeal in this country to those who are refused entry as asylum seekers? It is plain as a pikestaff that those whom the Opposition are always saying should have a right of appeal in this country as visitors would procure for themselves that right of appeal as visitors as a result of uttering that magic word "asylum", which would then give them access to the appeals procedure.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Waddington: I should like to continue for a little while.

We are obliged to give asylum to those with a well-founded fear of persecution. We are not obliged to give refuge to those who come from troubled parts of the world. Under the convention, we are obliged to examine claims to asylum. We are not obliged to give someone refused asylum the right of appeal before removal, and I do not believe that we could do so. We are certainly not obliged — I may be coming closer to the point about which the hon. Member of Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) wished to ask me — to refer cases to the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service. In fact, the present system of referral to UKIAS started in only 1983. No one says that we were in breach of the convention before then. Indeed, in 1981, long before the system of reference to UKIAS was set up, the UNHCR accepted that our procedures then conformed with its recommendations.

Mr. Corbyn: The Minister will recall that his Government supported the executive committee of the UNHCR recommendations that there should be consideration of an appeal against refusal of asylum in each country and that, in defence of the report on Vietnamese refugees by the Home Affairs Select Committee, the Government pointed out that there existed the right to go to UKIAS, the right to go through a Member of Parliament to the Minister concerned and the right for the case to go to judicial review? Since all those avenues have been removed by the Bill, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman concede that the only defence for an asylum application would be if there was a right of appeal?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman knows as well as every other hon. Member that things have moved on apace since 1985. I do not believe that anyone thought in 1985 that all the countries of Western Europe would be faced with the sort of problems that now beset them.

I am sure that we are all grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) for his contribution to the debate. We know that he speaks with authority. He had to bear the responsibilities that now are mine, but he did not have to do so for quite so long, which means, no doubt, that he is more mentally alert now than I am. He did not suffer quite the same hardship. We listened with great attention to what he had to say. I can tell him that we shall not abolish the referral system. We feel, however, that it must be examined. I am going to meet UKIAS before very long. I cannot tell my right hon. Friend what progress the Bill will have made by the time that we reach conclusions. We shall not let the grass grow under our feet, however, and I shall be more than happy to talk to my right hon. Friend as matters proceed.

I see difficulties in my right hon. Friend's suggestion that however abusive an application appears to be, UKIAS should be consulted. As my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) said, time is of the essence. That is the answer to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) who asked "If a case for refusal is stong, why not refer it to UKIAS?" He wanted to know what would be lost by not doing so. The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) could not have been more wrong when he said that no harm would be done by somebody being admitted as a visitor and all these matters being resolved later. It is the experience of all

[Mr. Waddington]

Western countries that once someone establishes a foothold, he is difficult to dislodge. Those who have no genuine claim to asylum manage eventually to stay in the country to which they have gone merely as a result of the effluxion of time. That is a real difficulty that we must all face.

Mr. Meadowcroft: How does the Minister protect himself from the charges that, by not referring to UKIAS, he is excluding the possibility of it making a judgment that is different from his own? Surely there is protection for the Minister as well as for the person who is seeking asylum. It is the arrival of the Tamils which has sparked off the introduction of the Bill, and although the right hon. and learned Gentleman has suggested that the UNHCR is changing the definition, a minority of them have been adjudged by the UNHCR to be refugees within the terms of the 1951 convention. That would not have been the position if the Minister had had his way and not referred them. How does he protect himself against that charge?

Mr. Waddington: My right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury found it possible to protect himself when he was performing the duties that I now carry out. That was before there was any system of reference to UKIAS. Before it was possible to make that reference, there was confidence in the integrity of the refugee unit within the Home Office. There was confidence that its conclusion would be right. That is how things operated in the early days. I do not understand the hon. Gentleman's arguments.

Hon. Members have been rightly concerned about the possible effect of the Bill on genuine asylum seekers, which has been the main issue during the debate. The Bill will make it more difficult for people to travel without proper documents and then use our generous procedures to establish a foothold. Until recently, the vast majority of asylum seekers were not those who just turned up at ports, and a moment's thought tells us why. Since the second world war, our neighbours in western Europe have not, thank God, been creating refugees. We have not been the nearest safe country to a refugee-granting state, and those genuinely fleeing from persecution normally seek refuge in the nearest safe country. Indeed, it is the nearest safe country that has the duty to protect them.

I agree entirely with my hon. Friends the Member for Westminser, North and Northampton, South on this issue. There is nothing mysterious about millions of refugees arriving in Pakistan. Why are there millions of refugees in Pakistan? Because they have escaped from Soviet aggression in Afghanistan.

Mr. Tony Banks: Millions?

Mr. Waddington: The nearest safe country of refuge is Pakistan. There is no mystery in the flow of Tamils to south India from Sri Lanka. Indeed, one might expect that if a Tamil living in north Sri Lanka was unsuited to the life he was facing, the place to which he would go would be southern India.

We do not gain much by trying to draw parallels with the situation, for instance, in Germany before the war. The situation with which we are faced could not be more different. We are not faced with a flow of people claiming refugee status from countries close to us; we are faced with a flow of people claiming refugee status who — sometimes for almost inexplicable reasons — have travelled halfway around the world to choose Britain as a place to go.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): It would be of great help if my right hon. and learned Friend could assure me that if a refugee from Soviet Russia arrives with forged papers—often, that is the only way that a refugee can arrive—those papers will not be an automatic reason for refusal of asylum.

Mr. Waddington: I can give my hon. Friend that undertaking.

Asylum seekers have almost entirely come from three categories. The first is people who have been here for a while—for instance, students who have been here since before the fall of the Shah who are now coming to the end of their studies and who have decided that their country has changed out of all recognition. The next category is those who have applied to come here at one of our posts abroad on the basis of a close connection with this country, and I shall return to that in a moment. Then there are people who have come here as part of a carefully worked-out programme which was engaged in by the Government of the day, the sort of programme whih resulted in Hungarians, Chileans and Vietnamese coming here.

I shall deal with the question of applications to our posts abroad. I assure my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury that there is no difficulty in getting to our high commission in Colombo. Indeed, far from it being ringed by soldiers, there is normally one policeman outside. It is obvious that there is free access to our high commission in Colombo, because in the first seven months of 1986 1,070 Tamils were granted entry clearance. They are not the hardship cases; I am now talking about ease of access to the high commission.

A person cannot claim refugee status in our high commission in Colombo if he is a Sri Lankan because, by definition, a refugee is somebody who is outside the country to which he fears to return. The basis on which anybody would claim entry to this country would be on the basis not of entitlement to asylum, but of hardship. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), the former Home Secretary, said in mid-1985, we have always been willing to hear applications in Colombo from Sri Lankans on the basis of hardship. Since then, 51 people have applied for severe hardship visas, five have been issued, 32 refused and 14 are pending.

Mr. Tony Banks: Very generous.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman says that that is not generous, but the point that is being made is that people cannot apply to our high commission in Colombo. The opposite is the truth. People do apply to our high commission. However, a Sri Lankan cannot apply for refugee status in Sri Lanka and hope to succeed. What he can do is apply at one of our posts outside Sri Lanka. That right is still available to Sri Lankans. They can apply at posts in Madras, Delhi, Bombay, Kuala Lumpur and Dhaka.

Only in 1985 did we begin to see a change in the pattern of asylem seekers at the ports. As a percentage of all applications, they went up from less than 10 per cent. in 1984 to 34 per cent. in 1985. I can confirm what my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South said—in December 1986 and January 1987 there were more applications at the ports than inside the country. That means that there has been a complete change in a matter of 12 months or so. There is no apparent reason for such a change, unless it is that people are making asylum applications as a device to beat our immigration controls. That conclusion is shared by our European partners and is borne out by the figures. Precisely the same criteria are applied to assessing a person's entitlement to asylem now as in the past. The success rate for port asylum cases plummeted from 23 per cent. in 1983 to 2·3 per cent. in 1985.

The same problem has had to be faced by country after country. The most startling figures come from Denmark and Belgium. In Denmark, 3,000 asylum applications were made in one month—August 1986—which forced the Government to threaten legislative action against carriers and to refuse access to asylum procedures to people coming from third countries. In Belgium, where until recently the UNHCR ruled on asylum applications, there were in 1986 only 52 grants of refugee status out of 7,500 applicants for asylum. The moral must be that we must stop asylum abuse before it gets too strong a hold or it will overwhelm us as it has threatened to overwhelm others.

In the face of that threat it is absurd to say that the Bill is unnecessary. It is even more absurd to say that it is unworkable. It is one of those rare beasts—a Bill which has begun to work before it has achieved its Second Reading. That is the answer to the point about retrospection made at the opening of our debate. Already there has been a drop in the number of people arriving at our ports, mostly without documents, claiming asylum. In the week ending 14 February, 95 such people arrived. The next week 41 arrived, the week after that 48, and in the week ending 7 March only 12 arrived. In the week ending 14 March only 18 arrived, and only four of them had forged documents. The House can assume from that that, indeed, the Bill's provisions have been made known to carriers and have already had a salutary effect.

The right hon. Member for Gorton said that carriers would be obliged to be experts in British immigration law. What utter nonsense. All that they will have to do is ensure that a person has a valid passport and a visa. The Bill applies only to visas, not to other forms of entry clearance required by non-visa nationals to come here, for instance, for settlement.

In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle), we will help airlines as much as we can so that they will know how to carry out these new duties which are already carried out by a number of responsible airlines. If someone disputes a penalty, he will be able to challenge our demand for payment and take us to court. He will be able to judge whether a document is false. If he disagrees with the conclusions reached by the Home Office, he can challenge our determination in court. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

That during the year ending on 31st March 1988 a number not exceeding 178,400 all ranks be maintained for Army Service, a number not exceeding 5,000 for the Home Service Force, a number not exceeding 96,000 for the Individual Reserves, a number not exceeding 87,350 for the Territorial Army and a number not exceeding 7,800 for the Ulster Defence Regiment.

ESTIMATES, 1987-88 (AIR), VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1988 a number not exceeding 96,700 all ranks be maintained for Air Force Service, a number not exceeding 5,650 for the Royal Air Force Reserve and a number not exceeding 2,370 for the Royal Auxilliary Air Force.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1986-87

Resolved,

That a further supplementary sum, not exceeding £1,111,464,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray charges for the Defence and Civil Services which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987, as set out in House of Commons Papers Nos. 159, 160 and 226.

ESTIMATES, EXCESSES, 1985-86

Resolved,

That a sum, not exceeding £392,730,629-84, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to make good excesses on certain grants for Defence and Civil Services for the year ended 31st March 1986, as set out in House of Commons Paper No. 158.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the two foregoing Resolutions and upon the Resolution [11th March] relating to Supplementary Estimates, 1986-87 by the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. John MacGregor, Mr. Norman Lamont, Mr. Ian Stewart and Mr. Peter Brooke.

Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill

Mr. Norman Lamont accordingly presented a Bill to apply certain sums out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the years ending on 31 March 1986 and 1987: And the same was read the first time; and ordered to be read a second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 104].

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Ways and Means Motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Neubert.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS (JOINT COMMITTEE)

Ordered,

That Mr. Michael Hancock be discharged from the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments and Mrs. Rosie Barnes be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Neubert.]

East Anglian Gangmasters

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

10.15 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I am pleased to have this opportunity to raise on the Adjournment of the House the subject of the registration of gangmasters in East Anglia. On the whole, gangmasters are excellent people. They are essential to the rural economy of East Anglia, where there is little public transport and intensive cropping. The registration of gangmasters is supported by the Transport and General Workers Union, by the honourable people of Lincolnshire, Norfolk and Cambridgeshire and by my honourable neighbour the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body); whose Bill is about to come before the House for its Second Reading.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): What are they?

Mr. Freud: The gangmaster is an agricultural subcontractor.

Mr. Banks: I thank the hon. Gentleman. We do not have many gangmasters in Newham. That is why I asked that question.

Mr. Freud: In 1867, a Bill passed by this House said:

"Whereas in certain Counties in England certain Persons known as Gangmasters hire Children, Young Persons and Women with a view to contracting with Farmers and others for the Execution on their Lands of various Kinds of Agricultural Work".

The 1867 Act was called the Agricultural Gangs Act, and it stipulated that a "'Child' shall mean a Child under the Age of Thirteen years; 'Young Person' shall mean a Person of the Age of Thirteen years, . . . No Child under the Age of Eight Years shall be employed in any Agricultural Gang; No Female shall be employed in any Gang".

There was more, but the important point was that no person should act as a gangmaster unless he had obtained a licence to act as such under that Act.

Most hon. Members have said from time to time that every time a new Act reaches the statute book one ought to look around with care for some old Act that needs to be scrapped, and 99 years after the 1867 Act Mr. Richard Crossman's Local Government Bill of 1966 scrapped the Gangmaster's Act. On 14 June 1966, Mr. Crossman said:

"But I found, for example, that county councils are still required by the Agricultural Gangs Act, 1867, to issue licences to persons of good character fit to be entrusted with the duties of gangmaster. Those duties still include preventing females from being in the same gang as males, or from being under the control of a male gangmaster. Since the fee is only 1s. for six months, I felt it was hardly worth keeping, and we have therefore decided to repeal the licensing requirements. — [Official Report, 14 June 1966; Vol. 729, c. 1268.]

It was an easy and obvious option to take, but the sad part of it is that unscrupulous people have come into the gangmaster business. They are undercutting honourable gangmasters and persuading the farmers who lack a civic conscience to hire personnel from them at a rate in contravention of the agricultural wages board minimum wage.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard), who is also on the side of the angels, had an Adjournment debate on this four years ago, when she stated that

"because of the unemployment in the areas concerned, the gangmasters are able to exploit the workers, who have no right to holidays or sick pay, and no insurance is paid by the farmer . . . Anyone who is known to be a member of the union is never again given a job by certain gangmasters . . . As there is no system of licensing, any unscrupulous person can set up as a gangmaster. With the high unemployment, he is able to intimidate the members of the work force, who desperately need to bring some form of income into the home . . . the farmers are doing very nicely out of the arrangement . . . There are other implications . . . These people are not the employees of the farmer. He does not have to insure them . . . If a gangworker is involved in an accident on a farm . . . presumably, he is not covered for industrial injury benefit and so on . . ."—[Official Report, 18 February 1983; Vol. 37, c. 640-41.]

In surgeries over the years, I have found that the odd, dishonest gangmaster has failed to insure the workers, neglected to pass on to the DHSS the national health insurance, or provide holiday pay and other benefits deducted from the payments made to his staff. Having discussed the matter with the Paymaster General, we corresponded, and in January of this year I received a letter from him, stating:

"The problem of these activities is insidious in two main respects. Firstly, if they rely on benefit payments for their work force, these employers have a source of labour which may feel itself trapped into a situation where low wage levels are subsidised (illegally, of course) by unemployment benefit. Claimants in this situation may believe that they cannot afford to sign off. Secondly, honest employers who are deducting tax and paying contributions find themselves facing unfair competition in the market. It can also have repercussions for individual workers, who may at a later stage wish to apply for sickness, maternity or any other benefits and then find their contributions records deficient because of the employers' practices."

There are only a small number of dishonest gangmasters, but the great danger is that this small number undercuts the honourable gangmasters and is allowed to flourish. Obviously cheap labour is an attraction to farmers and to packing stations which, more and more in East Anglia, are now in the hands of multinational companies and put out to a management which is on commission.

The hon. Member for Holland with Boston has a Bill before the House that requires gangmasters to be licensed by justices. The important parts of the Bill are, first:

"No person shall act as a gangmaster unless he has obtained a licence".

secondly:

"Any person acting as a gangmaster without licence . . . commits an offence of summary jurisdiction";

thirdly:

"In deciding to grant a licence to act as a gangmaster the court shall have regard to the applicant's character and the terms of employment which he intends to offer."

I am not gravely worried about the duration of the licence. I am sure it is right to have an appeals procedure, and obviously it is important to have an interpretation. I should simply like to see the Minister enabling the hon. Gentleman's Bill to become an Act on the statute book.

I am well aware that the Government have a strange feeling that they should not interfere and that the more legislation they pass the less Conservative the Administration becomes. This is a minor Bill which prevents a major evil. If it is not enacted, unscrupulous farmers will be able to jump on the bandwagon of exploitation.

The Agricultural Wages Board has two forms of agricultural wage: one for the worker who works for more —or just less—than 30 hours in regular employment which is £2·30 or £2·36; the other for seasonal workers at 40p an hour less. It is the practice of unscrupulous gangmasters to misinterpret the status of a worker, to translate a regular worker into a seasonal one and reap the benefit.

Recently, I spoke on Anglia television about gangmasters, and the reporter said, "Surely if the Bill goes through, if gangmasters must register and no more cheap labour is provided for less scrupulous farmers, the price of food will go up?" I had to reply that this will not increase the price of food; it would decrease the profits made by middlemen. Sadly, where people can produce food cheaply, that cheapness is not passed on to consumers; just more people line their pockets.

Registration is a simple solution and would be welcomed by all but the unscrupulous farmer, producer, and packing station. I hope that the Minister will consider the evil which is at present being perpetrated in parts of east Anglia and lend his support to the Bill.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): I endorse everything that the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) has said. Unfortunately, the problem has arisen in recent years because of high unemployment and the way in which the social security system works. The hon. Gentleman spoke of reputable gangmasters, who completely support a system of licensing, being undercut. The undercutting is done by cheating the social security system and by goading people who are desperate for work to go on social security for part of the time and to work for a derisory wage, being treated disgracefully by gangmasters, for the rest of the time.

I support what the hon. Gentleman said and I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is looking into the matter most sympathetically. I know that he will carry out an investigation and I hope that it will be done speedily so that we can correct this injustice as soon as possible.

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): I shall not keep my hon. Friend the Minister for more than one minute. At first I did not believe in the Bill, but I have made some inquiries, and although I do not believe that there are any dishonest gangmasters and farmers in Norfolk, I can believe that there may be some on the boundaries. The Bill may be a good way of putting the matter right for those who work for dishonest gangmasters and farmers. In that respect, I support the Bill.

10.29 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. John Lee): I acknowledge the genuine concern felt by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) in this area of gangmaster abuse and also his support for the private Member's Bill recently presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), who spoke with conviction, albeit briefly, to require gangmasters to be licensed by justices. It is clear that the problem of gangmasters is a longstanding one. It goes back more than a century, when provision was made in the Agricultural Gangs Act 1867 for gangmasters to be licensed. The Act was passed to curb cruelty and immorality that existed in gangs at that time.

It was repealed by the then Labour Government in the Local Government Act 1966 as the abuses had long since disappeared and were considered unlikely to return. The agricultural trade unions were consulted at the time and did not object to the repeal.

The House returned to the matter in 1983 when the subject was raised on the Adjournment by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) on 18 February. It was then contended that, because rural life had changed out of all recognition in recent years, and because there had been a large rise in unemployment, abuses had returned to the gangmaster system. It was urged that licensing of gangmasters should be reintroduced. The Government's position at that time was that the evidence before them, including the evidence put forward in the debate, did not lead them to believe that the exploitation was such that it required Government interference.

Now the subject is before us again. I make no complaint about that, as it is clear that there are still strong feelings that something ought to be done to curb the abuses which are said to exist. I see that my hon. Friend's Bill has all-party support and I hope therefore that we can tonight have a frank and sensible, if small, debate about this problem on a non-party basis. Certainly that is how I intend to approach the matter, which I take very seriously.

What is suggested in the Bill, and what has been proposed by the hon. Member tonight, is the reintroduction of a system of licensing along the lines of that which existed between 1867 and 1966. In a sense, therefore we are asked to turn the clock back—and at a time when we believed firmly that less, rather than more, regulation of business is needed. Turning the clock back is not necessarily a bad thing if it is the only way in which to check real abuses, but obviously we must look very carefully at this proposal, and indeed any other proposals for dealing with the problem, before we finally decide what to do.

I have to say straight away that I remain to be convinced that the reintroduction of a system of licensing or registration of gangmasters would serve any useful purpose today. It could be illogical to require one small group of persons supplying subcontracted labour to be licensed and not all the others in industries such as, say, building or fish processing. Licensing a gangmaster, or requiring him to be registered, would not necessarily improve the terms and conditions of the workers he eventually hired, even if the licensing body was obliged to take into account the terms of employment which he intended to offer before granting him a licence.

Mr. Freud: Does the Minister accept that, by licensing gangmasters, the Government and their agencies would have access to gangmasters' books, which is currently not the case? At the moment, gangmasters are being allowed, unlicensed and unchecked, to pay less than the minimum agricultural wage, and not necessarily to pass on the deduction to the Government. The Minister is doing a great disservice by opposing licensing.

Mr. Lee: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says and that there may be pluses in that approach, but we have to consider the problem in the round. We shall consider the pros and cons.

Licensing gangmasters would mean almost inevitably that a Government agency would have to be allocated the additional tasks involved in enforcing the new arrangements. That would not necessarily be desirable. As I have already said, the proposal that gangmasters should be registered would run counter to the thrust of the Government's deregulation policy. At the time I want the House to understand that we are determined that abuses should be eradicated.

I am aware that some gangmasters provide labour to do work that falls outside the formal definition of agriculture—for example, sorting and grading vegetables in a packing shed, or processing food in a factory.

There is some doubt as to who works for the gangmaster. A hundred years ago, they were the local villagers who could not obtain regular employment with a farmer, but I understand that the position is different today. Many, if not most, of the workers are married women and students, who are glad of the opportunity for some seasonal work. They are casual workers in the true sense of the phrase and, as with other casual workers, it is not always easy to ensure that they are working within the rules of the tax and benefit systems.

I know of claims that serious problems are caused by some dishonest gangmasters and that reputable gangmasters are concerned about this, but we do not have evidence to suggest that abuses have been increasing in the past few years. There may well be individual cases of gangmasters whose activities are contrary to the law. As the hon. Gentleman said, we are referring to a minority. It is our duty to ensure that they are prosecuted, where that is appropriate, and that their future affairs are carefully monitored to ensure that there is no extension of abuses. The present evidence before us does not lead us to believe that the scale of abuses is such that they require further legislation, but I am looking into the whole area again and would welcome hard evidence. That would make it a lot easier to consider the whole matter and decide what, if anything, needs to be done.

The hon. Member will know that gangmasters already have clear responsibilities under existing legislation. When acting as contractors, they are responsible for meeting the requirements of the Agricultural Wages Act 1948 and the relevant Department of Health and Social Security and Inland Revenue regulations. Information received about alleged abuse is pursued systematically, and suitable cases are taken to court. Gangmasters are treated no differently from other labour subcontractors, but it is not easy to get hard evidence of abuse of the system, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge. There is plenty of rumour, but little hard fact, and I am not clear how the registration of gangmasters would significantly improve the situation.

I hope that the hon. Member understands that the Government treat the matter seriously. He is already aware that my Department is willing to investigate suspect gangmasters. He also knows, because he has been in correspondence with my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General about a particular case, that during recent months the DHSS has mounted a number of investigations into the gangmasters' operations. He also knows that my Department has been pursuing an inquiry into one particular case and that the investigators have made considerable progress. If similar cases are brought to my attention, I and colleagues in the other Departments involved will make sure that they are followed up swiftly and energetically. However, as a result of recent investigations, my Department now proposes to mount a saturation survey of East Anglia in the summer. Likewise, as a result of representations made to my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled about abuse in the fish curing and processing industries, my Department is to investigate the employers and workers who are subcontracted in the north-east of Scotland. Ultimately, however, any prosecution depends for its success on the willingness of people to come forward and report abuses.

Another aspect of the gangmaster system is the level of payments to workers. The agricultural wages boards, which are composed of representatives of employers and workers and independent members, have a statutory obligation to fix minimum rates of pay below which the pay of those covered by the orders must not fall. Hon. Members will be aware that on 10 March a settlement was reached with the full agreement of both sides of industry which will mean a 5 per cent. increase on minimum rates. The parties to a contract can, of course, agree to higher levels of pay. The provisions of the orders cover people who are employed in agriculture and under a contract of service—that is, those who are employees. Workers in the gangs who satisfied this condition would have the full protection of the agricultural wages legislation and would be able to seek the advice and help of the local agricultural wages inspector if they felt that they were being underpaid or otherwise exploited. I understand, however, that in practice the inspectors receive very few complaints. In addition, those workers who are employees are entitled to various rights under the employment protection legislation, provided that they have worked for a minimum qualifying period, which varies according to the right concerned. Those employment rights can be enforced by the industrial tribunals.

The difficulties that arise mainly involve those who are not within the scope of the agricultural wages orders or the employment protection legislation, because they are self-employed, with the gangmaster acting as agent in finding work. For workers not covered by the orders, pay and other terms and conditions are matters to be agreed between the parties to the contract, without Government involvement. All workers, including those in agricultural gangs, whether employees or self-employed, can seek to enforce their contractual rights through the civil courts. Although it would in theory be possible to make the agricultural wages board minimum rates apply to the self-employed, I do not think that this is a workable solution for the gang members in this category who may or may not be paid lower rates.

Much of the work done by agricultural gangs is of a short-term seasonal nature. It is unlikely that farmers would wish to employ full-time workers to satisfy these needs, especially in view of the extra work that this would entail at the busiest time of the year for the farmer. It seems sensible that the parties concerned should be able to negotiate contractual arrangements which suit the nature of the work. The gang system is a convenient arrangement which provides the necessary flexibility for farmers to meet their short-term needs and for the workers to choose hours of work that fit their personal commitments. The advantages of the system for all concerned outweigh the cases of abuse which may arise.

Mr. Freud: If the Minister accepts that there is occasional abuse, does he accept that the strength of the 1867 Act was that, if such an abuse was discovered, the gangmaster was disqualified from working as a gangmaster? He was no longer able to hire people. What happens now is that, if a gangmaster is flushed, he moves a few miles away and starts up again, possibly under another name, using the same people without registering them. That is why we want them to be licensed.

Mr. Lee: I fully appreciate the advantages that the hon. Gentleman sees in licensing, but I repeat that other factors and aspects must be taken into account. That is why we shall be considering the whole area after this debate. I have given that asssurance repeatedly.

Nevertheless, and even though the gangmaster system serves a very useful purpose. I am in no doubt that there is great concern, in the area where the system operates, that individuals are suffering and that the Government are not receiving revenue and insurance contributions that are their due. I have already said that I view these concerns with seriousness and that I shall ensure that cases brought to my attention are properly and quickly investigated. The difficulty, as I have said, is to get to the bottom of those rumours, although the investigating officers from the Departments affected are doing their best.

I have already had discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston about his Bill, as he has acknowledged these discussions are continuing. I will obviously take the comments made in this debate by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East into account before deciding what more, if aything, needs to be done. I also intend to consult my colleagues in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who clearly have an important interest. I sympathise with the views of hon. Members that something must be done to bring gangmasters' operations within the law—and in such a way that they are seen to be clean and above board.

We have had a most useful debate, but I have to say that nevertheless I have yet to be convinced that licensing or registration, in themselves, will prove to be effective. There are too many potential loopholes. However, I very much hope that, during our resumed discussions, we shall be able to bring about improvements and a more effective combating of abuse.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Secondary Schools

1. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent per pupil in secondary schools (a) in England as a whole and (b) in Staffordshire in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures in 1978-79, at constant prices.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): In 1984-85 prices, local education authorities in England spent an average of £945 per secondary pupil in 1978-79 and £1,085 in 1984-85. The comparable figures for Staffordshire are £945 and £1,025.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend agree that those figures show an impressive increase in expenditure per pupil at secondary schools in Staffordshire and in the country as a whole since the Government came to office? How does he think the Labour party can justify claims that there have been cuts in education budgets since this Government came to office?

Mr. Dunn: The direct answer to that question is that the Labour party cannot justify such claims. All principal measures show steady improvements in education provision since the Government came to office. Not only is spending per pupil at record levels, but the overall pupil teacher-ratio is at its best level ever and class sizes are smaller than in 1979.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister accept that the Government have placed a substantial additional burden on secondary schools, not least in respect of the new GCSE? Is he aware that there are real unresolved needs with respect to the GCSE, that provision is grossly inadequate and that there is extreme anxiety in our schools about that provision? What good news, if any, can he give to schools about immediate decisions on that matter?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman must accept that our expenditure plans for the forthcoming year show an increase in cash terms of 18·8 per cent. That will enable substantial improvements to continue, and we have, of course, provided extra money for the funding of GCSE and its introduction.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Will my hon. Friend say whether it is still the case in England—as we were told it was last summer—that for every five teachers and lecturers there are more than three non-teachers employed full time in the education system? Does he feel that there may be scope for further streamlining of administrative structures to ensure that a higher proportion of spending comes through to schools and education?

Mr. Dunn: The responsibility for that rests with local education authorities. However, I am bound to say that my hon. Friend is quite right. In many authorities that claim a high expenditure per pupil a high ratio seems to follow once examination is made of the non-teaching staff. Many local authorities can do more to take out unnecessary non-teaching staff from their payrolls. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is good to see that there is such an interest in Education questions. I ask hon. Members to listen to the questions and the answers.

City Technology Colleges

2. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to make an announcement about the establishment of further city technology colleges in addition to the first at Solihull.

5. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further progress has been made towards establishing city technology colleges.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I am making good progress in discussion with a number of prospective sponsors and will announce details of further city technology colleges soon.

Mr. Carlile: Will the Secretary of State come clean and tell us how much money has been committed in non-governmental sponsorship for those colleges? Will he confirm that the level of sponsorship so far committed is so low as to show his plans to be a complete white elephant?

Mr. Baker: The hon. and learned Gentleman cannot have heard that the first college was announced in Solihull only four months after I had announced the concept of city technology colleges. That college was sponsored by two companies, Lucas Industries and Hanson Trust. I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that there are several more in the pipestream and I will be announcing them fairly soon [HON. MEMBERS: "Pipestream?"] I am sorry, I should have said "pipeline". But it will be such a flow that it will turn into a stream. I am surprised that the Liberal party opposes these ideas, because city technology colleges increase choice. I would have thought that liberalism stands for more choice.

Mr. Evennett: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his city technology college initiative, and I am sure that most people outside the House in the inner city areas will be grateful for them. However, who will be responsible for the curriculum for these new colleges and who will monitor standards?

Mr. Baker: The curriculum will be determined as laid out in the booklet on the city technology colleges, and it will depend upon a contract between my Department and the charitable trust that will run the colleges. The colleges will be monitored by Her Majesty's inspectors.

Mr. Flannery: Is the Secretary of State not whistling in the dark? It may be that only four months have passed, but these colleges are a failure, and has not the Minister of State almost admitted that in public statements? Will not such colleges cream off more students from the local schools? When the employers refuse to give the money, as they most surely will, will not the ordinary people have to pay for this white elephant?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman knows that the amount of money being provided to the state maintained sector is not being reduced. The money provided for the city technology colleges is extra money, and I expect shortly to announce several more colleges. I was told that one could not be started, but four months after my announcement of the scheme one has been started.

Mr. Pawsey: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the announcement on CTCs will be widely welcomed? For the past 20 years industry has been bemoaning the fact that people leave school without knowledge of technical subjects. Will my right hon. Friend dismiss the carping from Opposition Members as pure ignorance about both industrial and educational matters?

Mr. Baker: Many firms in Britain want to support these colleges, some with substantial sums of money, others with more modest sums. They see these colleges as fulfilling a real need in the inner cities, where the educational needs are greatest.

Mrs. Renée Short: Is the Secretary of State aware that many people regard city technology colleges as a rather ridiculous gimmick, and certainly as an attack on the local education authorities, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) said? If the Secretary of State has the additional resources that he says he has, why has he not invested them in polytechnics and universities to improve and build on the scientific base there?

Mr. Baker: I assure the hon. Lady that we are providing a substantial amount for technological education. This year we are extending TVEI nationwide at a cost of £90 million each year for the next 10 years—that is £900 million going straight to the state maintained sector. The hon. Lady says that the CTCs are a gimmick, but I remind her that many families in the inner cities will welcome the choice that these colleges will provide.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Is my right hon. Friend aware that his initiative is welcome in Solihull, in the south of the borough, in my constituency, and in the north, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills), where it will usefully serve the people? Is he further aware that it will also be welcome as a facility for Birmingham, being on the boundaries of that city, although he did not get the same co-operation from that city as he did from Solihull?

Mr. Baker: I thank the Solihull education authority for being willing to sell a redundant secondary comprehensive school. I am sure that the educational provision in Solihull will be improved significantly, and, in particular, the staying on rate of 16-year-olds.

Mr. Radice: Will the Secretary of State confirm that of the 1,800 companies that he has approached to fund CTCs, only eight have replied favourably? Has not British industry, so far from welcoming the idea, given the Secretary of State's plan a decisive thumbs down?

Mr. Baker: That is simply not true. I do not know where the hon. Gentleman gets his figures from. If he looks at the Financial Times today, he will see that the Davy Corporation has announced, on its own initiative, that it wants to support a CTC in Teesside. What I would like to know from the hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Radice: How many?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman must wait and see. Fairly soon he will have an answer. Why is he denying parents and children in the inner city areas the opportunity to benefit from this sort of education?

National Academic Qualifications

3. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to create an integrated national academic qualifications and courses system for those over the age of 16 years.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): The structure of qualifications post-16 is a responsibility shared by the Secondary Examinations Council and the National Council for Vocational Qualifications. The Government look to these bodies to work closely together to develop greater coherence in qualifications.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Minister agree that the best way forward for those over the age of 16 is to have, first, an integrated qualification which covers both academic and vocational aspects, and, secondly, that that should be done in the context of tertiary colleges? Will she give her sympathetic approval to any plans put forward to establish tertiary education by the many education authorities that are now considering it? I should point out to her that in Wandsworth there is overwhelming support for that idea.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government are anxious to ensure that the two bodies that I have spoken about, the Secondary Examinations Council and the National Council for Vocational Qualifications, should work together to ensure that post-16 qualifications can be meshed together at some time in the future. The organisation of schools post-16 is a matter for determination by the local education authorities, and we leave it to their good sense and discretion how best secondary education post-16 can be provided.

Mr. McLoughlin: Does my hon. Friend accept that with some education authorities one does not get good sense and that they try to destroy proven schools with excellent records in their sixth forms? Can she assure us that before any such plans are passed the Department will consider them carefully so that we do not destroy good proven sixth forms for the sake of some Socialist dogma?

Mrs. Rumbold: I can assure my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, when considering reorganisation proposals from local authorities, looks carefully at the merits of each case and is in no sense committed to destroying schools of proven worth.

Mr. Sheerman: Have the Government not missed a great opportunity by imposing such narrow terms of reference on the A-level review? Was this not a real opportunity to integrate vocational and academic qualifications post-16? Is not the fact of the matter that with the city technology colleges and this sort of review the Government want to keep a divide between the sheep and the goats at 16, and have an effective 16-plus?

Mrs. Rumbold: No. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has entirely missed the point. The National Council for Vocational Qualifications is a recent body, which is busy looking at the different vocational qualifications on offer at present. It is working closely with the Secondary Examinations Council. Ultimately, one hopes for a certain amount of mutual agreement about the types of qualifications for entry into higher education and the post-16 framework.

Education Standards

4. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the raising of education standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend regularly receives letters from members of the public and others concerned to improve educational standards. In recent months a large majority of these letters have supported the introduction of a national curriculum as a means of achieving that objective in schools.

Mr. Thurnham: In raising standards, will my hon. Friend take note of the pressing need for more highly skilled people to enter the engineering industry? Will she encourage more school leavers to take advantage of the places for technology and science in higher education?

Mrs. Rumbold: I note my hon. Friend's remarks about engineering and technology job opportunities. The Government have frequently emphasised the need for better and more systematic careers education. We hope to take measures shortly to encourage local education authorities to bring a new coherence to careers provision for young people.

Mr. Weetch: Is the Minister aware that there has been a great deal of talk from the Department about standardised tests of attainment and about a core curriculum, which suggests a centralised approach? On the other hand, is she aware that the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 devolved the responsibility for those matters to local schools and headmasters? Are not those policies going in opposite directions?

Mrs. Rumbold: No, they are not. I hasten to assure the hon. Gentleman that we are considering, not a core curriculum, but the possibility of introducing a national curriculum during the course—[HON. MEMBERS: "What is the difference?"] If Opposition Member do not know the difference, they will have to learn and decide what it is for themselves.

To return to the hon. Gentleman's question, we hope that after consideration and consultation with all those within the education world about the national curriculum, we will come up with a responsible decision about how it should proceed. Benchmarks are important to establish pupils' achievements on the course.

Mr. Onslow: Does my hon. Friend think that the leaders of the teachers' unions have a part to play in raising education standards? Also, does she think that they are playing it?

Mrs. Rumbold: All teachers have a part to play in raising education standards. For the most part the professional quality of our teachers is excellent. They work hard towards the goal of improving standards and achievements in our schools.

Mr. Ashdown: Will not the next real marker for standards be the GCSE to be taken this year? Does the Minister realise that the resources and advice provided by her Department for that examination are wholly inadequate to meet the task and that as a result for 600,000 14-year-olds this year the GCSE will be at best a raw deal and at worst a blight on their future chances?

Mrs. Rumbold: I advise the hon. Gentleman to study a little longer those matters of education for which he is now spokesman. The GCSE will first be taken in 1988. We have made very good provision — [Interruption.] Will hon. Gentlemen listen?—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mrs. Rumbold: We have made very good provision for in-service training for teachers and for books and equipment for the GCSE. In the current year substantial sums will be available for both those matters in order to enable teachers to deliver the GCSE.

Local Education Authorities (Resources)

6. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to ensure that local education authorities make more efficient use of their resources.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Government's expenditure plans include a number of measures designed to promote efficiency among local education authorities. These include targets for the removal of surplus places from the schools and for tighter staffing ratios in further education.

Mr. Favell: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer, but what is to be done about the hangers-on? Do not recent figures show that some local education authorities employ twice as many support staff as necessary and then bleat that they have insufficient sums to pay the teachers, provide equipment or maintain the schools?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is on to a good point and, indeed, he tabled a written question about it last week. The point is that there is a large administrative tail in many local education authorities. Much of the money would be better spent on supporting teaching with more books, services and equipment.

Mr. Eastham: If the Secretary of State is sincere about using education resources efficiently, may I draw to his attention the fact that since the secondary reorganisation in 1982 eight secondary schools in Manchester have been on split sites awaiting permission from the Department to spend money on putting the schools on one site, which would bring greater efficiency? When will he do something about that?

Mr. Baker: This year current spending on education is planned to increase by 19 per cent., or £2 billion. [Interruption.] As a result of the conduct of the economy over the past seven years the Government have been able both to increase expenditure on social priority areas and to cut taxation.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that nothing in this drive will harm highly efficient, small, rural schools, which turn out such exceptionally good results?

Mr. Baker: I can reassure my hon. Friend and the whole House that rural schools, principally rural primary schools, provide a necessary and valuable contribution to education and to society. I can assure her that any proposals for closure are examined most carefully before they are approved, if they are approved.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the Secretary of State accept that one of the measures of a local education authority's efficiency is the number of nursery places that it can provide? Does he further accept that some of the best provide nursery places for two thirds of their children and some of the worst provide none? Is it pure coincidence that the best 10 providers are Labour-controlled authorities and the worst 10 are Conservative or alliance-controlled authorities?

Mr. Baker: A higher proportion of rising fives and children below four years of age are now going to some form of nursery education than ever before. That is the record of this Government.

As regards the spending differences between Labour and Conservative authorities, some Labour authorities spend a little more than Conservative authorities, but Conservative authorities get as good, and in some cases better, examination results at a lower cost.

Student Grants

7. Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations have been received by his review group on student grants; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): The review group has received written evidence from over 100 organisations, nine of which have been invited to give oral evidence. Some 1,688 letters have been received about the review.

Mr. Stewart: I thank my hon. Friend for that information, but will he tell us about the evidence and representations that he has received concerning systems of financial support for students in other countries? Is it not instructive that in America the student loan system has been associated with better rates of access to higher education then we have had in this country?

Mr. Walden: I share my hon. Friend's view. I should only add that a lot of nonsense has been put about by the National Union of Students and others to the effect that it is the Government's policy to replace all grants by loans. That is not the Government's policy. There would be serious disadvantages in going down that road in this country's circumstances. We recognise that an absolutist approach could act as a disincentive to the children of lower income families, women, mature students, the disabled and others. Among other things, my review is looking at a system of top-up loans to supplement grants. The purpose of the review is to improve the overall prospects of students, not to make things worse.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Will the Minister explain to the House how access and age participation in higher education can possibly be increased through a loan scheme as contrasted with an open-grant scheme?

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman must first explain to the House how an admitted decrease in the value of the grant over the last few years, and during the 1970s, has coincided — particularly in the last few years — with a massive increase in access?

Mr. Dorrell: Has my hon. Friend seen reports that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) supports the total replacement of student grants with a system of student loans? Does he know what the Liberal party thinks about that proposal, and will he accept my word that his announcement today, that the Government have no such proposals, will be welcomed in every British university?

Mr. Walden: Everyone knows that the question of student grants is complicated, but the alliance has confused things beyond reason. I have heard the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) say that he is against loans, but I have here a copy of a speech by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport, in which he says:

"Students would be able to take out loans for part of their costs . . . Students would also be able to take out loans for topping up basic social security levels of support".

The alliance has a duty to clarify to the House and to the country its position on student loans.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Why does the Minister believe that students can survive in real terms on less grant than he had? What is the difference between loans and the overdrafts, into which the Government have forced students?

Mr. Walden: I am disappointed that the reply of the hon. Gentleman did not direct itself to the perfectly reasonable question that I put to him. I am glad to see that the right hon. Member for Devonport has now joined us, and I hope that he will give us a reply.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my hon. Friend accept that it is a privilege to go to university and that our grant system is the fairest and most generous in Western Europe? Should we not, as a matter of urgency, be looking at a partial loan, at least, and encouraging our students to look to a career prospect at the end of their time at university? In other words, they go to university with a career aim at the end of it.

Mr. Walden: I share my hon. Friend's view. I would add only that it is clear now that the Conservative party is the party of social equity. That is why we are considering the possibility of sharing the cost of student maintenance between taxpayers, parents and students.

Mr. Strang: Is it not the Government's policy that it is desirable to increase the proportion, if not the absolute number, of working-class students attending our universities? Will he accept that even a top-up loan in this context would not be helpful?

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman is inadvertently perpetuating the myth that access to higher education for those from low-income backgrounds is pre-determined by the current level of the grant. That is not the position. Access is pre-determined to a large extent by the quality of the schools which students attended, and the Opposition have much to answer for on that score.

Mr. Powley: Is my hon. Friend aware of the demonstrations that are taking place at the University of East Anglia in my constituency about the level of student grants? Is he further aware that in the latest incident a Mr. Osborne, a worker at the university, was physically injured? Will my hon. Friend accept that such demonstrations are counter-productive to the cause of the student fraternity?

Mr. Walden: In recent months I have often found myself wandering in what are called loan-free zones. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is deplorable that students should behave in the way to which he has referred. In my experience — I have been to many education institutions—the extremists are a minority. I have met many reasonable students who understand perfectly well what we are about in our review. They understand also that any Government will be faced with spending priorities. They know that student grants come from the same budget as the aid budget, the National Health Service budget and everything else.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the review be available in time for the debate during the general election, or will it be smuggled out afterwards? If the Chancellor of the Exchequer has so much money in his pocket, why cannot a little of it be used to increase student grants this year so that a start can be made to counter the erosion that has occurred, or are the Government insisting on penalising students to make it easier to introduce loans in due course?

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman has involved himself in a double hypothesis. He does not know when the next general election will be and nor do I. I do not know when I shall complete the work on my review. I know, however, that I plan to do a thorough job. Likewise, the hon. Gentleman does not know when I shall complete that work. That being so, how can I possibly answer his supplementary question?

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman referred to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who will be giving us some news later. I have read the suggestion in the press that there may be several billion pounds to be given away. I know nothing about that. I know only that the National Union of Students has made an advance demand for £2 billion from the taxpayer.

School Buildings

8. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what number and proportion of unpublished reports of recent school inspections by Her Majesty's inspectors contain adverse comment about the state of school buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend publishes all formal reports to him by Her Majesty's inspectors following their inspections of schools in England. All the reports refer to the state of school buildings and accommodation. I cannot comment on reports which are still in preparation.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Minister accept that in the unpublished reports there are descriptions of school buildings that are in an unsatisfactory state and that the education of 1 million children is affected by this? Is it not a disgrace that 168 of these reports have not yet been published?

Mr. Dunn: I find it difficult to comment on reports that have not yet come before us following their publication. I should like to have the hon. Gentleman's source of information.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Is my hon. Friend aware that too many head teachers have to spend too much time telephoning various departments of their county hall when dealing with school repairs? Would it not be a good idea if head teachers had more authority in dealing with these matters and local authorities had less?

Mr. Dunn: That is precisely what our plans will bring about.

Mr. Litherland: Is the Minister aware that the district auditor in Manchester has drawn attention to the insufficient funding of preventive maintenance and has concluded that that will lead to irreparable decay and higher maintenance costs. Does the Minister not believe that he is following a short-sighted policy?

Mr. Dunn: I do not, and the facts speak for themselves. Our plans for local authority current expenditure in 1987-88 provide for a 14 per cent. increase, in real terms, in spending on the repair and maintenance of school buildings compared with what local authorities spent in 1984-85.

Dr. Hampson: Does my hon. Friend agree that some of the accusations about school buildings are not what they seem? Did my hon. Friend notice that last week the Daily Mirror devoted its front page to the story of the demolition of a school in Leeds, Brownhill school? That report was grossly misleading because that Victorian school—a fine school—was demolished by the Labour council only because it was suffering as a result of mining subsidence. Far from there being a shortage of money, that school is being replaced by two new schools.

Mr. Dunn: I understand precisely the point that my hon. Friend is making. I believe that we would have a far better debate in the House and in the country on the future school stock if Opposition Members accepted their share of the responsibility for the state of some of our schools.

City Technology Colleges

9. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of pupils now expected to be achieved by the first city technology college in each of the first four years of operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The build-up of pupils in the first city technology college will depend on decisions yet to be taken about the preparation of the accommodation and the admission of pupils. In our discussions with sponsors we have emphasised that where possible we would like more than one year group to be admitted to a CTC from year one, and that we expect to see them move to full capacity as quickly as possible.

Mr. Wainwright: As to the initial stages of this first technology college to be established, about what proportion of the total cost will be covered by the sponsorships that have so far been obtained?

Mrs. Rumbold: The proportion of the cost for which we have sponsorship relates to the capital, that is the cost of the buildings. My right hon. Friend will be supplying the costs for the revenue expenditure and that will depend on the number of students who enter the college at the first stage.

Mr. Holt: May I thank my hon. Friend on behalf of my constituents in Saltburn and Langbaurgh for the wise decision to keep the Huntcliff school open. I hope that my hon. Friend does not seek to rest on her laurels or those of her colleagues, because in Langbaurgh planning application is already at an advanced stage for a CTC. The public notices are up and the money is coming in, led by Davy International. Please do not listen to Alistair Graham, listen to the people of Teesside. They want the CTC.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend. I know that the initiative for the CTCs is widely welcomed, not only by people and parents, but by industrialists.

Mr. Skinner: The truth of the matter is that industrial chiefs are not sending money for those colleges for two principal reasons. First, they are fed up to the back teeth with the Tory party chairman sending begging letters asking for money to fight the general election. One of them was alleged to have said, "They have a damned cheek asking us for money to fight the election and asking us for money to look after these colleges at the same time." That is the real truth of the matter and that is why the Government are unable to get the money they thought they would get in the first place.

Mrs. Rumbold: Quite apart from the fact that I would have liked to know the second reason, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that all his speculation is completely unfounded. The CTCs are finding good support from industrialists.

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

10. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response he has had to his statement on teachers' pay and conditions of employment.

13. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what view head teachers have expressed to him on his proposals on teachers' pay.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am awaiting responses from those organisations which I am consulting about my proposals.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that today's strong vote by the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association against strikes contrasts with yesterday's strikes by other teacher unions? That underlines the disunity within the teaching profession. Surely the time has come for all strikes to end, in the interests of children, and for my right hon. Friend and all teachers' unions to produce a successor to the Burnham machinery for the discussion, as soon as possible, of teachers' pay and conditions and, above all, a strike-free deal.

Mr. Baker: I warmly welcome the fact that the third largest teachers' union, the AMMA, has voted today not to go on strike. This means that in the ballots which have been held fewer than half the teachers overall have voted for strike or other action. In my view, and I think that of most people, these strikes are totally unjustified. Parents do not understand why teachers are causing disruption when what is proposed will mean a 25 per cent. pay increase over 18 months.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Tim Smith.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have called the hon. Member to speak from the side Gallery because he cannot find a seat on the Floor.

Mr. Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Norman Willis has said that the two largest teachers' unions should merge and that their rivalry has done teachers no good? Might he not have added that their rivalry has done the children no good either and that the sooner they get back to work the better?

Mr. Baker: That is very good advice from on high. I should like to add my words to it. I very much hope that as a result of today's ballot those militant union leaders who are still calling out some of their members on strike will stop. The only people who suffer as a result of these strikes are the children. We should not take it out on the children.

Mr. Ashdown: As the Secretary of State well knows, the alliance does not believe that the teachers should be striking at the moment. Does he agree that that action will damage not only the children's education but the teachers' cause? Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that many people outside the House and, indeed, outside politics, recognise that his action in withdrawing without limit the rights to negotiate pay and conditions was a deliberately provocative act, so that he now bears the burden of the blame for some of the disruption which is going on in our schools?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman should appreciate that the Government introduced the interim advisory committee because the negotiating procedures had led nowhere over the past four years. I have provided a breathing space and a cooling-off period to determine more permanent satisfactory arrangements. I very much hope that all the unions will take advantage of this cooling-off period.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: I welcome AMMA's decision today. Will my right hon. Friend welcome the enormous increase in the membership of the Professional Association of Teachers, which, as a union committed not to strike, has increased its membership from 16,000 in 1980, when it was recognised, to 42,000 today? Will he take this opportunity to remind those who deplore the leadership of the NUT and the National Association of Schoolmasters that there is another strong union today?

Mr. Baker: My right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. The union which has grown most in the past few years is the Professional Association of Teachers, which is committed not to taking strike action. The other union which has also grown is AMMA, which today voted against striking. The union which has dropped in membership is the NUT, which is out on strike. I think that I speak for the whole House when I say that I very much hope that these disruptive strikes will come to an end. They are not justified.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that, whoever has voted not to come out on strike, three quarters of the teaching profession have voted to do so? [Interruption.] That, despite all the attempts to shout me down, is the reality of what the Secretary of State has done to the education of our children by trying to get rid of a negotiating process which has existed for more than 100 years, and which has never been broken before, except by this tyrannical Government.

Mr. Baker: Not for the first time, the hon. Gentleman has got his figures all wrong. Fewer than half the teaching profession has voted to take strike action. Indeed, the response to the strike action was very patchy last week. In some counties, only 5 per cent. of the schools were closed. There were stronger responses in the cities and towns, but much less in the rural areas and in the primary schools. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will add his voice in his union to discourage further strike action.

Sir Hugh Rossi: Will my right hon. Friend say whether he has precluded the setting up of a new, balanced negotiating machinery at the end of the three-year transitional period?

Mr. Baker: I would emphasise to my hon. Friend that I have said that we now have a cooling-off period in order to determine more permanent and satisfactory arrangements. There are broadly two views, one moving to an independent review body, coupled with certain conditions —possibly a "no-strike" arrangement—or, alternatively some form of joint negotiation. We cannot return to the latter at the moment, because the unions are hopelessly divided. So a cooling-off period is needed.

Mr. Radice: We deeply regret the continued disruption in our schools. Nobody wants the teachers to be on strike, but is it not the case that when the Secretary of State removed teachers' bargaining rights and imposed his own plan he was taking a dangerous gamble—one that has not come off? Does he not understand that parents who have had to put up with at least two years' disruption are now expecting him to use the authority of his office to bring peace to our classrooms by hastening a return to collective bargaining?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman deplores the strike. Could he perhaps express that view to a prominent member of the Labour party and chairman of the Trades Union Congress, Mr. Fred Jarvis, and deplore the fact that these unions and their militant leaders are calling teachers out on strike? These strikes are harmful to the children. Those teachers who come out will not be forgiven. The proposals that I have put forward are of an interim nature. What we want is to move towards better, permanent arrangements.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

Mr. Amess: Is the Prime Minister aware that there will be widespread concern at yesterday's crime figures, which is why many people will welcome the tougher sentences contained in the Criminal Justice Bill currently before the House? Is she not saddened by the fact that, on certain provisions, particularly the clause that would have allowed for a review of lenient sentences, Opposition Members actually voted against them?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. The crime figures published yesterday mean that we shall be even more determined in pursuing our policy to see that the police and the courts have the powers and resources that they need and to encourage people to take more steps to prevent crime. I agree with my hon. Friend that the attitude taken by the Opposition, both in local authorities and in this House, does nothing to help us fight crime.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister recall my previous request to her to provide people, especially old people, with help to make their homes secure, to provide for the improvement of housing and lighting schemes and seriously to combat unemployment as practical ways of assisting the police in their increasingly difficult task of preventing and detecting crime? In view of yesterday's truly shocking crime figures and of the 50 per cent. increase in crime since her Government came to office, will the Prime Minister now respond urgently and positively to those requests? Or does she take the same supine view as her Home Secretary, that the Government's anti-crime programme is simply taking time to work?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that there is already help for older folk with crime prevention schemes. It is operated through the community programme scheme, and operated very well indeed. I welcome the desire for more neighbourhood watch schemes, which already number, I understand, nearly 20,000, are working well and are preventing crime in a number of areas.

I listened carefully to what the right hon. Gentleman said. May I remind him that a batch of Labour local authorities go out of their way to undermine the police and finance criticism of the police at public expense? Worse than that, official Labour party policy would put those very people into a position of control over the police under the plan by which police priorities would be settled by local authorities.

Mr. Kinnock: First, all that the right hon. Lady says about Labour party policy is absolute rubbish and completely untrue. Secondly, anyone of any political colour who seeks to impede the proper work of the police is being simply anti-social. No one should be permitted to fall down on his or her public responsibilities. Thirdly, although the various initiatives which the right hon. Lady listed are all worth while, most of them, sadly, are only worthy palliatives. When will the right hon. Lady take action to strike at the social and economic roots of crime, to give people, especially women and old people, proper protection and to take up the issue of recruitment in order to remove the administrative burden on the police, including that imposed by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 that keeps—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kinnock: I thought that it would not be long before the Tory party gave up being concerned about crime.

I want the Prime Minister to tell us what she is going to do, in addition to those other things, to remove the administrative burden that keeps as many as 50 per cent. of our police officers off the streets and away from their first task.

The Prime Minister: I would have more respect for what the right hon. Gentleman has said if he had supported the Prevention of Terrorism Act. I would have more respect for what he has said if he had supported the proposal to refer lenient sentences to the Court of Appeal, and I would have had more respect if his party had supported us in voting for increased maximum penalties. He did none of those things. His party voted against all three.

Mr. Ward: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of us would welcome the conversion of the Leader of the Opposition to the cause of law and order if he now demonstrated that he will persuade—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his question to the Prime Minister's responsibilities.

Mr. Ward: Would not the cause of law and order be better served if my right hon. Friend would illustrate to us the importance of the loony Left not running down the police on every occasion, and of allowing the police to get on with their job instead of having to monitor processions run by such groups?

The Prime Minister: The activities of some Labour authorities in undermining the police are well known and I believe that until they are totally and utterly repudiated we must take them into account in viewing the way in which the Opposition propose to tackle crime.

Mr. Roy Jenkins: Will the Prime Minister — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Jenkins: Will the Prime Minister recall the question to the Attorney-General yesterday of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), and will she accept that, speaking as the Home Secretary for most of the relevant period, I entirely endorse what he said? Is the right hon. Lady aware that it is now her clear duty to set up an inquiry into the activities of certain elements in the Security Service during the mid-1970s?

The Prime Minister: The Prime Minister of the day made a statement on that matter, and I have nothing to add to what he said.

Mr. Evennett: Will my right hon. Friend give a guarantee that, after she has won the next general election, she will look carefully at the existence of the Inner London education authority, with a view to reform or abolition?

The Prime Minister: The Local Government Act 1985 contains a power to review ILEA by 1991. We shall, of course, review its activities and its future.

Q2. Sir Russell Johnston asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir Russell Johnston: Surely the crime statistics that have been referred to will lead the right hon. Lady to reconsider her view that there is no relationship between unemployment and crime. Surely the huge increase in unemployment has had exactly such disastrous social consequences. Does she reject the old saying, which I dare say she heard at her father's knee, that the devil finds work for idle hands?

The Prime Minister: It is a sad fact that the peak age of offenders is 15 years, which is below the school-leaving age. It does not necessarily seem to support what the hon. Gentleman said. Academic research has suggested that there is no significant association between increases in recorded crime and increases in unemployment. I accept that, in general, the phrase that the hon. Gentleman used seems to be true, but it is not borne out by the research that we so far have. He will, of course, know that unemployment involved a much bigger proportion of the working population in the 1930s, but crime was nowhere near what it is today.

Mr. Holt: Will my right hon. Friend care to look at Hansard of three or four weeks ago, when Lord Mishcon, speaking from the Opposition Benches in the House of Lords on the subject of law and order, said that sentencing in this country was too long and too severe and that it should be shortened, as it is in Holland, where an armed robber would receive only four and a half years, as against 15 years in this country? Is that any way in which to combat crime?

The Prime Minister: We believe that it is the duty of the Government to see that sufficient maximum sentences are available to the courts in case they should be needed. We have therefore consistently looked at the maxima and increased them where necessary. For example, attempted rape now attracts a life sentence. In the Criminal Justice Bill, for carrying a firearm during the commission of a crime, even when not used, the sentence will be up to life. The last matter was, of course, opposed by the Labour Opposition.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: With regard to the answer that the Prime Minister gave the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), why does the right hon. Lady keep calling in aid an inquiry of August 1977, the contents of which she cannot have seen, saying that the allegations that are currently made were investigated then, when they were not investigated then? Fresh allegations should be looked at. The more the Prime Minister calls in aid an inquiry, the contents of which she can know nothing about, the more she strengthens the case for an inquiry now.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is certainly referring to matters for which I am not, and cannot be, responsible. May I read once again the statement that the then Prime Minister made—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—to which I cannot possibly add. It was reported on 8 December 1977. The statement was made during the recess and was referred to in the House.

"The Prime Minister has conducted detailed inquiries into the recent allegations about the Security Service and is satisfied that they do not constitute grounds for lack of confidence in the competence and impartiality of the Security Service or for instituting a special inquiry." — [Official Report, 8 December 1977; Vol. 940, c. 1645.]

That is what the Prime Minister of the day said. I can take no responsibility whatsoever for matters that happened before my time. The hon. Gentleman must take up those matters with the Prime Minister of the day.

Mr. Fairbairn: Does my right hon. Friend appreciate, I could say it in Latin, but I shall not, that the permissive society one generation on has turned out to be the criminal society?

The Prime Minister: My hon. and learned Friend makes his own point very effectively.

Q3. Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: As the head of the Security Service, does the Prime Minister not recognise that if some dissident members of the Security Service in the 1970s tried to destabilise a Government whom they did not like, it strikes at the very heart of democracy? On reflection, therefore, does the Prime Minister not recognise, bearing in mind the answers that were given yesterday by the Attorney-General, that we cannot be satisfied with anything less than a full judicial inquiry about what happened during the time of a Labour Government?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is concerned with something that did not happen in my time and about which the Prime Minister of the day made a clear statement. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to listen to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: The Labour Prime Minister of the day made a clear statement about it. The hon. Gentleman must take up that matter with that Prime Minister.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Earlier, the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Ward) said that the Leader of the Opposition had been converted to the cause of law and order. I should like you to ask him to withdraw that phrase.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that it was unparliamentary, although it might have been rather offensive.

Mr. Ward: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I had not realised what a sensitive subject law and order is with the Opposition. In view of the embarrassment, of course I withdraw it.

NEW MEMBER

The following Member took and subscribed the Oath:

Matthew Owen John Taylor Esq., for Truro.

WAYS AND MEANS

Budget Statement

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Before I call the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it may be for the convenience of hon. Members if I remind them that at the end of the Chancellor's speech, as in past years, copies of the Budget resolutions will not be handed around in the Chamber but will be available to hon. Members in the Vote Office.

3.34 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The setting for this year's Budget is more favourable than it has been for very many years. We are now entering our seventh successive year of steady growth, and the fifth in which this has been combined with low inflation. The public finances are sound and strong, and unemployment is falling. These are the fruits of the Government's determination, in bad times as well as good, to hold firmly to our policies of sound money and free markets. Once again, I reaffirm those policies.

I shall begin, as usual, by reviewing the economic background to the Budget. I shall then turn to monetary policy and to the fiscal outlook this year and next. Finally, I shall propose some changes in taxation designed to improve still further the prospects that lie before us. A number of press releases, filling out the details of my proposals, will be available from the Vote Office as soon as I have sat down.

THE ECONOMIC BACKGROUND

I start with the economic background. Nineteen eighty-six was dominated by the sudden collapse of the oil price. Our own economy was affected not only directly, as a major oil producer and exporter, but also by the pause in world growth as the world economy adjusted to what has been described as the third oil shock. Despite this dislocation, however, the economy has developed in most respects as I foreshadowed a year ago.

In 1986 as a whole output grew by a further 2½ per cent., or so, which compares well with the experience of other industrialised countries. It is worth recalling that during the 1960s, and again in the 1970s, Britain's growth rate was the lowest of all the major European economies. By contrast, during the 1980s, our growth rate has been the highest of all the major European economies.

This greatly improved growth performance has been accompanied by falling inflation, which at 3½ per cent. in 1986 reached the lowest figure for almost 20 years. Over the lifetime of this Parliament, inflation has averaged less than 5 per cent.

During the first half of last year, exports and hence output were affected by the pause in world growth to which I have already referred. But since the middle of the year exports have grown strongly. Indeed, over the last three months the volume of exports of manufactures was 6 per cent. higher than a year earlier — a better performance than that of any other major economy. This pattern was reflected in the rapid growth of manufacturing output in the second half of last year.

This resurgence of economic growth, coupled with the special measures we have taken, has brought about a welcome fall in the number of people out of work. Since July unemployment has fallen by more than 100,000, the largest six-monthly fall since 1973. Though the numbers out of work are still far too high, both youth unemployment and long-term unemployment are now lower than they were a year ago.

I announced a number of specific employment measures in my last Budget, and since then my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has further extended the restart programme for the long-term unemployed. There will also be more places on the enterprise allowance scheme, and the number of jobclubs is to be quadrupled. The new job training scheme will eventually give a quarter of a million people, most of them youngsters, vocational training leading to recognised qualifications. With these and other measures, this Government have developed their employment and training programmes on a scale which no other country can match. But the best hope of all for the unemployed is in the continued vigour of the economy.

Since the early months of last year, there has been a further surge in manufacturing productivity. This continues the remarkable improvement in productivity growth achieved by British industry throughout the 1980s. During the 1960s, and again in the 1970s, growth in manufacturing productivity in the United Kingdom was the lowest of all the seven major industrial countries in the world. During the 1980s, our annual rate of growth of output per head in manufacturing has been the highest of all the seven major industrial countries.

The recorded current account of the balance of payments went into deficit in 1986 by around £1 billion. This followed a cumulative current account surplus of some £20 billion between 1979 and 1985. Some deterioration in our current account was inevitable in the face of a £4 billion loss of earnings on oil trade virtually overnight. But the significance of this should not be exaggerated. The exchange rate adjustment that followed the fall in the oil price is already contributing to an improved non-oil trade performance. And earnings from the massive stock of net overseas assets we have acquired since 1979 will provide a continuing support to the current account in the years ahead. At well over £100 billion, our net overseas assets are now greater than at any time since the war, and second only to those of Japan.

Looking ahead, I expect 1987 to be another year of balanced growth with low inflation. Total output is forecast to rise by 3 per cent., with exports and investment up by rather more than that. By then we will have registered the longest period of steady growth, at a rate approaching 3 per cent. a year, that the British economy has known since the war. Manufacturing industry, in particular, should do well in 1987. and with the non-oil economy set to grow at 3½ per cent., there is every prospect of unemployment continuing to fall throughout the year.

In last year's Budget speech I said that the outlook for jobs depended on a sustained improvement in the performance of business and industry. That sustained improvement in economic performance is now well under way.

Despite the strong growth in exports, it will inevitably take time for the full effect of the exchange rate adjustment to work through. The current account is thus likely to remain in deficit this year, by some £2½ billion, around half of 1 per cent. of GDP.

As I foreshadowed in the autumn statement, inflation may continue to edge up for a time, perhaps exceeding 4½ per cent. by the summer, before falling back to 4 per cent. by the end of the year. While short-term fluctuations are inescapable, it remains the Government's prime objective to keep inflation on an underlying downward trend.

Given the continuation of present policies in this country, the biggest risk to the excellent prospect I have outlined is that of a downturn in the world economy as a whole. There are still serious imbalances afflicting the three major economies—the United States, on the one hand, and Japan and Germany on the other—which, if not handled properly, could lead to a simultaneous downturn in all three. And this in turn could be exaggerated by renewed turmoil in the foreign exchange markets, whose tendency to overshoot is as notorious as it is damaging.

It was to address these dangers that the Finance Ministers and central bank governors of six major nations met in Paris last month, and agreed among other things to co-operate closely in fostering a period of exchange rate stability. In my Budget speech last year, I said:

"Provided we are not over-ambitious, I believe that the Plaza accord is something we can usefully build on."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 167.]

That is what we have now done, with Plaza II. But it would be idle to deny that the wider risks still remain.

Short of a world downturn, which can and must be avoided, British industry now has an outstanding opportunity, with growing markets at home and overseas, low inflation, rapidly growing productivity and greatly improved profitability. Provided it can control its costs and maintain its present competitive advantage, and assuming the continuation of present policies, we can look forward to many more years of strong growth combined with low inflation.

MONETARY POLICY

For their part, the Government will keep in place a sound and prudent financial framework. That means, as it has done since 1980, the medium-term financial strategy. The central objective of the MTFS is gradually to reduce the growth of money GDP over the medium term so as to squeeze inflation out of the system and ultimately to achieve price stability. This requires monetary discipline buttressed by low public sector borrowing. The essential instrument of monetary policy must remain short-term interest rates. These will continue to be set in the light of monetary conditions as indicated principally by the growth of narrow and broad money and the behaviour of the exchange rate.

For narrow money, MO, the target range for next year will be 2 to 6 per cent. as foreshadowed in last year's MTFS. For broad money, however, as the Governor of the Bank of England cogently argued in his Loughborough lecture last October, it is probably wiser in current circumstances to eschew an explicit target altogether. But broad money will continue to be taken into account in assessing monetary conditions, as of course will the exchange rate.

PUBLIC SECTOR BORROWING

I mentioned a moment ago the need to keep public sector borrowing low.

The final outturn for the public sector borrowing requirement last year, 1985-86, was just under £6 billion, equivalent to 1¼ per cent. of GDP, the lowest level since 1970-71. In my Budget last year, faced with a massive loss of what now looks to be almost £7 billion of North sea oil revenue, I none the less decided to hold the PSBR for this year, 1986-87, to £7 billion, or 1¾ per cent. of GDP.

In the event, this year's PSBR looks like turning out at only £4 billion, or 1 per cent. of GDP—the second successive year of significant undershoot. This successful outcome is chiefly attributable to the remarkable buoyancy of non-oil tax revenues in general and of the corporation tax paid by an increasingly profitable business sector in particular.

Looking ahead, there is still a degree of uncertainty surrounding oil prices, and I have therefore stuck to the assumption I made last year that the North sea oil price will average $15 a barrel. But it is clear that the increased flow of non-oil tax revenues, coupled with the prospective further growth of the economy in excess of the growth of public expenditure, puts the public finances in a very strong position. I intend to keep it that way.

Last year's MTFS indicated a PSBR for 1987-88 of £7 billion, or 1¾ per cent. of GDP; and, as the House will recall, I gave an assurance at the time of the autumn statement, when I announced a £4¾ billion increase in planned public expenditure in 1987-88, that on no account would I exceed that figure.

Indeed, I believe it is right to go below it. Since its inception in 1980, the MTFS has indicated a steadily declining path for the PSBR expressed as a percentage of GDP. We have now reached what I judge to be its appropriate destination—a PSBR of 1 per cent. of GDP. My aim will be to keep it there over the years ahead. This will maintain a degree of fiscal prudence that, until this year, had been achieved on only two occasions since 1950.

Accordingly, I have decided to provide for a PSBR in 1987-88 of £4 billion.

Inevitably, this greatly diminishes the scope I have this year for reducing the burden of taxation, which of course remains a major objective of Government policy. But I am sure it is right to err on the side of prudence and caution, and to build a still firmer base for the future. That is the principle on which both I and my predecessor have consistently conducted economic policy these past eight years, and I see no reason to depart from it now.

Meanwhile, I would make one further observation, of a different nature. Economic arguments are seldom concluded, one way or another. This is chiefly because it is unusual for economic policies to be held in place long enough to provide sufficient evidence. But the 1980s have been different; and, as a result, one critically important economic argument has now been concluded, finally and decisively.

Throughout our period of office, our critics have consistently maintained not only that a fiscal stimulus would produce real economic growth but that without an expansionary fiscal policy sustained growth was impossible. They were wrong, and have been proved wrong. The British economy is now embarking on its seventh successive year of steady growth, at an average rate of getting on for 3 per cent. a year. And during that time the PSBR, even if privatisation proceeds are added back, has been deliberately and steadily reduced from a shade under 6 per cent. of GDP to a little over 2 per cent. Indeed, had I or my predecessor at any time heeded the advice of our so-called expansionist critics, the British economy would never have been in the unprecedentedly favourable position it is in today.

EXCHANGE CONTROL

Before I turn to my proposals for changes in taxation, I have one other change of a specific nature to announce. In 1979, a few months after the present Government had first taken office, my predecessor announced the abolition of exchange controls, which had been in continuous operation ever since the outbreak of war in 1939. That bold action has, over the past seven and a half years, proved wholly beneficial to the British economy; and I am glad to note that other European countries are now moving in the same direction.

But the Exchange Control Act remains on the statute book. The time has come to repeal it. The necessary legislation will be contained in this year's Finance Bill.

I note that, in what was clearly intended to be a major speech in New York in September, the Deputy Leader of the Labour party declared that "The Labour Party has no intention of reintroducing statutory exchange controls".

I am confident, therefore, that the proposal I have just made will be welcomed on all sides of the House.

BUSINESS AND ENTERPRISE

I now turn to taxation. First, taxes on business.

The fundamental reform of the corporation tax system which I introduced in 1984 came fully into effect last April. The new system has undoubtedly improved the quality of business investment decisions in Britain, and is also encouraging more overseas companies to set up here.

During the transition to the new system, companies were given advance notice of the main rate of corporation tax for the year ahead. This helped them in their forward planning, and I intend as far as possible to continue the practice of setting the rate in advance.

Accordingly, I can announce now that the main rate of corporation tax in 1987-88 will be unchanged at 35 per cent.—lower than in any other major industrial nation, though the United States is now set to emulate us.

The low rate of corporation tax enables me to introduce a further simplification into the system.

At present, while companies' capital gains are liable to corporation tax, the amount of such gains is first adjusted by a certain fraction so that the effective rate of tax is the same as that on capital gains made by individuals. This dates back to the time when the two rates of tax were far apart.

This is no longer the case. Indeed, the corporation tax rate for small companies is now below the capital gains tax rate. I therefore propose that, from today, companies' capital gains be charged at the appropriate corporation tax rate, without adjustment, save for the indexation which applies to all post-1982 gains.

Hitherto, companies have not been allowed to set payments of advance corporation tax against their liability to tax on capital gains. This means that, where companies distribute capital gains as dividends, the gains are, in effect, taxed twice—once in the hands of the company, and once in the hands of the shareholder. I propose that, under the new system, companies should be able to set ACT payments against tax on capital gains.

Taken together, these changes should yield £60 million in 1988-89.

I also have some further simplification and rationalisation of the corporation tax system to announce.

At present, some companies established before 1965 do not have to pay their corporation tax until up to 21 months after the end of the period for which it is due, whereas companies established since 1965 have to pay their tax after nine months—and indeed some building societies have to pay sooner still. This difference in treatment cannot be justified. Moreover, it is open to an abuse which could put the timing of a substantial proportion of the total corporation tax yield at risk.

I therefore propose that all companies and building societies should be treated the same way, with all liable to pay tax nine months after the accounting period for which it is due.

While business and industry as a whole are doing well, the North sea oil sector has inevitably been hard hit by last year's oil price collapse. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy and I have followed closely the effects on North sea producers and their suppliers. The industry itself is generally confident about the longer-term prospects; while, as for the tax system, not only is it inherently price-sensitive, but the companies themselves have repeatedly stressed their desire for stability.

However, in the light of the immediate problems, I introduced legislation last autumn to bring forward the repayment of over £300 million of advance petroleum revenue tax. This has already helped many of the smaller and medium-sized companies faced with cash flow difficulties.

I now propose two further petroleum revenue tax reliefs. First, as from today, companies may elect to have up to 10 per cent. of the costs of developing certain new fields set against their petroleum revenue tax liabilities in existing fields, until such time as the income of those new fields exceeds the costs incurred. Second, there will be a new relief against PRT for spending on research into United Kingdom oil extraction that is not related to any particular field.

I believe that these carefully targeted changes will give a worthwhile measure of relief to the North sea oil sector.

Last year I put the business expansion scheme on to a permanent footing. However, the present rules still produce too much end-year bunching of BES investments, and hence may crowd out some projects and lead to bad decisions on others. I propose, therefore, to permit someone who invests in the first half of the year to claim part of the relief against his previous year's income. This will make it easier for companies to raise BES finance throughout the year.

I also propose to legislate now to pave the way for a new method of collecting corporation tax, to be known as pay and file. Under this system companies will estimate their tax liabilities themselves, and pay on the normal due date. Where it turns out that the initial payment was too low, the company will pay interest to the Revenue; where the initial payment was too high, the Revenue will pay interest to the company. This new approach, which has already been generally welcomed by the business community, is part of a wider programme of streamlining tax collection, and will not come into force until the early 1990s.

I have to set the 1988-89 car and fuel benefit scales for those with company cars. The car scale charges still fall well short of the true value of the benefit, and, as last year, I propose to increase them by 10 per cent. There will be no change in the fuel scales which, as already announced, will also be used for VAT purposes from 6 April. [Interruption.]

Training and retraining are vital to a flexible and competitive economy. At present training — [Interruption.] If right hon. and hon. Members are not interested in training, they show themselves to be a fraud, which we know them to be.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Chancellor's Parliamentary Private Secretary, obviously, has some amended version of the speech which he has received from a civil servant in the Box. Would you now suspend the sitting until the Chancellor is properly equipped with the new speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows perhaps better than any other hon. Member that, according to convention, the Chancellor is listened to without interruption. The hon. Gentleman also knows that what happens behind the Chair is not part of our proceedings.

Mr. Lawson: Training and retraining are vital to a flexible and competitive economy. At present, training financed by an employer that is related to the employee's current job is allowable against tax for the employer and imposes no tax burden on the employee. But an employer who is willing to finance the retraining of workers for future employment elsewhere may find that the cost of this is not allowable against tax, and the employee may find that he has received a taxable benefit. I propose to remove both these obstacles. This should help more workers to acquire new skills for new jobs.

The past few years have seen a remarkable and welcome growth in the number of small businesses and the self-employed. The Government have done a great deal to lighten the burdens on this vitally important sector of the economy. But I am well aware that problems remain, not least in the field of VAT.

Accordingly, I asked Customs and Excise to issue a consultative document last autumn canvassing a number of changes. In the light of the responses to that document, I have four proposals to make.

Perhaps the biggest problem faced by the small business man today is the trade customer who is late in paying his bills: so late sometimes that VAT becomes due before the bill has been paid. I can do nothing about late payment; but I can, I hope do something about the VAT problem.

My first and most important proposal, therefore, is that, as from 1 October, businesses whose annual turnover is under £¼ million, which covers more than half of all traders registered for VAT, will be able to choose to account for VAT on the basis of cash paid and received. In other words, they will have no liability to pay VAT until they themselves have received the money from their customers. In addition to easing the cash flow problems caused by late payers, this system will, of course, provide automatic VAT relief on bad debts.

I have to warn the House, however, that I cannot legally introduce this change without first obtaining a derogation from the European Community's sixth VAT directive. I am applying for the necessary derogation today. The House will note that the upper limit of £¼ million is considerably greater than the £100,000 suggested in the consultative document.

Second, I propose to give these businesses the option of accounting for VAT on an annual basis. Instead of making quarterly returns, they would make regular payments on account, and then file a single return at the end of the year. This option, which offers considerable streamlining, will be available next year.

Third, the period within which business must apply to be registered for VAT will be extended from 10 to 30 days.

Fourth, there will be changes to the rules for the special VAT schemes for retailers, and more small and medium-sized businesses will be able to make use of the simpler schemes.

I believe that the changes I have outlined, and in particular the option to move to cash accounting, will be widely welcomed by the small business community. The cost will be £115 million in 1987-88 and £60 million in 1988-89.

In addition, I propose to increase the VAT threshold to £21,300, to keep it at the maximum permitted under existing European Community law.

In the light of the responses to the consultative document, I shall not be going ahead either with the withdrawal of the so-called standard method by which retailers calculate their gross takings for VAT, or with the compulsory deregistration of traders below the VAT threshold.

I have one further measure to help the small business man, unrelated to VAT. I propose to increase the limit for capital gains tax retirement relief by 25 per cent. from £100,000 to £125,000.

In any ongoing programme of tax reduction and reform, where much still remains to be done, an essential element must always be the elimination of unintended or unjustified tax breaks, which cause rates of tax generally to be higher than they need to be. Accordingly, I have five proposals to make today to that end.

The first concerns VAT, and has already been the subject of extensive consultation. The House will be aware that a business that provides a service that is exempt from VAT cannot in turn deduct input tax on its purchases. But where the activities of a business are in part liable to VAT and in part exempt the existing rules are excessively generous as to the amount of input tax that can be deducted; and this generosity is being exploited on a growing scale.

The rules must therefore be changed, and the changes, which I proposed to the House last December, will come into effect on 1 April.

There will be special arrangements to deal with the problem of brewers' tied houses.

I am also taking this opportunity to exclude a significant number of small businesses from the scope of this provision. The yield from this change will be some £300 million in 1987-88 and £400 million in 1988-89.

Second, I propose to change the law so that companies in multinational groups which enjoy dual residence will no longer be able to secure tax relief twice on one and the same interest payment. Genuine trading companies will not be affected. This change, which will take effect on 1 April, follows the similar action recently taken by the United States. It will yield £125 million in 1988-89.

Third, I propose to end the present excessively generous treatment of tax credit relief for foreign withholding tax paid on interest on bank loans. In future, banks will be able to offset this tax credit only against tax on the profit on the relevant loan, and not more widely. This will bring our rules broadly into line with those in most other countries.

[Mr. Lawson]

The change will apply from 1 April this year for new loans and from 1 April next year for existing loans. It will yield some £20 million in 1988-89.

Fourth, the tax treatment of Lloyd's syndicates as it applies to the reinsurance to close system is clearly unsatisfactory. I therefore propose to bring it into line with that of provisions for outstanding liabilities made by ordinary insurance companies and, indeed, of comparable provisions made by other financial traders. I have asked the Inland Revenue to consult urgently with Lloyd's about the details of the legislation. The new rules will first apply to premiums payable for the Lloyd's account which closes on 31 December this year.

Fifth, I propose to implement the Keith committee's recommendations that interest should be charged in the limited number of cases where an employer does not apply PAYE properly and a formal assessment has to be made to recover the tax. This change will take effect from April next year, and the yield in 1988-89 is estimated at £45 million.

I have one further proposal to make in the broad field of business and tax.

In my Budget last year I suggested the possibility of introducing a measure of tax relief for profit-related pay.

I pointed then to two considerable advantages that might be expected to flow from arrangements which relate pay to profits. First, the work force would have a more direct personal interest in the profits earned by the firm or unit in which they work; and, second, there would be a greater degree of pay flexibility in the face of changing market conditions. Such flexibility is vital if, as a nation, we are to defeat the scourge of unemployment.

Last July I presented a Green Paper on profit-related pay in conjunction with my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I now propose to introduce a scheme of tax relief broadly along the lines floated in the Green Paper.

My proposals depart from those in the Green Paper in one important respect. I am doubling the proportion of an employee's profit-related pay that will be tax free from a quarter to a half, and I am also increasing the upper limits on the relief. For a married man on average earnings receiving 5 per cent. of his pay in profit-related form, the tax relief will be equivalent to a penny off the basic rate of income tax. The cost will inevitably depend on take-up. It could be £50 million in 1988-89, building up to substantially more than that, as take-up grows, and as the proportion of an employees's pay which is profit-related rises.

Profit-related pay is no panacea. But then there are no panaceas. What it is is a tool to help British business gradually to overcome one of our biggest national handicaps — the nature and behaviour of our labour market. I am today challenging British management to take advantage of that tool and to make good use of it, for the good of their firm, their work force and their country.

TAXES ON SAVING

I turn now to the taxation of savings.

A central theme and purpose of the Government's policies is the creation of a genuine popular capitalism.

That means wider home ownership, wider share ownership, and wider pension ownership. Over the past eight years, the Government have actively promoted the first two, and have now embarked on the third: home ownership, above all through the council tenant's right to buy; and share ownership, through the rapid growth of employee share schemes, through the massively successful privatisation programme, where Britain has led the world, and most recently through the new personal equity plans, which I announced in last year's Budget and which started up on 1 January this year. In the first month of the scheme, more than 2,000 people a day took out personal equity plans, many of them first-time investors, as I had hoped.

We know that 63 per cent. of households now own their own homes, 2½ million more than in 1979. However, there have been no official figures for the more explosive growth of share ownership in Britain over the past eight years. The treasury and the Stock Exchange therefore jointly commissioned a major independent survey of individual shareholding in Britain.

The results are now available. They show that there are now some 8½ million individual shareholders in this country, amounting to one fifth of the total adult population, and roughly three times the number there were in 1979.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): So what?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman may learn.

Then there is wider pension ownership. Two years ago, the Government embarked on a major strategy to extend the coverage of private pension provision and to give individuals far more flexibility and choice in the way they provide for their retirement. We have already introduced a number of important new measures to that end, and the tax changes I am announcing today will complete the picture.

The cornerstone of the Government's pensions strategy is the introduction of an entirely new means of provision for retirement, developed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. This is the personal pension, which will be launched at the beginning of next year, three months earlier than planned.

Personal pensions are an important new dimension of ownership. They will enable employees—if they so wish —to opt out of their employers' schemes and make their own arrangements, tailored to fit their own circumstances. And they will provide a new opportunity for the 10 million employees who at present do not belong to an occupational scheme to make provision of their own and, if they so wish, to contract out of SERPS.

In my Budget last year I undertook to bring forward proposals to give personal pensions the same favourable tax treatment as is currently enjoyed by retirement annuities. These were duly published in a consultative document last November, and the necessary legislation will be contained in this year's Finance Bill.

In addition, to encourage a wider spread of occupational schemes, employers will be able to set up simplified schemes with the minimum of red tape. This will be particularly welcome to many small employers who have been discouraged by the complexity and open-ended commitment of a full-blown final salary scheme. And there will be much greater scope for transferring between different types of pension scheme. Again, the Finance Bill will contain the necessary tax provisions.

Finally I have decided to go beyond the proposals set out in the consultative document in one important respect.

Starting in October, I propose to allow members of occupational pension schemes to make additional voluntary contributions, with full tax relief, to a separate plan of their own choice instead of, as now, being restricted to plans within their employers' schemes. They will be able to top their pensions up to the present tax approval limits.

The proposals I have outlined — along with the measures my right hon. Friend has already taken—will make it easier for people to take their pensions with them when they change jobs, which will be good both for labour mobility and for independence. They will widen the range of choices people can make about their pensions and will mean that in future individuals will have much more control over the way in which their own pension contributions are invested.

Taken as a whole, the changes we have made in the last two years have brought about a radical transformation in the ways people can provide for their retirement. There are new options for employers and much greater freedom for individuals to plan their own pensions. This will lead to a further major extension of ownership, as people start to take advantage of the new opportunities.

But the generous tax treatment of pensions can be justified only if it is not abused. I propose, therefore, to introduce some limited changes to the present rules to restrict the excessive relief which can be obtained in some circumstances, particularly by a few very highly paid people. These will include a stricter definition of final salary and, for all arrangements entered into from today, an upper limit of £150,000 on the maximum permissible tax-free lump sum, coupled with more rigorous rules on how pension and lump sum benefits can be calculated.

The cost of the overall pensions package will inevitably depend on take-up, but with that proviso is estimated at £65 million in 1988-89.

For friendly societies, I have decided to replace the existing tax-exempt life assurance limit based on the sum assured with a new limit based on annual premiums. I propose to set this at £100 a year, which will greatly increase the scope for the traditional societies to offer life policies to their members.

The tax-exempt limits governing sickness and accident benefits which trade unions provide for their members have not been changed since 1982. With effect from today, I propose to increase them to £3,000 for lump sums and £625 for annuities.

Finally, in this section, I turn to inheritance tax. In my Budget last year I abolished the pernicious capital transfer tax on lifetime gifts between individuals, which was particularly damaging to the ownership and health of family businesses. This year I propose to extend the same exemption from tax, on similar terms, to gifts involving settled property where there is an interest in possession. This will not, however, apply to discretionary trusts. These changes will be of particular benefit to family businesses and to heritage properties, both of which are often held in trust.

I also propose to make two minor changes affecting business assets. First, holdings in companies quoted on the unlisted securities market will henceforth be treated for inheritance tax purposes in precisely the same way as holdings in companies with a full Stock Exchange listing. Second, business relief for minority holdings in excess of 25 per cent. in unquoted companies will be increased from 30 per cent. to 50 per cent. The purpose of both these changes is to concentrate business relief more accurately on those assets which could provide funds to pay the tax only at the risk of damaging the business.

The abolition of the tax on lifetime giving was of the first importance to family businesses. but I remain conscious that it did little to help the smallest taxable estates, where the family home is often the principal asset.

I therefore propose to make a substantial increase in the threshold for inheritance tax, from £71,000 to £90,000, coupled with a simplification of the rate structure from seven rates to four. As a result of this change, the number of estates liable to inheritance tax will be cut by roughly a third. The cost will be £75 million in 1987-88 and £170 million in 1988-89.

Despite this substantial relief, however, and all the other much-needed reliefs that my predecessor and I have introduced since 1979, the House may be interested to learn that the expected yield of inheritance tax in 1987-88, at over £1 billion, is three times the yield of capital transfer tax in 1978-79, an increase in real terms of almost 50 per cent.

TAXES ON SPENDING

I now turn to the taxation of spending.

I have already announced some important changes in value added tax to prevent avoidance and to help the small business man. I have no other proposals for major changes in VAT this year.

However, in the light of representations I have received, I have decided to extend slightly the VAT reliefs I introduced last year for certain aspects of charitable work. I propose to relieve charities from VAT on certain welfare vehicles used by hospices to transport the terminally ill; on installing or adapting lavatory or bathroom facilities in charity homes for the disabled; on drugs and chemicals used by a charity in medical research; and on specialised location and indentification equipment employed by mountain rescue and first aid services.

While on the subject of charitable giving, I should remind the House that this year's Finance Bill will increase the limit on donations to charity under the new payroll giving scheme, which starts next month, from £100 to £120 a year.

Next, the excise duties. I propose to maintain the revenue from the taxation of gambling but to make some readjustment within the total. I therefore propose to increase the gaming machine licence duty by about a quarter, which will restore it in real terms to its 1982 level, when it was last increased; and to offset this by abolishing, from 29 March, the tax on on-course betting. I am sure that this measure will be welcomed by the racing and bloodstock industry, as well as consoling those hon. Members who have complained to me about the clash this year between Budget day and the Champion Hurdle.

In my Budget Statement last year I undertook to introduce a tax differential in favour of unleaded petrol, to offset its higher production cost. I can now announce that the differential will be 5p a gallon. This means that the pump price of unleaded petrol should be no higher than that of four-star leaded petrol. The change will take effect from 6 o'clock this evening.

In my 1985 Budget I announced the first stage in the process of increasing the rates of vehicle excise duty on farmers' heavy lorries to bring them into line with the use they make of the public roads. I introduced the second stage in last year's Budget and propose to complete the process this year. I also propose to increase the rates of duty on trade licences and to rationalise the taxation of recovery vehicles.

I have no further changes to propose this year in the rates of excise duty.

INCOME TAX

Finally, I turn to income tax.

There is now a worldwide consensus on the economic desirability of tax reform and tax reduction, and in particular the reduction of income tax. This was demonstrated most recently by the various national policy declarations that emerged from last month's meeting of Finance Ministers from the major industrial nations.

Lower rates of tax sharpen up incentives and stimulate enterprise, which in turn is the only route to better economic performance. And it is only by improving our economic performance that we will be able to afford to spend more on public services; and only by improving our economic performance that we will be able to create jobs on the scale that we all want to see.

That is why, ever since we first took office in 1979, we have consistently sought to reduce the burden of income tax. We have cut the basic rate of tax from 33 per cent. to 29 per cent. and sharply reduced the punitive higher rates we inherited from the Labour party. And we have increased the main tax allowances by 22 per cent. more than inflation, taking almost 1¼ million people out of income tax altogether.

For 1987-88 I propose to raise all the main thresholds and allowances by the statutory indexation factor of 3·7 per cent., rounded up. Thus the single person's allowance will rise by £90 to £2,425 and the married man's allowance by £140 to £3,795. The single age allowance will rise by £110 to £2,960 and the married age allowance by £170 to £4,675. The age allowance income limit becomes £9,800. I propose to raise the first 40 per cent. higher rate threshold by £700 to £17,900, in line with statutory indexation; but the threshold for the 45 per cent. rate will go up by only £200 to £20,400. The other higher rate thresholds will remain unchanged.

I have two other changes in allowances to announce.

First, I propose to give an additional increase in the age allowance for those aged 80 or over. For them, the increase will be double the amount due under statutory indexation so that, for the very elderly, the single age allowance will rise by £220 to £3,070 and the married age allowance by £340 to £4,845. Around 400,000 taxpayers will benefit from this new measure, and up to 25,000 of them will be taken out of income tax altogether.

Second, the blind person's allowance has remained unchanged since 1981, when it was increased by £180 to its present level of £360. For 1987-88 I propose to increase it by a further £180, to £540.

Finally, I turn to the basic rate of income tax. This is the starting rate of income tax for everyone and the marginal rate for the overwhelming majority of taxpayers.

In my Budget speech last year I reaffirmed the aim set out by my predecessor in 1979, to reduce the basic rate of income tax to no more than 25 per cent. That remains my firm objective.

However, given my decision to use the greater part of the fiscal scope I now have to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement, that goal cannot be achieved in this Budget.

I can, however, take a further step towards it, as I did last year. I am therefore reducing the basic rate of income tax by 2p to 27 per cent. This reduction, which will benefit every taxpayer in the land, will be worth more than £3 a week to a man on average earnings.

There will, of course, be a consequential reduction in the rate of advance corporation tax, and—as last year—I also propose a corresponding cut in the small companies' rate of corporation tax from 29 per cent. to 27 per cent.

Taken together with the income tax change, this will mean a significant reduction in the tax burden on small businesses, which are so important for future growth and jobs.

The income tax changes I have just announced will take effect under PAYE on the first pay day after 17 May. They will cost a little more than £2 billion in 1987-88 over and above the cost of statutory indexation.

The total cost of all the measures in this year's Budget again on an indexed basis, is a little over £2½ billion.

CONCLUSION

In this Budget I have reaffirmed the prudent policies which, despite a year-long coal strike followed by a collapse in the oil price, have given us the strongest economy we have known since the war.

After an autumn statement which substantially increased public spending in priority areas, I have once again cut the basic rate of income tax: a cut which the Labour party is pledged to reverse, if it is given the chance —which it will not be. And I have done this while sharply reducing public borrowing—a combination that has eluded successive Governments for decades.

This is a Budget built on success, and a Budget for success. I commend it to the House.

Provisional Collection of Taxes

Motion made, and Question,

That, pursuant to section 5 of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968, provisional statutory effect shall be given to the following motions:

(a) Unleaded petrol (Motion No. 2); and put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 50 (Ways and Means Motions), and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall now call the Chancellor of the Exchequer to move the motion entitled "Amendment of the law". It is on that motion that the Budget debate will take place today and on succeeding days. The remaining motions will not be put until the end of the Budget debate next week, and they will then be decided without debate.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the national debt and public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or

(d) for relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description—[Mr. Lawson.]

4.35 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I begin with the usual facilities and congratulate — [HON. MEMBERS: "Felicities."]— the usual facilities of offering the usual felicities and congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his Budget speech and, indeed, on yet another record-breaking short speech? I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will have reason to be grateful for the fact that he was economical with his words—I use the term in its very best sense—and that he was able to produce such a remarkable anticlimax towards the end which, for those of us with a poetic turn of mind, will be all the more gratifying. The Chancellor may have lost his place in the speech, but with this Budget he has lost his place in history as well.

The Budget is, as we and almost everyone else anticipated, a bribes Budget. It is a Budget that almost entirely ignores the national need for efficiency in the production of wealth and the national demand for fairness in the distribution of wealth. It is a Budget that has little to do with the general good, and everything to do with the general election.

The approach of the Budget to the problems of this country starkly defines the difference between the values and priorities of Her Majesty's Government and the values and priorities of the British people as they express them whenever they are asked. Those priorities are to fight unemployment, to help the old, to help the weak and to reunite the country. Those priorities are held all over the country, except on the Government Front Bench.

The Government have chosen a Budget that produces a short-term consumption spurt, but we and the British people want long-term investment to build up foundations for future strength. The Government choose across-the-board cuts in taxes. We and the British people want across-the-nation cuts in unemployment, but the Chancellor, in his Budget, has again done absolutely nothing to mount any form of serious attack on the 3 million level of unemployment in this country. All that he has done is to continue with the Government's efforts to beautify the figures of unemployment, while doing nothing to deal with the facts of unemployment.

There are elements in the right hon. Gentleman's speech with which we concur. I select particularly the simplification and improvement of the business expansion scheme, and also the corporation tax changes, which appear, certainly at first sight, to be welcome, if with some necessary minor reforms. The improvements in taxation incentives to encourage training are all the more welcome. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman might have felt disposed to go further than that, given the very sad and inadequate record of investment in training, which is all too typical in this country.

Changes in the system of payment and in the administration of VAT for small businesses is particularly welcome. I think that this will be greeted on both sides of the House, but I must say to the right hon. Gentleman that many people who have small businesses — the vast majority of whom are entirely reputable—will want him to ensure that there will not be an abuse of those changes, which would inflict disadvantages upon honest traders and small producers.

The reliefs on the VAT liabilities of charities are naturally welcome and, indeed, as the Chancellor will be aware, they have been pressed for by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The subsidies to ensure against different and disadvantaged prices for non-leaded oil are also welcome. We commend all these measures and give an easy passage to them, although, naturally, the detail of them must be explored in the appropriate way.

The Chancellor took it upon himself in the Budget to make a drum-banging announcement about the abolition of the Exchange Control Act 1947. I think that that is unlikely to be resisted, as it is a somewhat academic, even otiose, exercise at the present juncture. Indeed, the incoming Labour Government have a much better system for encouraging the return of much needed capital investment. [Interruption.] The repatriation scheme that we propose and will implement has received accolades from many independent observers who consider that the advantages that it will afford to those who move money will provide us with ready and plentiful resources to stimulate just the kind of investment that this country desperately needs. Much of such investment has been lost as a consequence of the huge increase in the outflow of capital investment since the Prime Minister and her colleagues removed capital exchange controls at the beginning of their period of office. This represents a loss in our already under-invested country of about £70 billion net in the past eight years.

The Chancellor has claimed that investment decisions have improved since he made his changes in 1984. He must explain how those investment decisions manifest such an improvement when this year the level of investment in manufacturing in Britain is 20 per cent. lower than it was in 1979 when the Government came into office.

As we listened to the Chancellor today, many of us, on both sides of the House, must have felt a certain familiarity with his Tory themes and the tactics that he is plainly seeking to implement. We recall the dilation of the economy before the election of 1983 and the subsequent action by this Chancellor to reverse the extremely modest expansion that was prompted by his right hon. and learned Friend the former Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Chancellor's actions in 1984 were part of the Tory tradition that stretches back through Reggie Maudling and Heathcoat-Amory to the Chancellorship of the late lamented R. A. Butler, a much respected and endearing man in many ways, but he was also the father of the congenital Conservative practice of making concessions before an election and, if successful in buying votes, taking those concessions back after the election. [Interruption.] That, indeed, is precisely what R. A. Butler did in 1955 when he presented the April Budget. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will recall that Budget, as you were active in the engineering business at that time.

In 1955 Rab Butler took 9d off the standard rate of income tax and raised tax thresholds. Just three months later, after the election, he introduced special measures. In October he brought in a special emergency Budget to reverse all the tax changes. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Those actions are memorable, not only because of the cynicism that they engendered, but because of the unforgettable appeal that the late Lord Butler made to the nation to respond in pursuit of his demands for stringency. I am sure you will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I do, that Lord Butler said that the nation should "not drop back into easy evenings with port wine and over-ripe pheasant."

In our prefab I clearly recall that my mother and father gave up port wine and over-ripe pheasant for the duration. As I recall, they even gave up dressing for dinner.

Even more memorable from that period was the fact that that Budget marked the onset of the "stop-go" era in the British economy—an era that has cost our country so dear. There was the periodic "go" for consumption and mainly "stop" for investment. As we listened to the Chancellor today, that is exactly what we heard all over again — "go" for consumption, and "stop" for investment. Of course, it was wrapped up in a great deal of talk about "recovery", "strength", "buoyancy" and "prudence", as if the Budget was a carefully compiled climax to all the years of prudence and planning undertaken by the Government. The trouble is that, for the Government, all the facts belie any claims of prudence, buoyancy, recovery and care.

The fact is that we have a Chancellor who, just three months ago, in December, was saying that he doubted

"very much whether there will be much scope for reductions in taxation in next year's Budget."

For once, the right hon. Gentleman absolutely meant it. It was not part of a disinformation campaign to persuade people that there was nothing much coming so that there would be great delight when something did come. The right hon. Gentleman meant his publicly expressed doubt about the prospect for income tax reductions. It was the confession of a man who knew very well that the reality of unplanned public expenditure overruns and an oncoming balance of payments deficit, together with his mismanagement of both interest and exchange rates, was catching up with him. There was no talk then of "lucky Lawson", and that was only 12 weeks ago.

It is no wonder that there was no such talk, because the Chancellor was also aware of the fact that, after nearly eight years of Conservative rule, the economy was still not back, as represented by all the important indicators, to the performance standards that were inherited in 1979.

We have had nearly eight years of oil-rich Conservative rule—some seven and a half years—with £60 billion net oil revenues and all the immense advantages of the savings on the balance of payments because we were an oil-producing, oil-exporting country. With all those advantages, the Government still blew all the great opportunities that went with being oil rich.

As I said earlier, manufacturing investment is now 20 per cent. lower than it was in 1979. The manufactured trade surplus that the Government inherited in 1979 was £2·7 billion. This year the manufactured trade deficit is approaching £7·5 billion, even on the Chancellor's admission. In the years from 1979 manufacturing exports have certainly gone up by 15 per cent., but manufactured imports have gone up by 48 per cent. in volume over the same period.

In the early part of his speech the Chancellor spoke of a great productivity surge that has taken place under the Government—unbeatable, unrivalled by other countries. The Chancellor forgot to tell us about the starting point. He also forgot to say how that productivity surge has been achieved under the Government. It has been achieved by fewer people making fewer things. Indeed, 28 per cent. fewer people make 4 per cent. fewer things, because manufacturing output in Britain is still, in 1987, 4 per cent. lower than it was in 1979. So much for productivity Tory style.

What of taxation, the centrepiece of today's Budget? The tax burden as a proportion of the national income was still, in 1986, 18 per cent. greater than it was under the previous Labour Government. As a consequence of today's changes, that figure will not have altered significantly. To bring down the level of the tax burden, as a proportion of national income, to the 1979 figure the Government would have had to cut tax today by £15 billion.

The tax burden on the average household — the people who are supposed to concern the Prime Minister very much and who are said to want additional sums net of tax to be able to look after themselves, which is an instinct that I well understand—under this so-called tax-cutting Government has gone up by 10 per cent. To bring their tax burden down to 1979 levels there would have had to be a cut in the standard rate to 23·5p in the pound. [Interruption.] I realise why those figures make Conservative Members so agitated. They represent the shattering of every one of the central promises that they made to the people in 1979 and in 1983.

The Prime Minister says that she wants the citizen to be able to keep the lion's share of his earnings, but it is obvious that the Government have never practised what they have preached, except for the top 10 per cent. of earners. For the other 90 per cent. of British earners and pensioners, national insurance contributions, rates rises and VAT increases have all ensured that they have kept less of their incomes post-tax than they did in 1979.

The Government are not only the biggest taxers in modern British history, but the biggest job destroyers and biggest poverty spreaders. They have presided over an increase of 2 million in unemployment and of 2¾ million in the number of men, women and children in poverty. That is the Government's record. The real state of our economy and society is that after eight years the country is more divided and more impoverished with higher taxes, higher unemployment, and higher crime rates as well under this Government of law and order. In the middle of all that mess, along comes the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a Budget that completely ignores each of those realities and attends only to tax cuts which, to his surprise, he is now able to offer. Lucky for him, but I wonder whether it is so lucky for the country.

To answer the question whether it is lucky for the country, we have to investigate the sources of these funds: the causes of the Chancellor's so-called "room to manoeuvre". First, it is resourced from the privatisation swag—the proceeds of the once-and-for-all sale of what the late Earl of Stockton called the "family silver". Secondly, the windfall comes from an increasing corporate tax take, as the Chancellor said. This is the corporate tax take by a Chancellor who removed investment allowances and, in the process, gained himself additional revenues to fund a tax giveaway and extra consumption. The awful irony is that the consumption boosted by that process will be the consumption of imported finished goods.

We have a Chancellor who has been disabling this country's investment while increasing the consumption of the produce of our competitors. Such consumption provides the third source of revenue for this give away. Much of the revenue has come from VAT levied on imported manufactured goods bought on tick in a Britain now undergoing its biggest ever credit spree—a credit expansion that has doubled household debt in seven years and been the major source of what expansion there has been in the economy.

I heard the Chancellor giving us a lecturette on the way in which those who had argued that fiscal expansion was necessary to bring about an expansion of the economy had been vanquished. He did not say that one does not need fiscal expansion so long as one is massively increasing the debt of households and financing recovery, or attempted recovery, in the economy by that means. Indeed, one does not need fiscal expansion in great measure when the level of that debt is up over those seven years, from £80 billion to £210 billion.

Most people know, as the Chancellor knows, and as you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I know, that that cannot last. It will not last because, as the oil runs down, as the productive sector stands almost still, and as the trade deficit grows, the real economy is not strong enough to sustain that credit bubble. That is why it was all the more essential for the Chancellor to take the opportunity today of the revenue windfall, to count his blessings, and to use that temporary and unexpected bonus to address the economy's real problems. Instead of spraying Britain with across-the-board cuts, he should have been using those funds to combat unemployment, to mitigate poverty, to stimulate investment, to build houses, to develop industry, to invest in education and to encourage and improve training and research.

Those were the priorities that the right hon. Gentleman should have adopted. There was no shortage of prudent and productive options. He could have restored the lower tax band and assisted people, especially those on lower incomes, so that they were eased into payment of tax. He could have used resources to start making up the losses which the Government have inflicted on pensioners by breaking the link between average earnings and pensions. As pensioners look forward to an 80p a week increase for the single pensioner and £1·30 a week for the pensioner couple, they must ruefully reflect on the fact that, had that link been maintained by the Prime Minister and her Government, in 1987 pensioner couples would be £11·40 a week better off and single pensioners £7·20 a week better off.

For £3 billion, the Chancellor could have obtained 90,000 new houses or 250,000 repaired houses. He could have obtained 1·5 million nursery school places or 210,000 extra further education places. For £3 billion, he could have obtained a computer for every secondary school child, day centres for 2·5 million old people, or treatment for 3 million hospital cases. He could have exercised any one of those options. For that £3 billion he could have given every old-age pensioner an extra £6 a week. Instead of adopting the attitude that he has taken today, he need not let them go through another winter in which they have to see what the temperature is before knowing whether they can afford to put the heating on. Housing, education, care, health services, support for the old and support for the disabled cannot be improved by tax cuts—whatever else the Chancellor may do with tax cuts—and the British people know that.

There was another choice for the Chancellor. He could have targeted his billions on jobs that this country needs, to be done by people who need to do them. He could have used £3 billion of targeted resources to generate 300,000 jobs in Britain. Instead, his tax cuts will secure, over two years, at best an extra 80,000 jobs in Britain. What a wilful waste of resources and of opportunity, especially as the British people strongly prefer investment in jobs, in economic strength and in modern social, health and education provision. They emphatically and repeatedly record their view that they want cuts in unemployment and in waiting lists and reductions in poverty and division more than they want concessions in income tax. They understand that failure to invest in those advances guarantees a future of insecurity, under-performance and unemployment for our country. In that understanding they show far more prudence and far more patriotism than either the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Prime Minister.

That is why, despite the pre-election largesse, despite the giveaway, despite the bribes, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with this Budget, invites not the celebration of the British people, but their contempt.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): In reply to the Leader of the Opposition I would simply say, "It's better under the Conservatives." The country knows it, and when the time comes I am sure it will keep it that way. In his heart of hearts the Leader of the Opposition knows this. His criticism today reminded me of a man whistling to keep up his courage. The only snag is that he had to go on whistling for rather a long time.

I congratulate the Chancellor most warmly on his Budget. It is the result of careful and prudent husbandry which has seen us through the Falklands war, the miners' strike and the severe drop in the oil price last year. I shudder to think what would have happened if the Opposition had been in power in those years, knowing their tendency to spend up to the hilt of their income and even more—at least that was the record when they were in power.

Last year's prudent Budget is the background to the rosy position in which we find ourselves today. Unemployment has fallen in the past five months and is now lower than a year ago—but not a word of praise for this from the Leader of the Opposition. How glad I was to hear the Chancellor say that unemployment had fallen by 100,000 since last July and that the youth unemployment rate in the United Kingdom is now below the average for the European Community and is falling, too. There are now a million more jobs than there were in 1983 and we have a faster rate of increase in employment than the whole of the European Community put together. Job vacancies in the past three months have been at their highest level since 1979.

Privatisation has gained increased momentum. Fourteen major businesses with 500,000 employees have been privatised so far. The number of individual shareholders has more than trebled since 1979. How encouraging it was to hear the Chancellor say that shareholders at present number 8·5 million. What a long way we have come since I introduced my employee share ownership scheme in 1978, and how encouraged I was to hear the proposals for a profit-related pay scheme. This will help the people on the shop floor and those in industry. How disparaging the Leader of the Opposition was about the performance of manufacturing industry today. He ought to be aware how much manufacturing output is going up.

Turning to investment abroad, the figure given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of £100 billion net assets is a new one today. It is very encouraging for our economy because it means that we have been under-estimating the present income that our foreign assets are earning annually; the present figure is £5 billion.

What a difference from 10 years ago when we had a hung Parliament ruling this country. Because overspending, capital spending had to be pruned by 25 per cent., expenditure on the Health Service was slashed by more than 30 per cent. and on major roads by 31 per cent.

The Leader of the Opposition talked about the pensioners. Let us remember that twice in those years the Christmas bonus for pensioners was cut—and all those promises——

Mr. Kinnock: Ask the pensioners.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: If the Leader of the Opposition wishes to interrupt me, I will sit down. I do not like his interrupting from a sitting position.

Mr. Kinnock: I would just invite the hon. Gentleman to go to any old age pensioners in his constituency and compare what they receive now with what they received before 1979 when there was a link with average earnings. He will find that over those years the rise in real terms in the value of the pension was 20 per cent.; under this Government it has been 4·5 per cent.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: The right hon. Gentleman may deal in figures, but I know my constituency very well. It has 30,000 pensioners. I can assure him that what they value more than anything else is stability in prices, not the kind of inflation that they had under the Labour Government. Nor has there been a word of welcome from the Leader of the Opposition for the generous help that the Chancellor is giving to the over-80s. These are the people who have had difficulty, and I would have thought that the Leader of the Opposition might have said something about them, since he professes to care and criticises us for not caring.

I welcome the changes that have been made. It was a difficult judgment for the Chancellor to get the right balance between helping over the public sector borrowing requirement and so lowering interest rates. I hope that because of this judgment we will see a big reduction in the next few months in mortgage and interest rates — something that will help manufacturing industry far more than the wild promises of the Leader of the Opposition today.

I welcome, too, the help given to the blind, as will people in my constituency. Then there is the help given by the reduction of 2p in the rate of tax, which is worth £3 a week for the average earner. This will help to improve our already growing productivity.

I underline the help given to small businesses. We know how much small businesses are taking off in our constituencies. The kind of encouragement given them by the Chancellor today will be of great assistance to them.

I now turn to the wild promises of the Labour party which have been costed at £28 billion. It all sounds like a repeat of the disastrous policies between 1974 and 1979 which led to runaway inflation and the erosion of the lifetime savings of pensioners. They will never forget that, and I must point this out to the Leader of the Opposition. The same sort of runaway inflation would happen again if we were to have the policies which he is at present trying to sell to the country.

As regards the alliance, who really thinks that an incomes policy would do any good or that we can increase public spending when it is already at 44·5 per cent. of national income? Yet the alliance now wants to do this. I know that alliance Members here at the moment are laughing about that, but these are the words of a former spokesman of the Social Democratic party, John Horam, which he uttered just recently when he crossed the floor from the SDP to the Conservatives. How much we welcome him in the Conservative party today.

It would be wrong of me not to point out the nearly 30 per cent. increase in rates that we face in Essex as a result of the hung council at county hall. My local district council, which is Conservative-controlled, has been able to peg its rates this year, but the warning is there. We must remember the hung Parliament of 1974 to 1979 which led to such disastrous rates of inflation and the hung councils which throughout the country have led to a heavy rate burden, not as costly as those of Labour-controlled councils but steep nevertheless.

Do not let us have any more hung Parliaments or councils. It has been difficult enough to get the Treasury to reform local government finance. The ratepayers in north-east Essex cannot have a general election soon enough to return a Conservative Government so that we can reform local government finance.

Against the background of this Budget, for which we all thank the Chancellor most warmly, we can look forward to the future, locally and nationally, with confidence and optimism, as long as we do not let hung councils or a hung Parliament hang our country. It is better under the Conservatives. Let us keep it that way.

Royal Assent

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Act:

1. Social Fund (Maternity and Funeral Expenses) Act 1987.

WAYS AND MEANS

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

Amendment of the Law

Question again proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and public revenue and to make a further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or

(d) for relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lawson.]

5.11 pm

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): The hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) seems to be perturbed at the thought that the next Parliament might be a hung Parliament. That does not augur well for the sunshine forecasts of a great Conservative majority next time round. He may be taking a more realistic look at the situation than many of his right hon. and hon. Friends. He also mentioned inflation. I remind him that at a time during this Government, inflation reached 26 per cent. It was put up by this Government slapping on VAT at 15 per cent. The Chancellor takes a great deal of pride in reducing income tax, but it is clear that the lower-paid have lost out because of the imposition of 15 per cent. VAT against the reductions made in income tax.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would write and tell me the year in which VAT reached 26 per cent.

Mr. Stewart: Inflation was at 26 per cent. As far as I recall, I did not say that VAT had reached 26 per cent.

Mr. Brooke: I meant inflation.

Mr. Stewart: I will do that.

The Budget, taken as a whole, was an unfortunate, dull, mechanical exercise. It reminded me of an exercise in an imagined situation in an accountancy examination rather than a Budget dealing with the reality of life in the United Kingdom.

There is no doubt that the kitty for income tax relief has been amassed by drastic reductions over the past few years in the quality of life and essential amenities and services in Britain. The Secretary of State for Social Services replies to accusations about reductions in the quality of those services by quoting figures about increases that the Government have made. One can only ask: are the doctors, nurses and patients in the hospitals under a delusion when they claim that services have been reduced, that many hospitals have empty wards, that many wards have empty beds, that the waiting lists are increasing, and so on? That is the reality with which the Government have to grapple.

In education we have had a series of attacks on the universities and schools. We have not yet reached the stage of burning books, but the books are becoming so scarce that there may not be books to burn if it ever got to that stage.

Local authority services have deteriorated, with cuts in rate support grant, and so on. The picture of a country returning from a depressed state into a state of affluence is a lot of nonsense for most people in this country. It is regrettable, too, that there has been no improvement in old age pensions in this Budget following the severe winter that old people have just experienced.

The Chancellor said that unemployment is falling. The figures for unemployment certainly are falling, but we know that that is due to changes in the methods of calculation in the past few years and the introduction of training schemes, however useful, which were dismissed by the Prime Minister in her days in opposition as not being real jobs.

I welcome the change in VAT collection on the basis of cash received and the requirement that a single annual return for VAT is all that will be required. That is of great assistance to the small business man and will be of real use in increasing business and production. I must say that I was rather amused by the Chancellor's explanation that it all depended on getting permission from the EEC. That is another piece of evidence of the way in which this country has lost its sovereignty as a member of the EEC.

I welcome the VAT relief for charities, ambulances, drugs and medicines. We regard that as some advance. However, if one looks at it in a compassionate way, the charges should never have been included in the first place. I welcome the fact—it is an extremely useful move—that unleaded petrol is now the same price as four-star leaded petrol. I welcome also the increase in the blind allowance. I am sure that that will be welcome all round.

In my view—I think it is widely shared—income tax relief should have been used, if at all, for taking the lower-paid out of the tax system altogether.

The Chancellor claimed that the Budget was built on success. I would say that the Budget was built mainly on the misery of the unemployed. The Chancellor, like the Government, appears to assume that the unemployed, like the poor, are always going to be with us. That is a terrible defeatest attitude and the Government have no solution to achieve any real reduction in the numbers of unemployed.

The Scottish National party, because of the oil, calls for an oil fund which would deal with unemployment in Scotland. We see that a number of European countries are able to keep unemployment under 5 per cent. That would be a realistic aim in an independent Scotland. Until we achieve that, even in a United Kingdom context, the Government could have made a much more sensible and compassionate stab at improving the situation than they have done today.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): I have to say to the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) that I have seen many Budgets in my time, and he has seen a few, but I do not think that either of us will ever see a Budget presented by the Scottish National party.

I suppose, if I have my years right, that I have seen 28 Budgets, but there have been some years in which we have had two or three Budgets so I suppose I have probably seen nearer 38 if one counts those extra Budgets over the years. They have been of all colours. There have been red Budgets from the Opposition, blue Budgets, grey Budgets and black Budgets. This one was bound to be blue. I thought that it was going to be bright blue, but it is a slightly pale blue. I do not think it is as expansive in its give aways as some people expected. I do not think that anybody can say that it is an election-bribing Budget. The Leader of the Opposition was prepared to say that—I could not hear him all the time—and I think that he tried to say it, but without much conviction.

It is a reasonably good Budget. It has half an eye on reality and half an eye on a general election. At least we can crow about the Budget. If the Opposition had been in government they would probably have had to postpone a possible election because they could not have provided a sufficiently attractive Budget. At least we are in a position where, because of the state of the economy—in certain directions—we are able to have this reasonably good Budget. The Opposition are full of promises, but the one thing they do not promise is that after the election they will give us a give-away Budget.

Both the alliance and the Opposition have told us that they will take back some of the tax reductions that we have been given today.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): That was yesterday.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Oh, they have changed their minds, have they? [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are having a little too much audience participation.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: We cannot hope for much from the Labour party, and I would guess that the country can hope for still less from the alliance parties, even if they were to do a deal with the Labour party.

The Budget has to be taken together with the autumn statement — a give-away announcement in which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor surprised many of his hon. Friends by pushing several billion pounds into the economy at a stroke. I think it was during the autumn statement that my right hon. Friend got rid of his hard man image. Today he has a new image as a cautious Chancellor who has not taken too many risks. Probably his long period of driving on those financial motorways —the M1 and the M3—has taught him that he had better not be a hostage to fortune and that he must be cautious.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will give the £4 billion that he pushed into the economy in the autumn time to have its effect. Money in the pockets of the people and in the public purse takes time to fructify. Some of us wanted that £4 billion to be made available perhaps six months earlier. It might then have had more time to affect the electorate. Budgets, too, take time to have their effect. I doubt whether the charges that this was an election-oriented Budget will stick now. We should let it have time to take effect and allow the Opposition the benefit of a long hard summer in which to get politically tanned. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister should think again about going to the country too quickly.

It is always difficult to react immediately to proposals such as these, and I have a certain amount of sympathy with the Leader of the Opposition in that respect. I believe that he tried to put too much into his speech today.

I relate my brief remarks about the Chancellor's proposals first to the PSBR. I know that there is a great deal of merit in keeping the PSBR down, but I wonder whether it needs to be kept quite so low. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor talked about the buoyancy of the economy, and it was his great success story, but said that he had to keep the PSBR down to £4 billion. If he could have let it rise to £5 billion we should have had another £1 billion available for what was needed. My right hon. Friend sitting on the Front Bench knows perfectly well, because of the hat that he wore before, that increased spending is needed on higher education, industrial training, and so on. Just that little extra, added to what he did in the autumn, would have been a help. I believe that the Chancellor is being over-cautious in screwing down the PSBR to £4 billion.

But even if my right hon. Friend did not want to increase the PSBR, why could he not have taken other action? The fact that there was no increase in excise duty on cigarettes and alcohol was probably the biggest surprise in the Budget. I was delighted. I drink a little and smoke too much, and I have got off the hook completely. However, a modest increase, at least on drink, would have given the Chancellor a little to spend on other things.

I am delighted with the announcement about the proposals for relating pay increases to profit. The Government should build on that after the general election. I hope that employers will support the provision because it will need their support to make it stick. I am pleased, too, that small business has been assisted in the provisions relating to the handover from one generation to another. The increase from £100 million to £125 million will be very helpful. The VAT changes will also be helpful to very small business. We have all had letters about the subject, and at last notice has been taken of it.

No one can do other than applaud the reduction of the standard rate of tax from 29 per cent. to 27 per cent. It means that since 1979 we have reduced tax from 33p in the pound to 27p in the pound. However, I am disappointed that the Chancellor did not raise the thresholds a little above the normal rate of inflation. One of the biggest deterrents to hard work today is that when a young man comes into a reasonable salary he loses one third of his income when national insurance is taken into account. That is a tremendous disincentive, and I wish that something would have been done to deal with it.

We started to consider portable pensions a year or two ago, and the provisions announced today will be of great benefit. I support the proposals that people should be allowed to opt out and do their own thing and that they should be able to add to their pensions. On the basis that I would not come away with a large pension when I left this place, I took out some additional pensions myself some years ago. That did not cost me much. Over a period of years I paid in a few hundred pounds each year, and I am now picking up the benefits. I found that the money that I was allowed to draw as a capital sum was in fact more than I had paid in, plus the pensions. That does not happen with the House of Commons pension, and I doubt whether it happens anywhere else in the public service. Of course, public service pensions are index-linked, as is the House of Commons pension, whereas mine are not. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has done something very useful indeed in encouraging people to add to their company pensions by buying in for themselves out of savings.

This is a good, but cautious, Budget. It is a responsible Budget. I do not think that it is a vote-seeking Budget. I doubt whether the general election will be called on the basis of this Budget. The election will be about people's view of whether the economy in general is better run by this Government and this Chancellor than it would be by the Labour party or the alliance. I believe that the public will vote in favour of what they have got rather than what they might have.

5.29 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) was not exactly ecstatic in his praise. The Chancellor delivered his Budget this afternoon. It contained few surprises. As usual, there were whispers beforehand. Some were accurate, and a few were not so accurate. I regret that there was nothing in the Budget for the ordinary pensioner. I reiterate the sentiments expressed by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. He pointed out that the Government had previously broken the link between earnings and pensions. Pensions are now merely indexed in line with the retail prices index, with the result that the value for a single person is £8·05 per week less than under the old rule, and for a married couple it is £12·75 per week less. That drop has meant a considerable loss to pensioners, particularly those in real need. In that sense, the Chancellor fluffed his opportunity.

There is nothing in the Budget about child allowances. Their value has been cut by about 3 per cent. since the Government were elected in 1979. Families with children have certainly fallen behind, and again the Chancellor has missed his opportunity to do something about it.

What is the overall thinking behind the Budget? The answer is that the so-called popular Budget is calculated to try to influence the result of the next general election. At the same time, the Chancellor has attempted to maintain a veneer of prudence. The essential part of the popularity aspect, of course, was to cut the basic rate of income tax by 2p, from 29 to 27 per cent. Throughout their eight years of office the Government have congratulated themselves on cutting taxes. The facts diverge from the rhetoric. When the Government came to power the average person paid 35p in the pound, including VAT and income tax. Until today the figure was 38p in the pound. All that we can do now is to thank the Chancellor for at least giving us back some of our money.

I perfectly understand that no one likes paying tax. Nevertheless, if opinion polls are anything to go by, the majority of people in Britain today say that the handouts that were announced this afternoon would be better used in the creation of jobs and the improvement of social services. The British people are wise in their reasoning. The greatest problem facing our country today is that of unemployment. Every study on the subject shows that public expenditure is a far more cost-effective way of generating jobs than are tax cuts.

Instead of tackling that great social evil the Government seem to pretend that it does not exist. That is why, since 1979, when the Government came to power, there have been 18 or 19 changes in the way in which employment statistics are compiled. The latest report is that the Government are proposing to drop the publication of Britain's registered unemployment figures. Incidentally, that has since been denied by the Secretary of State for Employment, Lord Young. Perhaps we could repeat the famous words of Mandy Rice-Davies, "He would, wouldn't he?" It is time to restore some credibility to such vitally important statistics, so that we can then better assess how the Budget and other Government policies relate to them. I am glad that the Labour party has pledged to re-establish an objective basis for the calculation of the jobless total.

Yesterday, we heard the latest crime statistics. They certainly reflect no credit on the Government. Recorded offences are up 7 per cent. and the clear-up rate is down 5 per cent. The Conservative party has always publicised itself as the party of law and order. That claim looks a bit shabby today. We are all aware that there are many reasons for the rise in the incidence of crime. There is the permissive society, easy divorce and the subsequent break-up of families. There is a lack of family and community sanction against wrongdoers.

I go along with the old adage that the devil finds work for idle hands. When shop windows are full of goods and many people have time on their hands, the tendency towards crime is greatly increased. That is why the Budget should have given the highest possible priority to getting people out of the dole queue. Give them work to do. Many of them have now lost the discipline of a work schedule. They should be given a stake in society. When that is done, there will be less tendency to engage in crime, whether it be burglary, mugging, rape or other crimes.

In the run-up to the 1959 general election, which some of us are old enough to recall, Mr. Harold Macmillan, the late Lord Stockton, told us that we had never had it so good. At least unemployment then was less than 2 per cent. According to the questionable official statistics now, it is over 13 per cent., yet Britain is in the throes of a consumer boom. Tax revenues are buoyant. They are boosted by high consumer spending and corporation tax receipts.

The Chancellor told us that the public sector borrowing requirement is set to the end of 1986-87 at around £3 billion lower than the £7 billion original Treasury forecast. Yet, because of the Government's earlier policies, British industry is in no shape to satisfy the consumer. A recent comment by the reputable National Institute of Economic and Social Research gave the game away. It said:

> "The economic strategy based on neo-classical economics, which was introduced at the end of the 1970s, resulted in an increase in unemployment from 1 million to 3 million. It has now been almost entirely abandoned."

Our principal trading rivals—Germany, Japan, and so on — are deriving much benefit from Britain's consumer boom. Meanwhile, there has been a marked deterioration in our manufacturing trade balance, from a surplus of £2·4 billion in 1982 to a deficit of £5·8 billion in 1986. In that economic experiment on the British people a great deal of our manufacturing industry was razed to the ground. The present consumer boom is overshadowed by the fact that our manufacturing base is still about 15 per cent. below the 1979 level.

It is not only manufacturing industry, however, that has suffered under this Government. Central Government grants to local authorities have been cut from 59·6 per cent. in 1979-80 to 44·3 per cent. in 1986-87. Meanwhile, our councils have struggled manfully to maintain services. I receive evidence of that almost every day from the Newport and Gwent councils.

Overall, Britain has become a shabby society, as the article in the Sunday Telegraph of 8 March by Paul Barker so clearly revealed. Thirty years ago Professor Galbraith referred to private affluence and public squalor. That is the state of Thatcherite Britain in 1987. The leading article in The Observer last Sunday said that the Budget would throw money at the wrong people. How right it was.

Today's Budget should have been more about rebuilding Britain's industrial base and drastically cutting the dole queues. Likewise, it should have been less about the Government's short-term popularity. The continuing presence of the 3 million or so unemployed is a waste of economic resources and potential skills. There is a need to invest wisely in Britain's future, particularly in its greatest resource — its people. The Government should concentrate on building a fairer society. They should seek to eliminate the north-south divide and the division between the haves and the have-nots.

This Budget is essentially about cutting taxes. What justification is there for that when our schools in Gwent and elsewhere are so badly in need of textbooks and equipment; when the queues for our National Health Service seem to stretch to eternity; when our hospital buildings, and so many other public buildings, are crying out for a coat of paint; when countless numbers of homes lack basic amenities and are really unfit for human habitation; when so much of our infrastructure needs attention, modernisation and development? These problems will not be solved by an appeal to private greed. It is by those standards that this Budget is a failure.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): I am sorry that the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) takes such a gloomy view of what I consider is an excellent Budget. Like many of his colleagues on the Opposition Benches, he must have had a very disappointing and unhappy afternoon. One only had to look at the sad faces of Opposition Members as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was speaking to realise how many of them wished that they were hearing their own Chancellor making similar proposals.

This Budget confirms the continuing success of the Government's economic policy. It consolidates the Chancellor's achievements in encouraging industry and commerce and it will stimulate confidence and the creation of more jobs. I am very glad that it gives a welcome boost to industrial training and that it creates a climate in which training today will result in more solid job opportunities. I believe that the industrial training that is provided in this country is very substantial. I have a good deal of practical experience of seeing it in operation. The proposals of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to carry it forward will consolidate that substantial achievement.

I welcome the reforms relating to value added tax. They will be of great help not only to small businesses but to large ones. I am particularly glad about my right hon. Friend's announcement that value added tax will not have to be paid until the bills have been paid. Hon. Members on both sides of the House know only too well about the problems that are caused by slow payers and the difficulties that they have created for the cash flow of small businesses. The change in VAT to take account of those problems, which will enable VAT to be paid on an annual basis at the end of the year, will be very widely welcomed.

One of the interesting features of today's Budget concerns the Chancellor's proposals relating to performance-related pay. I was particularly glad to hear him announce the scheme for tax relief on PRP. I believe that it is significant, because it will forge a much closer link between the profit of an enterprise and the pay of its employees. I hope very much that in future there will be opportunities for further extension of the PRP tax relief scheme. I look forward to seeing the detailed proposals in the Finance Bill.

Any hon. Member who served on the Standing Committee that considered the Social Security Bill will be well aware of the lengthy discussions in Committee on the proposals for money-purchase pensions. Today the Chancellor has announced the bringing forward by three months of the arrangements that will enable individuals to make additional provision for their retirement. The greater scope for transferring from one pension scheme to another will make a very useful contribution to the mobility of labour. The provision that will enable employees to make extra contributions to pension schemes, with full tax relief, will be a great step forward. It will be of particular interest to the younger members of the working population. They will now be able to look forward to a very much more flexible scene and to greater opportunities to top up pension schemes with the results of their own labour.

One of the proposals that drew a certain amount of criticism today from Her Majesty's Opposition, and even a few jeers, related to inheritance tax. Those critical remarks were directed mainly at the increased limits, but those hon. Members who heard my right hon. Friend speak about the effect of the proposal on family businesses will, on reflection, perhaps come to the conclusion that it is very welcome. It will certainly be welcomed by a number of small firms in my Uxbridge constituency and by the people who have built up those businesses. They wish their children to follow them into those businesses—and their grandchildren, too — and they wish to expand employment opportunities in the town. It was a very important announcement. It is one of the many steps that my right hon. Friend has taken along this road, and I hope that in future years he will keep up the good work.

There are to be no significant increases in excise duty. The British people have waited a long time for this happy day. There is to be no increase in vehicle excise duty—the very substantial tax that we all pay on our motor cars. There is to be no increase in the tax on alcohol and tobacco. At last the British people are to enjoy relief from the taxation of these old favourites by successive Chancellors of the Exchequer. It is a very lucky day for the British people. They might care to reflect on what they would have heard had a Socialist Chancellor been standing at the Dispatch Box. I am sure that he would have imposed swingeing increases in the tax on all those items.

The Chancellor has shown himself to be compassionate in listening undoubtedly to the many representations about the blind allowance that he has received from many hon. Members. I welcome those increases, as will, I am sure, every member of the blind community. The Chancellor has also increased the age allowance—a very significant and important improvement—and has made some useful additions to VAT exemptions for charities. All this shows that the Chancellor has been willing to listen to representations made by hon. Members.

I turn to the reduction in the standard rate of income tax. How many hon. Members who were present in the House in 1977, when the standard rate of income tax was 35p in the pound, would have thought that they would sit here today and hear the Chancellor announce that the standard rate is being reduced to 27p in the pound? And about time, too. I welcome the reduction because it will put another £3 a week into the pockets of average industrial workers in this country.

How many hon. Members would have thought that over several successive years we should have seen the tax thresholds increased by 22 per cent. more than the rate of inflation and by a further 3·7 per cent. today? These measures will bring relief to many low-paid workers in this country.

I would like to mention the nurses in whom I have long taken an interest. We all know that nurses are splendid, and many hon. Members have advocated that they should be paid more. In the Budget we see their taxation being reduced quickly, which will be very welcome to them and a very useful interim boost to their income pending the review of nurses' pay which is under way.

I think the Chancellor has been prudent and has not gone too far. He has not gone for a dramatic 4p or 5p reduction in the standard rate of income tax. He has produced a Budget which will generate further confidence, not just in the City of London but around the world, by keeping the PSBR down to 1 per cent. of GDP at £4 billion. Those who study the British economy surely must come to the conclusion that it is now firmly on course and that they have every confidence to continue investing in Britain.

Today we heard the Leader of the Opposition — I thought rather a sour and disappointed man — present his Socialist proposals for repatriating capital to this country. He gave the impression that, despite the proposal to abolish the Exchange Control Act, the Labour party had other ways of persuading people, but he did not say anything about inward investment in Britain. This is a two-way business. Inward investment in Britain will be encouraged only if our borrowing requirement is under control and interest rates are sensible.

This is a consolidating Budget, prudently organised, tackling the main problems which most people in this country want to see dealt with. The Budget also has a few fun items which will be welcome to those who enjoy putting a small bet on the horses. I wonder whether it will also affect the queue of people who appeared in JAK's cartoon in The London Evening Standard yesterday who were putting £5 bets on the Tory party winning the next election. Those of us who saw the cartoon will recognise a few familiar faces. [Interruption.] As has just been said, the Chancellor's proposals today apply only to off-course betting. [AN HON. MEMBER: "On-course betting".] Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will come forward with proposals during proceedings on the Finance Bill to extend it so that his colleagues can place those bets on a Tory victory at the next election. I do not think this is an electioneering Budget; rather it is a consolidation of eight years in office by this Government. I welcome the Budget of behalf of my constituents.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): We have heard a number of speeches from Conservative Members, not all of them quite as enthusiastic as that of the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby). I did not detect a great upsurge of enthusiasm or very convincing cheering from Conservative Members when the Chancellor sat down. I wonder whether the Chancellor had lost that page and never found it. Some of the expressions on the faces of his hon. Friends gave the impression that they felt that something was missing from the Budget that they had been led to expect; that there would be more, but it has not actually arrived.

Those are the aspirations of Tory politicians looking to the election, not the aspirations of the British people looking to a Government who are prepared to face the problems which, according to all the indicators, they feel the Government ought to face. This Budget deepens the inequalities that have been aggravated by eight years of Conservative rule. There is nothing in this Budget for the unemployed, the poor or the low-paid. There is nothing in this Budget for the regions and nations of the United Kingdom, or for manufacturing industry. An opportunity has been missed, because the Chancellor indicated that he had potentially a considerable amount of room to manoeuvre and he chose to concentrate nearly all his resources on keeping down public sector borrowing to a record low level and giving a 2 per cent. cut in the standard rate of tax.

The Chancellor did not even choose to target taxes in a way that could have benefited the low-paid. Two or three weeks ago I was on a Channel 4 programme with Lord Young, who was arguing that the reason why the Government were coming forward with proposals for tax cuts was that many low-paid were still paying too much tax on their income. If he and the Government really believe that, they know that cutting the standard rate is not the way to target tax cuts to give those people the most benefit. The Government could have increased the thresholds proportionately, but chose not to do so.

The most objectionable thing about the Budget is that it has been targeted on a sort of synthetic creature, which is the standard Central Office-specified Conservative voter, at which essentially the tax cuts are aimed — nothing to do with the national interest. The arguments used to support that do not add up to the way that they have actually been applied.

I take up the point made by the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale). We regard as excessively cautious the public sector borrowing requirement being kept down to the low figure of £4 billion. If the reasoning behind that is to placate certain institutions in the City in the hope that this measure will help to bring down interest rates — which I concede it may do — I would have commended to the Chancellor the recommendation, which the alliance has been supporting throughout this Parliament, that we should become a full member of the European monetary system. In so doing we could bring down interest rates by about 2 per cent. The PSBR figure in the Budget is unlikely to bring it down by more than 1 per cent.

Secondly, as I think the Chancellor knows, although his Back Benchers do not, the factors that affect interest rates are diverse and include many other international factors, so they may not even work. In the process, opportunities have been ignored and lost to deal with the problems of the unemployed, to give something to the poor and to tackle the problems of disparities within the regions. I suggest that that is a very serious lost opportunity.

I noted in the Chancellor's introduction to his Budget — it is becoming repetitive, but it is still a star performance — his ability to select statistics that present a picture of us living in an economic nirvana and suggest that it is rather disloyal and unfair of Members of Opposition parties to point to the realities of our society. The Chancellor talked about sustained steady growth, but ignored the enormous collapse that took place in 1979 and 1980, with the effect that manufacturing output is at least 3 to 4 per cent. less than when this Government came to power.

That is hardly an unmitigated success. Indeed, with oil prices weakening, it has contributed to the fact that, on the Chancellor's own forecast, we have a balance of payments deficit that will get significantly worse. Last year the right hon. Gentleman forecast that we would have a balance of payments surplus this year of £3·5 billion, and we actually achieved a deficit of £1 billion. I wonder what a £2·5 billion deficit forecast will turn out to be if we follow the Chancellor's track record in forecasting. I suggest that some uncomfortable indicators have yet to come home to roost.

The Government have not indexed customs and excise duties. Most people know that when that happens it only means that when the Government get round to indexing them later the increases will be that much more painful. I do not think that people will really expect to have got away with it indefinitely.

Nevertheless, I welcome some items within the Budget. Although I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's economic analysis or with his policy objectives, I think that he gives considerable attention to detail on many aspects of reform that are welcome and worth while. We would be churlish not to recognise that. The extension of profit-sharing in particular is very close to alliance hearts. Although it is relatively small and its impact will not be great, we welcome it. There are many more proposals to do with industrial democracy, profit-sharing and worker-share ownership that we hope will be developed in future.

As an environmental matter, 5p off the price of a gallon of unleaded petrol is welcome, not least because the leaders of the alliance will be travelling the country during the general election in a bus using this fuel. We much appreciate that contribution to our election fund. The only problem will be finding enough unleaded pumps around the country, but perhaps this move will help to speed up that process.

The measures introduced to help small businesses are welcome and are worth while. There are more substantial and fundamental things tht we would like to see, such as the abolition of inter-business VAT transactions, because that would obviously save a great deal of administration as well as the capital that is tied up for small businesses.

There should have been regular increases in the allowance for the blind, but we are glad that it is being caught up. I see the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) waiting to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. No doubt he would have liked to see more funding to enable his worthwhile Bill to take full effect. I make a personal plea for other sections of the disabled community, such as the deaf, who do not have the benefit of any such allowance. The time may come when they should be included in a similar benefit.

The extension of personal pension provisions will introduce flexibility and portability, which will help mobility, and certainly we welcome that.

As a Scottish Member, I wish to address some comments to the impact of the Budget in Scotland. The Government have talked traditionally over the past few months of a fall in the underlying trend of unemployment. Many of us are less than convinced that such a fall is taking place. The last jobless figures did not bode well for the Government. When we take account of the various job training schemes, the real jobs that the Prime Minister talked about when she was Leader of the Opposition are no more apparent now than they were then.

I must remind the House that in Scotland the underlying trend of unemployment, on the Government's own figures, is rising sharply. This causes great concern. There is nothing to make the people of Scotland believe that that will be turned round.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that the tax relief proposals for oil exploration will be of considerable benefit to Scotland?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman anticipates a point that I was coming to.

There are two factors within the Budget that will be of help within Scotland. The first is the proposed changes in the allowances for oilfields. These changes fall a long way short of what I would have liked and what will be necessary to stop the jobs haemorrhage, particularly in my part of Scotland. However, I do not wish to be ungrateful. That contribution is welcome, but more help is needed to bring on development. I wait to be convinced—I can put it no higher than that—that that adjustment will bring on a significant amount of additional development and so stop the slide in job losses in the oil industry. I sincerely hope that I am wrong and that the Government's calculations are right.

On the non-increase in customs and excise duties, the Scotch whisky industry will be pleased that it will not have to face that burden, but it would have preferred something else. The main burden of complaint of the Scotch whisky industry, as distinct from the makers of other spirits, is the discrimination against Scotch as a product that requires by law a three-year maturation period. The cost of holding those stocks is considerable. The abolition of stock relief, which the Government brought in a few years ago, continues to hit the Scotch whisky industry extremely hard. The industry's proposal for a statutory maturation allowance, which is essentially the reintroduction of stock relief, would help put the Scotch whisky industry back on its feet. I commend that to the Government for consideration.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman referred to a statutory maturation allowance. I am sure he would be honest enough to agree that the maturation allowance under statute was something for which the industry itself asked in the first place.

Mr. Bruce: Yes, I agree absolutely, but my point is that the industry has not got it. I welcome the fact that the industry has put the application to the Government properly, but if I am not mistaken the point is that it is a statutory requirement that Scotch whisky should mature for three years. That is a major factor in the marketing of Scotch whisky. It is statutory, even if it was requested. The fact that that cost is incurred should be taken into account. The industry is looking for something reasonable. I do not regard it as unfair discrimination in favour of Scotch, but a recognition of the cost of making Scotch whisky over three years as opposed to the production cost of gin and vodka, which can be made in three hours and put straight on to the market.

The essential point about any Budget is that it gives an indication of the priorities of the Government. I for one regard the whole ethos round Budget day as nonsensical. Many things happen on the economic front throughout the year that are far more important than the Budget. I wonder whether this ritual serves any purpose. What has been revealed in one hour's speech on one afternoon is an indication of the Government's priorities, but we knew what they were. They have not changed, which is regrettable, because with the onset of an election and the fact that the Government will have to test their policies, many people outside the Chamber were looking for action on unemployment and action to help the poor — [Interruption.]—not because it would bribe the electorate, but because it is right and it is what the people want.

People know that the Government will not change course and that, if they want different policies, they have to make sure that they throw the Government out. I and my colleagues look forward eagerly to the opportunity to do just that in the near future. The Budget is in accordance with the Tory Government's record. It does not offer hope to the poor or the jobless, or to the regions and nations of the United Kingdom. Many Tory Members may feel that it will please the City. I am not sure that it will please their constituents.

Mr. David Knox (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I want to start by congratulating my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his fourth Budget speech. Like his previous Budget speeches, this was well constructed and commendably brief. The House is indebted to my right hon. Friend for the style with which he presents his Budgets and for making what could so easily degenerate into a tedious repetition of dull economic facts an interesting parliamentary occasion.

I believe that the less said about the contribution by the Leader of the Opposition the better. Let me offer the Leader of the Opposition some friendly advice. If he wants to indulge in the role of historian, would he please do the House the courtesy of checking his facts rather more carefully because he was completely wrong about Mr. Butler's Budgets in 1955? The facts do not bear out the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Is it not rather strange that the Opposition Front Bench is unrepresented?

Mr. Knox: I am not sure whether my hon. and learned Friend believes that I have some responsibility for that, but I can assure him that I have not. However, I agree with him that that is very strange.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House would wish to give a warm welcome to a number of the measures in the Budget. The change concerning VAT will be particularly warmly welcomed by businesses. Easing the rules for the payment of VAT should help to overcome the problems which firms experience with late payers. For some time that has been a considerable problem for many firms in my constituency and elsewhere. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made a real contribution to overcoming that problem and easing the lot of many people who contribute a great deal to the economy of this country.

I also welcome the tax reliefs that will affect profits-related pay. Profits-related pay has an important part to play in strengthening the economy. If we can move along in that direction, that will encourage greater flexibility in pay bargaining and will also help to relate the level of pay more closely to the prosperity of individual companies. The lack of flexibility in pay bargaining has caused immeasurable problems in the post-war era in Britain and is largely responsible for the situation that has arisen so frequently of income-cost inflation in conditions where there was no demand-pull inflation. Although I do not expect miracles—and no doubt my right hon. Friend does not expect miracles—I am sure that this is a step in the right direction.

I warmly welcome what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor did with regard to excise duties. My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) referred to this point. I am sure that in the pubs tonight smokers and drinkers will welcome the fact that probably for the first time in living memory there was no increase in this Budget in the duty on cigarettes and alcoholic beverages.

Mr. Maclean: I will drink to that.

Mr. Knox: My hon. Friend has said that he will drink to that. Some of my hon. Friends will smoke to it as well, although I shall not.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): In view of the fact that the Government have been unable to raise the £150 million to implement immediately the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986, does the hon. Gentleman not think that the indexation of drink and tobacco would have raised more than that amount of money and would have been a worthwhile way of providing for disabled people who are not being provided for by the Government?

Mr. Knox: The hon. Gentleman is far too intelligent to think that such matters are interchangeable. There are other means of raising the money to which he referred.

People in the rural areas will warmly welcome the fact that there is to be no increase in excise duty for petrol and other fuel and no increase in car licences. The duty on those items bears particularly heavily on those who live in rural areas. Many of my constituents will be delighted that there has been no increase in the duty on those items.

I welcome the fact that the thresholds on income tax have been increased again, although only by the rate of inflation this year. There were substantial real gains in recent years, so I suppose that we could not have expected much more. I also strongly welcome the additional help for the over-80s and the blind. I am sure that that at least is a change that will commend itself to both sides of the House.

The Budget will not be judged in the medium and long term by the specific measures that it contains because, alas, they will be forgotten very quickly. It will be judged on the consequences of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget judgment and on the consequences of his decision to go for tax cuts rather than for higher public spending. More specifically, the Budget will be judged by its effects on the two inter-related areas of unemployment and manufacturing output. I will consider those two points in a few moments. First, I want to consider the Budget judgment and tax cuts. Of these, the former is immeasurably the more important.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has decided to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement as a proportion of GDP in the hope, presumably, that that will have a downward effect on interest rates. I regret that. I believe that that is no more than an appeal to a fairly primitive form of monetarism. I do not think that there will necessarily be any effect on interest rates, which can and should fall anyway. However, I believe that the reduction in the public sector borrowing requirement will deflate demand in the economy as a whole and may result in higher unemployment.

We have been here before. In 1981 the then Chancellor of the Exchequer reduced PSBR from 5·4 per cent. of GDP to 3·3 per cent. Although interest rates fell straight away from 14 to 12 per cent., by the autumn they had moved up to 16 per cent. In addition, the demand deflation of that reduction in the PSBR resulted in a rise in unemployment to more than 3 million for the first time since the 1930s. I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has done as he has done today. Had he decided, on the other hand, to increase the PSBR, that would have resulted in an increase in the demand for goods and services, private or public, and eventually in an increase in the demand for labour and so a reduction in unemployment.

I have little doubt that tax cuts will be popular with the recipients and in principle I have no objection to tax cuts. In principle, I have no objection to higher public expenditure either. However, I do not see either of those in the ideological terms in which some hon. Members view them—Conservative Members in favour of tax cuts and Opposition Members in favour of public expenditure. I believe that there are substantial advantages in both tax cuts and higher public expenditure. If there is to be a choice between the two, that should be taken on a pragmatic basis, and a pragmatic decision should be based on what is most sensible, logical and desirable in the circumstances that obtain at the time.

For some years there has been a strong tendency for additional consumer expenditure to find its way into an increased demand for imports rather than for the products of our own domestic industry. Tax cuts, therefore, have involved a risk that some of the extra money released would find its way into imports. Some of this money would, of course, boost domestic demand and to the extent that that happens, it is to be welcomed. For as long as we had a very healthy balance of payments surplus—as we have had in recent years—it seemed sensible that we should go for substantial tax cuts. We could then afford to take the risk that higher consumer expenditure would go to imports. There was a substantial balance of payments surplus to act as a cushion if that happened although, of course, it was to be hoped that there would be an increase in domestic demand from such tax cuts.

Today, that balance of payments surplus has disappeared. We are now in a deficit, and in such circumstances it was not very wise to take the risks inherent in tax cuts because of the further strains that they might place on a weakening balance of payments position. Therefore, I would have preferred my right hon. Friend to confine himself to those public expenditure projects where the import potential was very low or non-existent. That would have seemed to me to be the cautious approach.

I mentioned that there were two inter-related problems of unemployment and manufacturing industry. We are now in our fifth year with unemployment over 3 million. From 1945 until 1974 we had full employment. The level fluctuated a little, but we managed to maintain employment at a high level throughout this period. Twice, briefly, unemployment exceeded 1 million and twice, also fairly briefly, in 1955 and 1965, unemployment was as low as 1·1 per cent. of the working population. It is a myth that unemployment started to rise under this Government. In fact, it started to rise under the Labour Government in 1974, and over the past 13 years it has continued to rise, although not at a regular rate. However, over that period, neither of the two Governments in office have had a good record on unemployment.

Alas, there has been a tendency in recent years towards a certain complacency about unemployment. Therefore, it does no harm for us to remind ourselves that for most of the post-war period the situation was better than it is now. The current level of unemployment shows how far we have moved from the high level of achievement in that 30-year period following the last war. The effects of unemployment are disastrous both socially and economically. Unemployment is socially divisive. It is difficult to have one nation when 3 million are out of work and 1¼ million people are long-term unemployed. The real division is between those in work and those who cannot find work, as the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) said about 10 years ago.

Unemployment is also economically wasteful. If we are not using all the available labour in this country, it means that we are not maximising output. It is nonsense to suggest that demand somehow has reached its peak and that there is no more work available. We all know as individuals that we could consume more goods and services if we had the opportunity, and, if we could not, our families, and especially our wives, could. We also know we could do with better social and public services. I believe that the Government have a good record on the Health Service and education, but no one is under any illusion that we could not spend more on these two things.

Potentially, there is plenty of additional demand for goods and services, both private and public, in Britain today. Consequently, it is nonsense in such circumstances for people to be out of work. It is merely a matter of releasing the demand for more goods and services. As one who believes strongly in the efficiency of the free market, I have no doubt that labour, capital and enterprise would come together to ensure that demand was met. However, if this is to happen and if there is to be a real attack on the level of unemployment, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will have to be rather more adventurous with the public sector borrowing requirement.

I am deeply concerned about the decline in manufacturing industry that has taken place in recent years. Until 1973, output in this country had risen strongly since the end of the war. In 1973, manufacturing industry was producing more than twice what was produced in 1948. Alas, this progress has not been maintained. Worse than that, between 1973 and 1981 there was a severe drop Fortunately, there has been improvement since 1981, and I welcome this strongly. The Government should be commended for their part in it. However, the level of output today in manufacturing industry is still lower than it was in 1973. In the last quarter of last year, it was almost 10 per cent. lower than it was in the last quarter of 1973, and that was more than 13 years ago.

Mr. Butterfill: What my hon. Friend has just said is completely contradicted by a research note produced by the Library, which is currently being issued, which shows that output is 0·2 per cent. higher over the same period. Perhaps my hon. Friend would like to refer to that.

Mr. Knox: If my hon. Friend refers to the official statistics, he will find that my figures are correct. They are published by Her Majesty's Government's statistical service. I repeat that in the last quarter of last year, manufacturing industry was almost 10 per cent. lower than it was in the last quarter of 1973, and that was 13 years ago.

Mr. Butterfill: What about these Library figures?

Mr. Knox: These statistics from the Government are more reliable than some that my hon. Friend may have got from the Library.

That decline in the past 13 years compares with an increase in output of almost 50 per cent. in the 13 years between 1960 and 1973. To illustrate further the seriousness of the situation, I point out that manufacturing output in January this year was about the same as it was in January 1974—the lowest point in the three-day week. No party has any right to try to make any political capital or mileage out of that. Both Labour and Conservative Governments have presided over a decline in manufacturing industry, and as the alliance was connected, in one way or another, with the Labour Government, it cannot dodge its responsibility either.

I accept that in a modern economy, manufacturing industry tends to employ a smaller proportion of the working population and it produces a smaller proportion of the GDP. At the same time, the service sector increases. However, this assumes an increase in GDP and a continuing rise in the output of manufacturing industry as new productive techniques are introduced and developed. Unfortunately, this has not happened in the past 13 years, although I hope that it will happen in the next 13 years.

For a nation such as Britain, a strong manufacturing base is essential because we are dependent on it to pay for essential imports of raw materials and foodstuffs. It is particularly important because the export potential of manufacturing industry is so much greater than that of the service sector. If we are to continue to expand our economy in the future, we must have a much stronger manufacturing base than we have had in recent years and it must expand more quickly, and, if we are to have a much stronger manufacturing sector, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will have to provide more demand to enable it to expand. Again, that means that he will have to be more adventurous with the PSBR.

To sum up, I believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor deserves considerable credit for many of the specific measures that he has introduced today. However, I have some doubts about some of his macro-economic decisions, in particular relating to the PSBR.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Before the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) reached his peroration I was about to say that I agreed with many of the concerns that he expressed about unemployment and the need to remedy the decline in manufacturing capacity. In this Budget the unemployed have been forgotten and one of the few references that the Chancellor made to them was that there would be a threefold increase in the number of job clubs. I am sure that that will give great heart to the millions who are out of work. Even the references to improving vocational training incentives seemed to brush aside the recent report from the National Audit Office about value for money in respect of adult training programmes which the Government have been operating in recent years in an effort to try to reduce the unemployment statistics.

The hon. Member for Moorlands was correct in saying that this was not a dull Budget, but that was only because there was considerable laughter in the House at one stage when it looked as if the Chancellor had lost one of the pages of his statement. In some respects, one felt that something was missing from the Budget. Perhaps it was in that missing page. Perhaps it would have been a reference to unemployment, which was otherwise ignored, or a reference to reducing interest rates, to which I am sure many businesses were looking forward. [HON. MEMBERS: "Wait and see."] Conservative Members say "Wait and see" but the trouble is that we have been waiting for eight years for the Government to do more of the things that have been suggested.

One of the things that is clear from the Chancellor's statement is that he is keeping his options open. There was a considerable build-up in the weeks before this Budget about just what would be distributed by today's statement. The Chancellor made every effort this afternoon not to displease anybody. It is not clear how he will actually improve the economic and social fabric of this country. However, it was quite clear that he did not want to offend or upset any particular group. It was also noticeable that he spent a considerable amount of time giving away little titbits to some of his more influential supporters. It was just as well that he spent the first three quarters of his speech on that, because when he came to the end of his statement I thought, "Is that it? Is that the great give-away in terms of lowering the thresholds for taxation and reducing the basic rate?" I thought that because there had been a tremendous build-up of expectations.

The Chancellor had one eye on polling day, but he certainly did not have an eye on the prosperity, far less the posterity, of this country. One suspects that the situation may be worse at the Treasury than we realise—especially as I look at the Minister of State—because it is the consumer boom that has financed a substantial part of today's handout. That spending boom has given the Treasury revenues that were not expected at the time of last year's Budget. Those unexpected revenues come from extra VAT and corporation tax receipts. [Interruption.] It is just as well that the hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) represents an English constituency, because he would never be elected in Scotland, and indeed one Scottish constituency sent him packing.

The reason for the unexpected windfall is that more consumers are getting goods on tick. The plastic card has played into the Treasury's hands. Consumer expenditure has risen because more people are getting into debt, as my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) pointed out last week in the debate on the Debtors (Scotland) Bill. The Chancellor is benefiting because more people are living on tick. Therefore, he is able to hand back money which, as has been pointed out, has been paid to the Treasury anyway by those same taxpayers.

What a pity that the Chancellor could not have said more about interest rates, because their high prevailing level in this country has been one of our impoverishments in terms of investment. If the Chancellor had been able to announce some good news on the interest rate front, that would have sent up a far greater cheer from many of the small businesses which he is, understandably, so anxious to assist.

The Budget will not really get more young people or adult unemployed into meaningful work. One can alter pension schemes as much as one likes, but one of the things that the pensions companies must hope for is that more people will be in jobs and can therefore contribute to pension schemes. Apart from requiring contributors, pension schemes also look for areas in which to invest.

I should like to mention briefly the Government's proposals for profit-related pay schemes. One must look beyond the superficial attractions here and not forget that the competitive position of some firms will inevitably squeeze their profitability, especially if they face considerable overseas competition. It remains to be seen — perhaps this will unfold in the later stages of the Finance Bill — whether the Government's proposals will be most beneficial to those paying the higher rates of income tax. It is easy to get lost in the superficial attractions of that.

Finally, I cannot see the Budget strengthening the social, industrial or economic position of Scotland at present. The Budget will not do anything of great significance to help the manufacturing sector, or even the service sector, in Scotland.

When one considers the favourable winds that the Government have had at their back during the past eight years, in terms of North sea oil revenues, the profits from the privatisation of public assets, the higher revenues from indirect and direct taxation and their attempts to reduce public expenditure, one says, "What a dim-witted lot have been in charge of this country's Treasury during those years." We have ended up worse off than we were when that shower were first elected.

One must treat the Budget warily. What was significant was what the Chancellor left out, rather than the people whom he tried to appease, assuage and please this afternoon.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): It is always a pleasure to speak after the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen), but this is also a sad occasion because I understand that he will not be with us in the next Parliament. I for one will miss him because I remember what a good colleague he was at Western European Union and on the Council of Europe. I do not agree with a word that he says. I am surprised to find that he is so puritanical about credit cards and spending. No doubt, he would like to have a much harsher regime. However, it is always pleasant to debate and argue with him.

It is very different with the Liberal party. As I listened to the Liberal party spokesman, the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), I was reminded of a remark by the late Earl of Stockton that the Liberals are full of sound and original ideas but their sound ideas are not original and their original ideas are not sound.

This is a thoroughly responsible Budget, and I welcome it. It must be seen in the context of an increase in public expenditure of about £4·75 billion on such items as health and education in the autumn. That coupled with a reduction of £3 billion in the PSBR and the reduction of £2 million in taxation is a remarkable achievement by any standard, especially when at the same time our growth rate is the envy of many of our competitors abroad.

I support the tax reduction. I find the attitude of some people to tax reductions extraordinary and ambivalent. I always get irritated when it is assumed that the Government will give away something. They do nothing of the sort; they merely allow people to retain more of the money that belongs to them. The sooner we get that point clear in our minds, the better. It is also odd that, while many people are, rightly, deeply worried about the gross incomes of the low paid, they disregard the net take-home pay which pays the bills and maintains families.

Last week, at Question Time, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister pointed out how much tax a nurse had to pay from her small income. I think it was about £43 a week out of £155. I heard a Labour Member shout, "Then pay 'em more." I find that astonishing. It shows the muddled thinking that prevails, not merely on the Opposition Benches, where we expect it, but through the country. In other words, such people are saying, "Give nurses more taxpayers' money so that they can pay more taxes to pay more money to people who are too heavily taxed on a low income who can then pay more taxes in order to pay more money to others and so on." It is a case of:

> "Great fleas have little fleas upon their backs to bite 'em,
> And little fleas have lesser fleas, and so ad infinitum."

I suppose that it can be said that that creates jobs for the Inland Revenue, so there must be some benefit in it, but what it has to do with national wealth creation, fairness or efficiency is beyond me.

It is odd that some members of the public are for ever criticising politicians, bureaucrats and civil servants, not always entirely without justification, and wanting them to control more of our activities, lives and finances. That seems paradoxical. There is even more ambivalence over the brain drain. I have been worried about that and have criticised the Government's attitude to research, which is important, especially at Cambridge. I am not convinced that the Government have fully taken on board the importance of that, and I look for some reassurance from Ministers during the Budget debate.

A lack of research facilities is only one factor in the brain drain; taxation is another. Direct taxation is lower in most European countries and particularly in the United States for those people than it is here. I keep hearing of bright young men and women, especially in science and medicine, who are lured abroad because of the better net financial prospects that they will enjoy. It is in everybody's interests that this brain drain should be stopped, and the reductions in taxation should help.

There is a fashionable theory which we hear bandied about that direct tax cuts do not promote harder work. I do not know whether the theory is right, but, if it is, it is surprising that an increasing number of people have been working increasingly hard in what is called the black economy where they do not pay tax. In any event, higher taxation can hardly be said to be an incentive to greater effort. The Opposition may well ponder on that before they finalise their election manifesto.

I am pleased that the Chancellor recognised the problems of old pensioners. It is a mark of a civilised nation to care for its old folk and we have an increasingly aged population. In considering taxation, it is interesting to reflect on the many complaints that we receive from those who are taxed on their small additional earnings over and above their pensions. That is another aspect that should be pondered on.

It is always the well-heeled who moralise on the wickedness of taxation. I have a suggestion for them. They should give away any tax benefits that they receive to a charity or deserving cause, thereby saving the cost of a bureaucracy collecting it and doling it out. If they are anxious to take up that suggestion, I remind them that the Chancellor has made concessions on vehicles for hospices. I hope that that will help Cheshire Homes, of which I am a great supporter. That is a way in which all those high-minded people can dispose of their tax benefits.

My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox), whose views I greatly respect, drew attention to the tax versus public expenditure argument. I agree that this is not a dogmatic, doctrinaire issue. I also agree that this is the time for taxation reductions rather than public expenditure in view of what has already been done. I notice that the five economic advisers to Governments between 1970 and 1979 take a different view and, incidentally, they are not short of a bob or two. I accept full responsibility for the period when I was a Minister, but the latter part of that decade was noted for high inflation, low growth, increasing unemployment and deteriorating services. I doubt whether the advice of the famous five is any better now than it was then.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I read the Financial Times letter to the editor, but I thought that it said from 1948 to 1979.

Sir Anthony Grant: If that was the case, their record is even worse because in that period we had low growth and rising inflation, particularly in the latter stages from 1974 to 1979 when the economic situation was undoubtedly deplorable. This morning Radio 4 pondered on a suitable collective noun for those advisers. I would suggest that "a folly of advisers" would be appropriate.

We have often been too obsessed in our taxation considerations with the highly paid and the lowly paid. We should not spend so much time worrying about the highly paid unless we are completely eaten up with envy. The tax they contribute is a relatively small part of the whole, and they are quick and smart enough to nip abroad or otherwise to avoid taxation. We should not forget the people in between who often make the biggest contribution to the nation's economic welfare. Direct taxation bears hard on them and they are all too often neglected. As Hilaire Belloc said:

"The rich arrived in pairs and also in Rolls-Royces
And talked of their affairs in loud and strident voices.
The poor arrived in Fords, whose speeches they resembled
And laughed to see so many lords and ladies there assembled.
But the people in between were underdone and harassed
And out of place and mean and horribly embarrassed."

That illustrates the difficulties that we face. The people in between are hard hit by high interest rates and include small business men, professional people who rely on an overdraft for financial capital and home buyers who depend on mortgages. They are often cruelly affected by high interest rates. All too often they are forgotten by the advocates of higher public expenditure through Government borrowing. Therefore, a fall in interest rates would be the best news for small and medium-sized businesses and the property-owning democracy. I shall be surprised if the Chancellor's responsible handling of the PSBR over the years and in this Budget does not lead to a further reduction in interest rates in the near future.

I am glad that the Chancellor seems to be so splendidly converted to wider share ownership and I am delighted at the Government's record of an increased number of shareholders. I was a pioneer and founder member of the Wider Share Ownership Council with the late Maurice Macmillan and my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). For years we were crying in the wilderness, but now our desires are coming to pass. It is not only a question of increasing the financial wealth of people, but also of increasing independence and responsibility for the individual. The more people own shares and have a part in the ownership of our nation, the greater the responsibility and the more sturdy the bastions are against the ever encroaching power of the state. I welcome anything that is done in that respect, and the Government's record is the best that I can conceive.

This is an excellent Budget which is designed to help those who most need it while maintaining the stimulus in the economy. I want to end with a quotation from a distinguished source——

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Is it Belloc again?

Sir Anthony Grant: No, it is not Belloc again. It is a much more distinguished quotation than that. It reads:

"If you want to retain power you have got to listen to what people . . . say and what they want. If you talk to people in the factories and in the clubs, they all want to pay less tax. They are more interested in that than the Government giving money away in other directions."

That was said on 14 March 1978 in advice to Labour's national executive by no less a person than the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). He is often quoted these days, apparently, but his words are as true today as they were then.

I do not know whether this is an electioneering Budget, and I do not care. If it is, I thank God, because it will save the nation from the horrors of a hung Parliament and Socialist rule.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) is the first Member to show some enthusiasm for the Budget——

Mr. Brooke indicated dissent.

Mr. Wigley: I have no doubt that the Minister has a professional interest in the Budget and some enthusiasm for it.

The considerable divide between the two sides of the House has become evident in this Budget. One divide that has become apparent is that every Conservative Member who has spoken represented an English constituency, and every Opposition Member who has spoken represented a Scottish or Welsh constituency. That might underline the considerable divide. I accept that that divides between the north-west—north-east and the south-east of England. This Budget may have been acceptable and caused some enthusiasm in south-east England, but it has done nothing to solve the basic problems that face my community, where there is 22 per 'cent. unemployment and considerable worries about the future.

In many ways, the Budget has given us a sign about the election, because we will have a minimalist Finance Bill which can be rushed through rapidly. I suspect that that heralds an election on or around 11 June, and everything in the Budget has been geared to that.

We had been hyped-up to expect a substantive and imaginative Budget. It may be that that over-hyping led to the sort of headlines that we had in yesterday's Daily Telegraph—

"Growing fears over Budget 'giveaway'".

I wonder whether, with that missing page from the Chancellor's speech, there has been a change of direction by the Government in response to those who have expressed such fears.

The Budget is a tinkering one. It is more concerned with changes in minutiae rather than with overall strategy. That may be expected as we come to a general election, but it has not answered those of us who have criticisms of the direction of general strategy.

Before I deal with those criticisms, I shall acknowledge some of the improvements and benefits from the Budget. The changes in VAT on small businesses are to be welcomed. The changes in VAT in respect of disablement equipment are to be welcomed, as are the changes in the blindness allowance, which was long overdue.

The encouragement of profit-sharing schemes is a step in the right direction, although many Opposition Members took offence when the Chancellor said that one of the greatest liabilities or problems that we had in that context was the work force. That was an unfortunate remark to say the least, and should be discouraged.

I welcome the clampdown on corporation tax, which will bring in much-needed revenue. The North sea oil proposals may be helpful if they develop and increase the scope of new oilfields. The business expansion scheme changes are to be welcomed.

I welcome one of the negative matters—that there is to be no increase in the cost of petrol or vehicle licensing duty, which have a considerable adverse effect on rural areas where transport is essential and not a luxury. I fear, as do other hon. Members who represent rural areas, Labour party thinking on this issue. Perhaps Labour Members can respond to reports that the Labour party may be thinking of doing away with vehicle licences and putting the cost on to petrol. That would not be acceptable in my area.

The Budget says next to nothing about unemployment, which worries us. The hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) was worried about the lack of strategy to reduce the 3 million — or perhaps 4 or 5 million if we take those on artificial schemes—who are unemployed.

There is nothing in the Budget about benefit rate increases. I realise, however, that those are now dealt with in a different manner. Representations have been made to the Government by various bodies, such as the Child Poverty Action Group, which strongly stressed the importance of child benefit, for example. I realise that these statements may not be made in the context of the Budget these days, but it is important to consider the relevance of matters such as child benefit when considering factors such as the poverty trap. It is worth quoting what the Child Action Poverty Group said in its Budget submission:

"At a time when the divisions in our society are growing ever wider, there can be no justification for squandering billions of pounds on tax cuts which will benefit the highest paid most. Instead, the Chancellor should announce a programme of tax reforms designed to help the low paid and families with children and commit the Government to increasing the resources available to those living on social security. Such a Budget would be a fitting memorial to the 'one nation' policies advocated by the late Lord Stockton."

That is central in the divide between the two sides of the House.

There is little in the Budget about interest rate reductions. I take the point that has been made already that perhaps we shall hear more about that in the next few days, but if it is only an extra half a per cent. that will not be enough.

There is little on the question of social legislation. In an intervention, I referred to the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 and a number of other items of social legislation that need money spent on them—money which would be better spent on such provision than on giving it back to those who perhaps do not need it quite as much as those who need the services that are provided under the disabled persons legislation.

The Budget has not taken enough people out of taxation. If there was money available for reducing income tax levels—reference has been made to the position of nurses on low pay—the way to use it was to take out of taxation people on low pay who are paying income tax. In the Budget, £700 million has been used for that purpose, compared with £2,000 million for spreading it thinly over the standard rate of taxation. That can have an increased benefit for those who are on the higher rates and above the standard rates. The raising of the threshold should have been twice the level required by indexation. The Government had their priorities wrong in not doing that.

I want to take up one point with the Opposition. I found the speech of the Leader of the Opposition difficult to swallow when he criticised the Government because their taxation level was now higher than it was in 1979. I take the view — I was under the impression that Opposition Members generally did so, too — that we need high taxation to sustain the services that we perceive as being needed to help those who are most dependent on state services. We cannot have it both ways. We cannot criticise a Government for maintaining high tax levels if we believe that they, or even higher ones, are necessary to maintain the services that we need. We need to be straight on this matter. If we believe in services, we must believe also in the means of sustaining them. We must bite the bullet, and sometimes bite hard. The two sides of the House may have different views on this issue, but we must be consistent in our arguments. Most Opposition Members believe that priority should have been given to increased services, which would in themselves provide more jobs than will be provided by a reduction in the standard rate of income tax.

The Budget is something of a damp squib. It reflects a lack of vitality, vision and ingenuity. Certain commentators have referred to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's ingenuity. That ingenuity has not emerged today. I do not know why it is not apparent. There is a lack of content in the Budget. It gives the impression of a tired Budget that has been introduced by a tired Chancellor. It is less than we were led to expect, and I do not understand why this has been allowed to happen, unless there was a change of course fairly late in the Budget development programme.

There has been the squandering of a massive opportunity, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's incredible statement about the work force has brought that home. I find it difficult to accept that the policy of keeping the public sector borrowing requirement at £4 billion should be sacrosanct. The Government were talking only a year ago of a PSBR of £7 billion, and the difference of £3 billion could have been invested in infrastructure, including roads, hospitals and schools. Jobs would have been provided in taking that course.

I believe that we could live with a PSBR of £8 billion or £10 billion, but let us for the moment accept the £7 billion that the Government were working to only a year ago. That sum, together with the £2 billion give-away, could have provided many jobs and improved services. I know that those who will receive the benefits of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's give-away will appreciate them, and perhaps when it comes to voting, but our vital resources have not been used to the best effect.

Interest rates are running at about 11 per cent. at a time when inflation has been running at about 3 per cent. or 3·5 per cent. Interest rates are far too high and a real interest rate of 7 to 8 per cent. cannot be justified. There are difficulties for manufacturing industry. My background before coming to the House was on the finance side of it. If interest rates are running at about 11 per cent., manufacturing industry will be looking for a return of 20 or 25 per cent. before it takes a risk. Why should it take a risk when it can obtain good returns from money placed in secure investments?

The interest rates that have been running under this Government have been 10 to 10·5 per cent. on the one month rate. That compares with 4 per cent. in Germany, 4·5 per cent. in Switzerland, 5·5 per cent. in Holland and 3·5 per cent. in Austria. I realise that there are difficulties due to oil money movements, for example, but after eight years it should be possible to engineer circumstances in which the interest rate is substantially lower.

Perhaps the Government believe that a PSBR of £4 billion will be enough to start reducing interest rates. There is no evidence that that will happen, but I hope that that will be the result. Interest rates should be coming down to 7 or 8 per cent. if inflation is running at 3 to 4 per cent. Indeed, that must happen if we are to have a change of course that leads to significantly greater investment in manufacturing. It is critical to reduce interest rates, and not only for manufacturing industry, though that is important.

A reduction in interest rates is important for agriculture. Many farmers in my constituency extended their bank facilities to expand in the dairy sector only to be clobbered by the quotas that have been imposed. Many of them are being foreclosed by their bank managers and lower interest rates would be significant to them. In many instances it would make the difference between surviving and not. A reduction in interest rates would make a substantial difference also to home owners.

A high interest rate is no incentive for new ventures and enterprise. Nor is it a help to secure investment at a cost that can be afforded by the community to provide much-needed community facilities. In eight years in office the Government have not succeeded all that well with their interest rate policies. I am not a supporter of a policy that plays into the hands of the money lenders and causes so many problems for the groups to which I have referred.

The comments of the economic advisers to the Government that appeared in the Financial Times yesterday have been referred to by those who have talked about jobs. It is worth putting on record a couple of parts of their letter. One passage read:

"As Chief Economic Advisers to governments from 1947 to 1979, we are greatly troubled by the prospect of continuing high unemployment. We do not accept the widespread view that it is inevitable. On the contrary, we consider that much of the increase of 2 million in the number of unemployed since 1979 results from errors of economic policy."

The letter continues:

"The time has come for a change of course. Realistic policies exist which could lead to a major return to work without exploding inflation. The Chancellor has a real opportunity to introduce a budget for jobs. Genuine and major reductions in unemployment should be the top priority for government policy."

It is easy to rubbish civil servants, including those who have been in post when other Governments have been in office. There are those who have been in that position over many years when both Conservative Governments and Labour Governments have been in office. There was the time of "You've never had it so good" in the 1950s and the period of full employment in the 1960s and early 1970s. If £4,000 million or £5,000 million had been allocated in the Budget, that would have helped to create as many as 1 million new jobs, including 50,000 in Wales.

The needs of the elderly and the disabled are often catered for only in institutional care. These people could be looked after in their own homes if resources were made available to pay those who are available to do the work to undertake it. It may cost only £60 or £70 a week of additional public expenditure per person to trigger such a scheme, and the state is willing to pay £180 a week to maintain people in private residential homes, or £230 a week to maintain people in private nursing homes. Surely some money could have been made available to the domiciliary services to help the elderly and the disabled live in the community, and thereby increase employment.

In Wales there is a great need for housing. About 160,000 houses—about 14 per cent. of the housing stock—are unfit. At the same time, building workers are out of work. They want work but they cannot get it. Some schools are in an appalling condition and need maintenance. There are roads with holes in them. The rural roads especially are in a state of disrepair. The railways need modification and investment. Hospitals have increasing waiting lists. These are the problems within the community. At the same time there are those who are willing to work. They want to work and we are paying them to do nothing. We could pay them a little more to work, and that little more is the money that is being given away in a tax reduction. The Chancellor of the Exchequer should not have moved in that direction.

This will be a good Budget for the well-off. It will enable people perhaps to have a second colour televison set, a second new car, a second overseas holiday, a second pension or even a second home. Unfortunately, it will do precious little for the 3 million or more who do not have even a first job.

7.8 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) about the Budget. It is in the nature of things that perspectives should vary fundamentally on the statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I could not accept the hon. Gentleman's description of the Budget as either "tinkering" or "tired". I am genuinely enthusiastic about what my right hon. Friend had to say. He has introduced a remarkable and radical Budget that is wholly consistent with his three previous Budgets. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's assertion that it will do nothing for unemployment, and I shall explain later why I believe that to be so.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon said that we could have a PSBR of £7 billion, £8 billion, £9 billion or even £10 billion instead of £4 billion, and he then said that he wanted lower interest rates. The two objectives are not compatible. He complained about the Leader of the Opposition wanting it both ways, but so does he. We shall see tomorrow a fall in interest rates as a direct result of a major cut today in the PSBR for next year.

I agree with the hon. Member for Caernarfon that the Leader of the Opposition wants to have it both ways with regard to taxation. The right hon. Gentleman said that we should go back to having the reduced rate band. Obviously the right hon. Gentleman has forgotten that the reduced rate band was 25 per cent., and the standard rate of tax next year is to be only 27 per cent. Therefore, the reduced rate band would now only be 2 per cent. lower than the standard rate. Very soon there will be a reduced rate band, not for a few, but for every standard rate taxpayer. That is why this is a remarkable Budget. If we take into account the measures announced in the autumn statement and the Budget, we have witnessed a fiscal adjustment of £11 billion. In November an increase of £5 billion in spending was announced. Today, the Chancellor announced a reduction of £3 billion in borrowing and a reduction in taxation of £3 billion. This is a remarkable achievement and it underlines the strength of the British economy and the buoyancy of tax revenues.

There are three measures in the Budget that I believe will be particularly welcome. The first is the increase in the threshold for inheritance tax. When that was announced it was obvious that Labour Members felt it was some kind of give-away to the rich. I must tell them of one of my constituents, the wife of a retired teacher. This lady wrote to me the other day to say that she had noticed that the price of their modest house in Gerrards Cross must be between £120,000 and £150,000. That would be the price of a modest house in Gerrards Cross. The lady suddenly realised that, in those circumstances, when she handed on her estate to her son, half of it would be subject to inheritance tax. She is not a rich person—she represents the ordinary constituent. Such a position would have been faced by many throughout the south of England because of the huge price increases. Therefore, I welcome the change that the Chancellor has announced this afternoon.

The second attractive change is the introduction of what are termed "freestanding AVCs". This provides the opportunity for people who belong to occupational pension schemes to top them up by making additional voluntary contributions, not to that scheme, but to a personal, portable pension scheme of their own. At the moment such schemes are available only to those who are not members of occupational schemes. This change will prove very attractive. I notice that the Red Book suggests that over 250,000 people will take up that opportunity, but I believe that many more will do so.

The third measure that I believe will be extremely welcome are the changes that are to be made in the administration of VAT for those businesses having a turnover of less than £250,000. Cash accounting will be the answer for those small businesses which have complained for so long about bad debts and late payers. They will no longer have cause for complaint, because they will not have to pay over the VAT until they have collected it from their customers. The threshold for this change was put at £100,000 in the consultative document, and the fact that the Chancellor has increased that to £250,000 is most welcome.

The new arrangements for annual accounting are also welcome as they give small businesses the opportunity to pay nine estimated amounts of VAT on account during the course of the firm's financial year. They will then make a final payment, together with one annual VAT return. That will do a great deal to help those small businesses which complain that they have to complete a complicated return once a quarter.

With the benefit of hindsight, it is clear that the year 1981—in particular the Budget of 1981—represented a major turning point for the British economy. It is clear that 1981 marked the end of 20 years of relative economic decline for Britain. At that time, the Government's critics said that their economic strategy, in particular the medium-term financial strategy, would not work. Indeed, a group of learned academics wrote to The Times to say precisely that. Since then the United Kingdom has enjoyed sustained economic growth of around 3 per cent. per year. Total output, manufacturing output and productivity have risen and 1 million new jobs have been created. All that has occurred because, in the depth of the recession, the Government had the courage to tackle the causes and not the symptoms of Britain's economic malaise.

As British industry has become more competitive, and consequently more profitable, so the yield from corporation tax has risen. As the standard of living of the British people has risen, so to has the yield from indirect taxation. Because of the buoyancy of Government revenues, the Chancellor was able to announce today a combination of lower direct taxation and lower Government borrowing. Some will say that he is a lucky man, but I say that the Government, by their unwavering economic policies, have created their own opportunities. The United Kingdom's economy has escaped from the vicious spiral of relative economic decline to a virtuous circle of soundly based economic growth. Today, the Government's critics say, not that the Government's economic strategy will not work—plainly it has done—but that it will not last. On the contrary, I believe that because it is soundly based it is much more likely to last than the failed expansionary policy of the past where a "go" was inevitably followed by a "stop".

The underlying strength of the economy is best demonstrated by its ability to withstand the seismic shock of a miners' strike followed, not so long afterwards, by a huge plunge in the price of oil. Two or three years ago lectures entitled "What will happen when the oil runs out?" were fashionable. Last year's Red Book showed that, at the time of the 1985 Budget, North sea taxes were forecast to be £13·5 billion in 1985-86. This time last year the forecast for this year, 1986-87, was £6·1 billion. It is against that background of a huge fall in oil revenue that today the Chancellor was able to announce cuts in taxation. No wonder that today nobody asks "What will happen when the oil runs out?"—we already have the answer.

All the evidence suggests that the recovery is spreading from the south of England, through the midlands to the north, yet unemployment, even in the south, remains stubbornly high. Why is it that there are 4,000 people out of work in Slough, but at the same time there are more than 20 pages of job advertisements in the local papers every Friday? I believe that the answer to that question lies in a combination of lack of skills and lack of incentives. Therefore, it is most welcome that the incentive to work will be increased by the raising of tax thresholds and the reduction in the standard rate of income tax that the Chancellor announced today.

Now is the right time to set some economic objectives for the next period of Conservative Government and the next Parliament until 1991 or 1992. Those objectives stem from a desire to get the fundamentals right by removing obstacles to economic growth and job creation. I believe that they should be, first, the elimination of inflation altogether; secondly, a continuing reduction in public spending as a proportion of gross domestic product; thirdly, a balanced budget; fourthly, a reduction in the standard rate of tax to 20 per cent. and in the top rate to 50 per cent.; fifthly, British membership of the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system; sixthly, real interest rates equivalent to the world average; seventhly, increased mobility of labour, principally engendered by major deregulation of the Rent Acts and a corresponding increase in property to let; eighthly, continued support for the Scottish and Welsh Development Agencies and the creation of a North of England Development Agency; and, ninthly, continuation of the hugely successful privatisation programme involving the transfer to the private sector of, among others, electricity, coal and water.

We have come a long way since 1979. Many of the changes that have been made are irreversible. The benefits of today's Budget are the rewards for the efforts that managers and workers alike have made to modernise British industry by doing away with outdated work practices and investing in the latest technology. Once again Britain can compete effectively in world markets. That success has been hard won and the country will want to think carefully before it throws it all away.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Forced to choose between the descriptions of the Budget by the hon. Members for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), I believe that the Budget represented a statement by a tired Government and that the hon. Member for Caernarfon was right. It is appropriate to recall the words of Lloyd George—a Tory nation is a tired nation. If the Budget demonstrated that, the people will respond appropriately when, before long, they are asked to pass judgment on the priorities explained by the Chancellor and supported by some of his right hon. and hon. Friends.

The Budget did little to deal with the biggest problem that Britain faces — unemployment. It did little to remove the regional variations and the great gap between the most prosperous parts of the United Kingdom and areas such as in my constituency where great poverty and deprivation are experienced and where people are greatly concerned about the Government's lack of leadership and about their complacency, which the Budget showed, which is clearly widely shared by Conservative Members.

I was distressed, as my constituents would have been, to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), who referred to people being involved in the black economy. In many ways that represented an honest statement of his opinion, but I regret the fact that that is an oft-repeated view, as I know from talking with many people, especially in south-east England. It is a great myth and is patronising and unacceptable. The constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Mr. Hamilton), who are fighting to save the Caterpillar factory, with massive support from the Scottish people, and who want to produce, sell and export their products, and who would have liked reasonable interest rates so that they could carry on with that objective are rightly offended when, by implication, they are told that their fight for jobs is a sham because they are dependent on the black economy to keep themselves going.

People in Lanarkshire and in my constituency have experienced closure after closure, from Cardowan to Gartcosh and at Buchanan in Stepps. There has been an exchange in the House on the Scottish whisky industry's future, which is of great interest to me. Alas, after the Buchanan closure, there will be no more jobs in that industry in my constituency. The men and women who have experienced unemployment and redundancy will not be attracted by the minor taxation changes announced by the Chancellor. For them, unemployment is total. The minor tax concessions given by way of window dressing have little attraction and show little awareness of the reality of the problems faced by those families.

The Budget is a clear indication that Kenneth Galbraith's words of more than 20 years ago apply even in 1987. He talked about the reality of

"private opulence and public squalor."

We are seeing the "private opulence" in the fact that the Chancellor's concessions are bound to be better for the higher income groups. That is consistent with the Prime Minister's reply a few weeks ago to a question that I asked when she said that the top 10 per cent. of the people have enjoyed a great deal more prosperity since 1979 than have the bottom 10 per cent. We have seen the gap grow between the very prosperous and the very poor, those who have been caught in the poverty trap and who know what unemployment and destitution mean. The tragedy is that, given an opportunity in the Budget, the Chancellor has failed to respond to the problems that people are enduring.

The hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Caernarfon referred to the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986. A few weeks ago I asked the Prime Minister whether she thought that it was right to withhold the funding that is necessary for that Act to become meaningful, while at the same time preparing for the type of taxation cuts that we have seen in the Budget, which I do not believe are right. Public opinion surveys suggest that the British people would prefer to ensure that public services are not starved of resources, that there is proper public investment and that our infrastructure makes us capable of being a manufacturing nation worthy of that name, reversing the current trend whereby we import more than we export.

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

In the light of this challenge, the Chancellor has dodged the two issues facing this nation. The first is wealth production. We must produce the wealth before we can debate exactly where the money will go. The second is the distribution of resources. We, in a modern, sensitive society, have to decide how best those resources should be distributed. On both counts the Chancellor has failed.

The Budget will not lead to increased productivity. It will not help our hard-pressed manufacturing industries, including those in my constituency which have suffered so much in recent years. If we do not produce to the extent necessary to satisfy our people's needs, of course the social services are bound to suffer, and the Prime Minister will be forced into the embarrassment that was so obvious at the Dispatch Box when she said, replying to me, that funding would be made available for the provisions of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act when resources became available.

This afternoon the Chancellor found other means of spending money. He barely recognised the problems in the social services. Over the weekend, in my constituency, more than 400 geriatric and psycho-geriatric patients were removed at the shortest possible notice from the Woodilee hospital, a psychiatric hospital built in Victorian times. The staff went with them and many patients were sent some 5 miles or perhaps 10 miles away to another hospital because the health board was advised that their present hospital's structure was dangerous. However, some of the patients then found themselves in a new ward where the ceiling was falling in. The nurses and auxiliary staff who were with them, and who have done an excellent job, showed me pieces of asbestos that had fallen from the ceiling.

This is Kenneth Galbraith again—

"private opulence and public squalor."

For how long will the British people tolerate these priorities? It is not enough for the Government to say that they are committed to the Health Service and to allow that sort of thing to go on. It is not enough for them to say that they stress community care, yet not give the social services the resources necessary to make community care a reality. It is not enough for the Government to ignore the plight of disabled school leavers and the demands of a modern education system.

How can we talk about jobs, industry, our manufacturing base and competing with the Japanese, the South Koreans and the rest if we are not investing in education? How can we accept a situation in which 5,000 young people with the qualifications to enter higher education are denied that opportunity? How can we cope with a system where access to higher education is so limited that only 1 per cent. of children whose parents had an unskilled working-class background are given that opportunity?

What we are seeing—and this is a theme that we noticed time after time in the Chancellor's speech—is the reality of the resources of this country, including the most important resource of all, the contribution that our people are capable of making, being tossed away. No Government have that right. It is not beyond the wit of a modern Government to ensure that our economy is organised and planned to give our young people the opportunity of enjoying the full potential of their capabilities and their interests.

This is a very short-sighted Budget. For the reasons that I have given, I regard it as selfish and cynical. If Lloyd George said that a Tory nation is a tired nation, I must tell the Government that I believe the people are becoming tired of these priorities, tired of this approach, tired of unemployment, tired of seeing resources, especially oil, being thrown away to finance 3 million unemployed, tired of the consequences for the social services, for health, and for the education system. I have every confidence in the people of this country, because they have made it clear—and will soon do so again—that the Government's priorities are not theirs.

7.30 pm

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): The hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) may have imagined that he was joining the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) in speaking for the Celtic fringe who, the hon. Member for Caernarfon claimed, regard this Budget as contrary to the interests of Scotland and presumably of Wales.

Perhaps, on St. Patrick's day, I may speak modestly for Scotland, which, I am glad to say, is north of the north-south divide, because the prosperity of the people of Scotland is infinitely greater than the prosperity of those who reside south of this mythical divide. The expenditure per head on education, on roads and on investment is massive. Our share of incoming industry is enormous. The success of the Scottish Development Agency, which we reorganised, is quite dramatic. We have a huge share of modern industry—a fact that the hon. Member for Monklands, West appears not to comprehend. The Labour party is consistently anxious to protect, to cosset and to contain industries of the past which are not relevant; it is not anxious to welcome the industries of the future which are. One of those industries is tourism, which has been highly successful in Scotland.

There have been some extraordinary speeches this evening. The official Opposition and the alliance have to find a way of saying that good news is bad news. They were robbed of their chance to say that the Chancellor had bribed the electorate, so they had to find some other way of alleging that the Chancellor has got it wrong. The thrust of their argument is that he should have reversed everything that has produced our present prosperity and economic strength by going back and investing the wealth of the nation in bureaucratic schemes. The reason why the Chancellor has been able to spend £11,000 million—I do not use this word "billion", because it is misunderstood—on the prosperity of the people of this country is his economic prudence. It is because we no longer have to spend it on loss-making nationalised industries, on so-called infrastructure, on all the things that lose money and build ever-increasing empires and can never be brought back again. It is because of the determination and the strength, essentially, of the Prime Minister and of the Chancellor that we have turned back from that inevitably downhill road in which taxation increased in order to support the ever-increasing claims of authoritarian bodies. That has produced a quite remarkable change. All the nationalised industries which have been privatised are in profit and now belong to the people.

I remember when British Railways, as it was called, was created. People genuinely asked if the railways now belonged to the people, which was their station, their carriage, their buffet. Now these industries really do belong to the people and are profitable. British Coal is doing the same. May it be privatised soon as well.

I should point out that the oil industry, which everybody imagined, in nationalist terms, was a sort of succour provided by Scotland for England, provoked not a word of complaint when it suddenly lost its strength and when England had to give succour to Scotland. The succour has come for Scotland and it has come this afternoon from the Chancellor who has sustained an important British industry. We say thank you for that.

We say thank you also on behalf of small business. Hon. Members have not sufficiently understood the extent to which the announcement made this afternoon on the adjustment of value added tax and other matters will benefit small business. If every small business took on one more employee or found itself able to do so financially, as I believe after today they will, it would mean employing between 500,000 and a million people in realistic, productive work. People are saying that the Chancellor did not speak about unemployment. But this is employment: one creates employment by creating the financial ability to employ. One does not create employment by enabling local authorities, by gross, and thus inflationary, overspending, to take on more employees for schemes to mend Woodilee or any other hospital, and such like. Like the hon. Member for Monklands, West, I have been on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs investigating hospital building in Scotland. One could not envisage public money being better wasted than by being thrown away on that.

The Scotch whisky industry is very important to England, to the French, to the Americans and to everyone else, except the Japanese. Its pleas and our imprecations have been heard by the Chancellor and he has held excise duty at its present level. One of the things that I have noticed, taking a quite impartial view of politics, is that those who vote Labour also consume alcohol. I can imagine nothing that the Labour voter—or the about-to-be ex-Labour voter—will appreciate more. For the first time, I believe, since the war—certainly in my political recollection—nothing has been added to the cost of a pint or of a nip. Employed or unemployed, if he goes to the races he will be pleased because he is not going to be charged tax either. That should be fairly popular.

In Scotland, nothing is more important than the cost of transport because we are a widespread community with two fifths of the land space of Britain and only one eleventh of the population. For all those in the agricultural, rural and business communities, the fact that the Chancellor has held the price of petrol is still the best sign of economic strength that we could have. All the rural communities will benefit.

We have an increased number of people owning their own property. A large part of their weekly budget is already spoken for by what they pay for their mortgage. Undoubtedly, the fundamental excellence of the strength of the economy which enables the Chancellor to say that we need to borrow no more than 1 per cent. and thus enable interest rates for farmers, house owners and small businesses to be reduced is a fundamental reward for the people of Britain.

I know that any reduction in tax is regarded as small and any increase in tax is regarded as great. I remember, as a student at university, a little Socialist lady who went to the same dairy as myself. She said, "There you are, you Tories. Milk is up a ha'penny, threepence a week. Who can afford that?" I just had to agree that the price of milk had gone up. About a month later, I was in the dairy and again was able to say, "Right. Mrs. McLaren, you will be voting Tory today, because milk has gone down by a penny a pint." She said, "A penny? What's that?"

All the criticisms that it was expected would be levelled against the Chancellor—for example, that he was going to bribe the people of Britain—have not come true. It is not a give-away Budget. To allow one to have some pocket money back is not giving anything away. The state is increasingly being taken off the backs of the people. That means that in Scotland there are 19,000 more people in work now than when we came to office and in Britain 1·75 million more people are in work than when we came to office. That is the fact. Scotland is a vibrant new country, thanks to the economic policies of the Government and the courage of those who, when asked to waver and give money away to schemes and increase tax, bravely resisted. Of all those who were saying that, I notice not one in the Chamber tonight, and I have not heard a voice of it now that the economic policy has proved so successful.

I believe that the Budget will do more for those who are not in employment than anything else. I regret one thing. The Chancellor did not remove one anomaly which, in my belief, would create a great reduction in unemployment. If a firm, a company or an individual employs people, the salary is paid before one pays tax. If an individual has a gardener or somebody to do up the car or whatever, he has to pay tax out of his already taxed income. That is what results in people going on the black economy. That is why an individual prefers to get pound notes in his hand for doing six people's gardens rather than being a gardener to one person who can afford to employ him. I believe that in this country there are probably between 1 million and 2 million people who are earning money without paying any tax on it and who are probably obtaining unemployment benefit as well.

In Scotland, we welcome greatly not only the economic strategy of the Government but the Budget. It is sane, responsible, cautious and unflamboyant. If I may say so, it demonstrates, in the words of the Psalm, that we have created peace within our walls, and plenteousness within our palaces.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I want to make a short contribution to the Budget debate.

I found the Budget statement a remarkable anti-climax. I must confess that as the Chancellor read out his statement I expected to see more smiling faces and more Order Papers being waved on the Government Benches. However, we saw very little of that. As previous speakers have remarked, one was left with the impression that something was missing. The comment has been made that the Chancellor left a sheet on his desk back at No. 11 and that that contained the information that we were after.

Expectations were undoubtedly at a high level. The Budget had been hyped up by the media. Many of us—I know that this applies to Conservative Members—were expecting far more. I believe that it is a manifestation of the fact that we have a tired Government who have run out of steam. An election is imminent; we all know that. It is simply a question of when it will be. I believe that the Budget and the state of the economy will be important factors that will decide the date.

[Mr. Stuart Randall]

The first measure that I make of the Budget statement is what it does to alleviate poverty in Britain. Frankly, it does little if anything. That is one of the reasons—there are many others—why I am on the Labour Benches and not on the Conservative Benches. The Conservative party does not care about poverty. We have seen a remarkable increase in the number of people living in poverty—about 2·5 million—since 1979. The Budget was a great opportunity to do something about it, but it has totally failed. The Government are uncaring. They do not worry about the 6 million or 8 million people who live in that plight. Instead, they have had a taxation policy since 1979 of feathering the beds of the very rich. The statistics are quite clear. The very rich have done extremely well.

There are a few interesting questions. Many people have said that there is something missing, and I believe that that is true. We have heard only the Budget statement today and we have not had a chance to do the sums, but I cannot help feeling that there is about £2 or £3 billion somewhere which has not been used by the Chancellor.

Mr. Fairbairn: Quite right, too.

Mr. Randall: Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman knows.

I feel intuitively that the Chancellor had more money than many of us originally anticipated, but he has failed to go ahead and use it. Instead we have a Budget which adds up, as I understand it, to about £4 billion. The sales of the so-called family silver — the Government's privatisation programme this year, involving British Gas, British Airways and so on—amount to about £8 billion. I find it remarkable that the figures do not seem to add up. Where has the money gone? Perhaps other right hon. and hon. Members would like to comment on that. I am not sure where the money has gone. In particular, the incredible consumer boom and the associated tremendous demand must have considerably enhanced the Chancellor's revenue. I do not know where that money has gone, either.

I sum up the Budget as a missed opportunity. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) regarded it as a radical Budget. Far from being radical, it is a quite unimaginative programme that does nothing to alleviate poverty, for getting industry up and going again, or for improving the infrastructure. From that point of view, I find the Budget disappointing.

What is particularly interesting about the Budget is that the choices that will go before the electorate in the next few months, or whenever the election is, have been starkly laid out. The Government have put their wares on their stalls. A few other things will be on the way later, I am sure, but the Government have put out their stall. It involves a reduction in the basic tax rate to 27p and the other matters that the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) eloquently listed, but that is it. The next few months will involve putting our alternative case. If Conservative Members read the case that was presented —I accept that one or two little things happened last week to prevent it from being made as well as we should have liked — they will see that there are many opportunities. The challenge now is to get over to the public what I regard as the jewel in our crown. It will result in the next Government being a Labour one.

I am concerned about the general state of the economy. The fact that the boom has been allowed to rip ahead and the fact that the Chancellor has accentuated the matter by creating more demand through the tax reduction seem to be most unwise. I am not sure how much more the economy can take. Over the past year, there has been a growth of about 25 per cent. in consumer demand, and to stoke it up even more worries me. It is a difficult matter to assess. We have not seen the various computer model runs, so we do not know what the parameters are.

The strategy that we are putting forward and what we shall put on our stall over the next few weeks and months had the support of four eminent political advisers in their letter to the editor of the Financial Times yesterday. One cannot disregard that kind of comment. I am sure that those eminent economists were sincere in what they said. They do not write such comments lightly. The way in which I interpret what they said is that the growth in the economy is insufficient to offset not only the increases in productivity over the past few years but the growth in the number of people in the work force. To get people back to work, it is necessary to have higher rates of growth. That would ensue from the kind of capital programmes that we have been suggesting. The four political advisers believe that, properly targeted, it would not be inflationary. None of us wants inflation to go up. We all want to make sure that we operate the economy in a sensible way.

We should think about poverty in this country. I do not like the notion of a divided country; it is wrong. I cannot understand how some Tories these days allow that kind of thing to go on—it never used to. The old type of Tory used to have much more respect for people who live in poverty, but nowadays the poor are discarded like litter into a dustbin. The Tories just do not care at all.

The Budget statement has done nothing about the long term. It is the best Budget that the Chancellor could come up with. He has not interfered with excise duties. It is almost convention to valorise all excise duties with regard to the rate of inflation. Clearly, that is done for vote-catching reasons, and we understand that. I hope that we shall be able to get over to the public—I hope that it will be discussed in the media over the next days, weeks and months — what the Government are doing in disregarding the long-term economic interests of the country. It is absolutely clear that the industrial base must be regenerated. It is inconceivable that the Government can continue their policy of privatisation and rely on oil revenues. We know that oil revenues are in decline and that privatisation cannot continue. It is inconceivable that the British economy can run on ad infinitum without regenerating our industrial base.

We have to get industry going. The programme that we announced last week will do a tremendous amount for the private sector. I do not want Conservative Members to say that we shall have funny little jobs or invented jobs. We shall not have them. They must be well thought through, reliable, real jobs. There will be none of the nonsense-type job. I would not support that sort of thing. It is important to get industry going and to get our infrastructure into good shape. That will create tremendous demand, get people back to work and help to overcome poverty.

Also, we must have good quality services in our hospitals to ensure that policies such as care in the community are properly financed. It is important that we train young people for real jobs so that we may properly support our manufacturing industry. There will be no nonsense-type jobs or scheme-type jobs, but jobs that will enable us to ensure that our industry, when it takes off, will not have the present skill shortages. Hon. Members are aware that we have a chronic shortage of skills.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Does the hon. Gentleman say that the work experience schemes that the last Labour Government introduced to massage unemployment figures represented real jobs or training for real jobs? Does he agree that a two-year youth training scheme leading to a genuine qualification, which is a pre-qualification to further skills training, is a much better scheme than that which the last Labour Government introduced?

Mr. Randall: I do not particularly wish to talk about what happened eight or 10 years ago. Conservative Members said that they would get everybody back to work. We all know the leaflets that stated that Labour was not working. The Conservative party was dishonest with the people. It intentionally created high unemployment. We all know that there is nothing about the Government's economic policy that will do anything substantially to reduce unemployment.

There are two avenues down which we could go. If we spent money on reducing taxation, £3 billion would create about 80,000 jobs. However, if £3 billion were spent on the policies that are advocated by the Opposition, about 300,000 jobs would be created. A sensible expansionary programme requires people who are skilled in high technology and in all the areas that are necessary for the implementation of that programme. If we cannot train people to do those jobs, there will be bottlenecks in the economy and they will constrain growth.

I am concerned about Kingston upon Hull. When I listen to debates like this, I believe that we should brush aside all the dross and ask what is being done for the people I represent in Kingston upon Hull, West. The people I represent will get very little out of this Budget. Kingston upon Hull is a very proud place, and I am proud to be one of its representatives. There are lovely people there, but there is a great deal of poverty and despair there.

The housing in Hull is appalling. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) knows Kingston upon Hull. He is on the south side of the river. He knows that in Kingston upon Hull people are living in houses with fungus crawling up the walls. [Interruption.] I am not overstating the case. The houses are damp. People are suffering from lung ailments. Children have to live in these conditions. I was appalled when I listened to the speech of the hon and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). He glossed over the problems in the north. He dismissed the problems that are caused by poverty and ill health and put it all into pounds, shillings and pence terms.

Mr. Fairbairn rose——

Mr. Randall: The north-south divide that is referred to so often in the newspapers does exist. It is appalling that we live in a country that is so divided.

On Friday night I met some people in my constituency who run a small guest house for young people who cannot find jobs and who have had difficulties in the past. I was told that when an official went to see them and a young man was introduced to him he was described as a lovely young person, but they were told that he is nothing. That young man thinks of himself as nothing. He thinks that he is completely unwanted. That is the kind of people that we have in our society today. [Laughter.] Conservative Members laugh. That is the difference between Members on this side of the House and those on the Government side. It is appalling that anybody can laugh at what I have said. Nevertheless, we have had to put up with that kind of reaction, and we shall continue to put up with it.

The Budget amounts to a lost opportunity. The regions have gained nothing. Pensions, student grants, education and pre-school education have been neglected. Nurses, the disabled, the homeless and those who live in poverty have also been neglected. Manufacturing investment is still 17 per cent. below what it was in 1979. The Budget is a great disappointment. It is bad for the people whom I represent, and it is bad for this country. It is symptomatic of a tired Government who have run out of steam and imagination. I hope that it will not be too long before the British people are able to make their decision on this Budget and vote this Government out of office.

8.4 pm

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I listened with great interest to the deeply felt and most sincere speech of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). I deeply resent the fact that the hon. Gentleman said that Conservative Members do not care about poor and ordinary people. I represent much the same sort of people as those who live in Kingston upon Hull, but we do not hear from them the self-pity that we heard from the hon. Gentleman. The west midlands have also been through very bad times.

The hon. Gentleman thinks that the answer to all our problems is state intervention, but for years this Government have believed that the answer to this country's ills lies in helping ordinary people to help themselves by building up their own businesses. That is the profound difference between us. I do not say that the hon. Gentleman is insincere in what he says about people, but I wish that he would not say it about me. I am not a young Tory; I am an old Tory. [Interruption.] I did not hear that. Does the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) want to intervene?

The Chancellor deserves to be congratulated on his Budget. It has taken the Opposition parties by surprise. They cannot find in it very much to attack. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West want to intervene?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman should continue with his speech.

Mr. Stokes: We have already heard from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) and from my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) about the great difficulties that were experienced during the slump between 1979 and 1983. The 1981 Budget had to be severe, but it was the start of a new direction for our economy. Because of the economic problems that we have had to face since then, people can hardly believe that we are on the way to a recovery that can be sustained. That is new in this country's history since the last war. People are already forgetting about the great cost of the Falklands war soon after we came into Government, about the sinister and quite unnecessary miners' strike and, more recently, about the big drop in the price of oil which so greatly affected Exchequer revenues. Recently another big strike collapsed at Wapping. Labour relations almost everywhere are now excellent. In many factories in my constituency there is great realism on the shop floor. Those people show much greater realism than does the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West.

British industry now has so many things going for it that I wonder why Opposition Members do not admit as much. The pound sterling is very competitive. Our goods are better designed and our marketing and sales practices are much improved. There is greater export penetration and low inflation, and productivity is higher than it is in many other countries. For the first time we are now able to compete fearlessly with Japan, the United States of America and Germany. Profits and dividends are good and prices are high on the stock exchange. All this good news is hard for some people to understand. The Opposition parties are in a quandary. They do not know whether to pretend that there has not been a recovery or to say that if there has been a recovery it will not last.

Today we have heard a great deal about poverty. Poverty exists to some degree not just in the north and in the midlands but throughout the country. However, if we take a general view of the country, and are quite fair about it, we see that the standard of living of most people has never been higher than it is now. Despite the pockets of unemployment and the tragedy that unemployment causes, people generally have never been so prosperous as they are now. One has only to look at the number of cars on the roads, or, at the weekends, at the enormous numbers of people who visit garden centres.

I am amazed at the numbers of people who, many for the first time in their lives, are taking package tour holidays. Pay packets are good for those in work, and in many households, especially in the west midlands, the wife is bringing home a welcome addition to the income. There is recovery and renewed confidence even in the west midlands, where industries suffered so severely. Exports are doing particularly well. Nothing pleases me more than to go into the packaging department of a mill or small firm and see packages marked for countries all over the world, yet we do not hear enough about that.

Our exports are tremendous and will improve. In my constituency the well-managed companies are doing well and are composed of sensible managers who backed the Government in the difficult days and never complained during those hard times. I never asked for special things for my constituency, as Opposition Members are always doing.

I believe that interest rates will come down very soon, and I still wish that the banks would do more to help small businesses. Bank profits are large and their lot is easy compared to that of industry, which has to fight for markets and cope with so many problems. The banks do not have those difficulties.

Another problem that my firm has had is the high rates imposed by the new Labour council. I therefore welcome the cuts in income tax. I am a member of the General Synod of the Church of England, where tax cuts like these are not popular. I believe that there is nothing morally wrong in the Chancellor taking a little less money from us. We can then decide ourselves whether to spend the money, to save it, or to give it away.

The growth given by the Budget to charity is most encouraging. I believe that this is real Christianity as opposed to compulsory taxation, which makes some people feel good. The Government are still devoting large sums of money to defence, which is absolutely right in contrast to what the other parties would do it they were in government, and increased sums are also going to health, social security and education. No Tory would wish it otherwise. However, in all those services we need better management and less waste.

More and more people are becoming share owners, and they obviously enjoy it. This makes it more important that the small amount of fraud in the City of London, especially in the insurance world, should quickly be detected and punished. We, and particularly the Opposition, are in danger if we think that the solution to every problem is to spend more taxpayers' money, when very often what is needed is better leadership and better men and women involved in the activities of organisation and management.

Many people seem to think that instead of tax reductions there should be more public spending, but public spending is already high—some say very high. More spending on infrastructure, for instance, would not produce many more jobs. I believe that the answer to our problems lies in having highly efficient industry and commerce that will produce wealth and spread it to all corners of this country and to all sorts and conditions of our people. That is what the Government have been trying to do over the past years and now their strategy is starting to pay off. Opposition Members cannot understand that.

Tax reductions are required at the bottom of the scale. I wish that there were tax reductions at the top of the scale, but that has not happened in this Budget and we must look forward to that next time. Tax reductions at the bottom and middle of the scale will increase demand and encourage those who work and who want to work. I welcome the 2p reduction in income tax—not too much and not too little. I welcome the expansion of help for pensioner arrangements and the further aid for charities. I welcome the improvements that have been made in the VAT arrangements for small firms and in the inheritance tax, and the further help for vitally important training schemes. I welcome help for the blind and the over-80s. I believe that the Chancellor is right to hold the PSBR at £4 billion.

The newspapers say that we shall soon have a general election. Fortunately, the date is chosen by the Prime Minister and not by the newspapers. When the election does come—and I do not see any particular hurry for it—I am confident that the voters will think carefully before jettisoning all the improvements that have been made by this Government for the dangerous and inflationary policies of the Opposition parties.

This afternoon we have heard a great deal about a tired Government. I think that this Government are full of vigour. The Prime Minister certainly has immense vigour. As for people wanting a change, we cannot pay too much regard to the polls, but, dash it, the Opposition are now lying nine points behind. Other critics are saying that our society is becoming not so much full of poverty as materialistic. Those critics are usually very well off themselves. I am glad that our children are well clothed and well shod and are looking so fit. I am glad to see people owning their own homes, with a good supply of gadgets in the kitchen to save the housewife so many chores. I am glad to see so many families with a car and a telephone, some savings in the bank and taking a holiday on the Costa Brava. That was not so when I grew up as a boy before the war.

Over 100 years ago Disraeli, a great Tory, said that the job of the Tory party was to improve the condition of the people. That is exactly what we have done and are doing. The whole trend of the Government is to keep the state off the backs of the ordinary people. That, in turn, gives us more freedom and more responsibility and must lead to more respect for others and greater love of our country.

8.18 pm

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): The hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes) said a number of things with which I agree and others with which I profoundly disagree. The hon. Gentleman painted a very glossy picture of Britain. There is no doubt that a lot of people, whether in a family enjoying two incomes or not, have never had it so good—to use a well-known phrase. What happens when we finish selling off the statutory authorities by privatisation—presumably including the water and electricity authorities? What happens in the 1990s when that pot of gold has run out and we have a huge deficit of manufactured goods, which is growing all the time?

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the younger generation are living on puny wages? Two of my sons qualified in agriculture but are not working in the industries in which they can use their degrees. One son is selling furniture on the second floor of Peter Jones in Sloane Square; the other is running a bakery. They are picking up £100 a week if they are lucky, and they are in their late 20s and early 30s. There are a lot of people like my sons.

Many of the younger generation cannot buy a house and have no chance of even trying to buy one because they are not earning enough money. Those are the people I am worried about. So many institutions and building societies are taking the easy way out. The Prudential has gone into real estate agency and taken over my old firm which has been established for over 200 years. This is the easy way to make money. The institutions are not putting their money into industry or creating the jobs or wealth that this country so desperately needs.

I know that the Minister has small business interests at heart. I wish to dwell on that subject, but I do not intend to delay the House. What does the Budget do to help Britain succeed in an ever more competitive world? In particular, what does it do for my constituency? The hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge goes to the Council of Europe, as I do. I ask him to look around the streets of Strasbourg. What do we see that is British? Precious little; we may see a few Minis.

I was in Dallas the other day with the Select Committee on Transport. I said to some of my colleagues, "A fiver if you see a Lotus car here", because I understood that the Prime Minister's son was the Lotus car salesman in Dallas. We saw a few Jaguars and the odd Rolls, but we never saw a Lotus. I am told that there are some in north Dallas. I do not wish to be rude to the gentleman concerned, but I did not see any.

I did not see much else that was British. I went into the craft shops in Dallas to try to buy something to bring back, but everything was made in Korea, Japan or Taiwan. That is another problem that we all face in the West. What are we to do about it? My main problem is worrying about my constituency and the role that the Budget will play there, but I have to say that it does not do much for my electors.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman know that our trade with north America, which was in deficit by £686 million in 1974, was plus £2·4 billion last year? Does he understand the difference in those statistics?

Mr. Ross: I was not complaining that British goods were not being exported, but I did not see many. I was talking largely about goods in shops. I am told that probably oil revenues come into that calculation. That is another worry. What will happen when the oil is finished? When the oil price shot down to $8 a barrel we were in desperate trouble. The pound went down to £1·10 against the dollar.

The West has a problem because of the amount of goods coming from the far east. America is swamped with them. If they introduce tariffs, that will affect our exports. They have already tried it with steel and similar goods and they nearly did so with spirits.

The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) rightly said that the Budget was too cautious. It is not a vote-seeking Budget. I think most Opposition Members were surprised at that. I do not think that it is an election Budget. My complaint is that it is unimaginative.

What does the Chancellor intend to do to create wealth? We must get more wealth from the resuscitation of our industrial base if we are to pay our way and afford the pensions and the health services that will be necessary in the 1990s. That must surely be the principal aim of any Government. There may be some relief from the small fall in interest rates which we are promised by Conservative Members. Hopefully, we will see tomorrow a drop of a half of 1 per cent. in interest rates. The Chancellor has been cautious. I acknowledge straight away the welcome help in the payment of VAT. Those are the only two glimmers of hope that I see in the Budget for the small manufacturer.

One of the greatest tragedies of this Administration has been the breakdown in trust between central and local government. In his latest book, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) advocates the establishment of various centrally appointed development boards and a strengthening of the role of the Department of Trade and Industry. Why did he not support the National Enterprise Board when it existed? It was a first-class state organisation and I was sorry when it was abolished. Apparently the right hon. Gentleman wants to put something similar in its place.

The only way we will eventually succeed in creating the new enterprises which we so desperately need is through local initiatives. I can claim a little experience in this sphere. Since I have been in the House I have established three small businesses. I am fed up with bank managers telling me how big my overdraft is and sending me Christmas cards saying, "I hope you will have a successful and prosperous New Year"—underlined three times—followed by "I would like to remind you what your limits are." I employ people in those businesses and I know some of the problems of running them.

The Under-Secretary of State knows, because he helped enormously with it, that I set up and chaired for four years an enterprise agency. Through his efforts, the Government came to appreciate the role of enterprise agencies and in a recent Budget some assistance was given to them.

I play a small part in a recently established development board. We persuaded our retiring lord lieutenant to chair that for no payment and we are grateful to him. It is doing a great job. It is manned by representatives of the public and private sectors and receives limited contributions from local government and the private sector. We are there to try to encourage new initiatives, to establish the seedcorn, to help local firms over temporary problems, to encourage good marketing, and to assist people like Richard Noble, who won the world land speed record, with the development of his Super-Two light plane.

Until recently that project employed 80 of my constituents. Because we are not an assisted area, we do not get Government help for such projects. People like that make their way to me. Richard Noble came to me in the House. He said that he wanted to set up light aircraft manufacture in the Isle of Wight; he asked what I and the local people would do to help him. I went to local government and to the development board and we did help him. The help came from local government and local initiatives. The chairman of the board was also able to help enormously through his contacts in the City.

We provide finance for trade stands, both within the United Kingdom and at foreign fairs, and we help firms with travelling expenses and so on. We help them to provide suitable advertising material to present to the public. We help deserving firms with the cost of essential machinery from time to time. We have to do something about our tourist industry, which is down 25 per cent. since 1979. The local authorities had to bail out the Isle of Wight tourist board, which went bust over a year ago when it got caught up in sponsoring a song festival which was an initiative to get people to come to the Isle of Wight out of season. But it did not work and the tourist board finished up with debts of nearly £200,000. Much more could be done by local government if we had a little more help from the centre. It is to local authorities that people constantly turn for funding.

We have just lost our last abattoir in the Isle of Wight. For an island of 122,000 people, that abattoir had a throughput of 300 sheep, 300 pigs and 60 to 70 cattle a week. It suddenly closed, and we are in desperate trouble. Hon. Members can imagine the cost of sending cattle across the water to Salisbury or Wimborne, or even further afield if they are casualty animals. It is a very expensive enterprise. I pleaded with the company, but there is no way that it will reopen the abattoir. The National Farmers Union had a meeting and says that we must have a feasibility study. It wants £2,500 to pay for the study. It can find £500 and it wants another £2,000. The letter is on my desk now. Again, the only people we can turn to are the development board and the local authority.

I want to see a far more positive approach and more confidence shown in the authorities which are taking a lead in assisting local enterprise. When I was the leader of the county council, we set up a scheme whereby we undertook to pay a premium of £25,000 a year to the bank known as the Three Is so that it could underwrite bank loans and make advances to industry on the Isle of Wight at a rate some 3 per cent. below bank rate. I think everyone has agreed tonight about the effects that high interest rates have on small industry. About half a dozen firms a year have taken advantage of the scheme which we set up.

I should like to see a similar national scheme. That would be worth while. I am not suggesting the establishment of municipal loans; we have to use the banks. But I am sick of the attitude of some banks. The National Westminster has just shown a profit of over £1 billion, yet it charges 55p to cash a cheque, which is steep. It is always putting on other charges. The banks are not as helpful as they should be. They are the financial institutions which we should use. If we had a scheme whereby local authorities were aided through the rate support grant to encourage local enterprise, we could help small industries to do a great deal more. They are faced not only with high interest rates and bank charges but with the charges of British Telecom and accountants' fees, which are not cheap; and transport costs, rates, gas and electricity all have to be met.

Life is rarely easy for the small business man. I am glad that the Under-Secretary of State for Employment is on the Government Front Bench because I know that he has done a lot for the small business man. However, we have not dealt with the real problem, which is money. We must do more to help, and the Budget fails totally in that respect.

8.29 pm

Mr. William Powell (Corby): As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) emphasised, we are bound to consider the Budget in the context of what is happening in our constituencies. I will assess the Budget by that yardstick. As so many hon. Members will know, my constituency has been through the eye of the storm and is emerging very successfully from that storm. The Budget will undoubtedly further assist in the process of recovery in Corby and east Northamptonshire.

The world did not begin in 1979, as so many Labour Members like to emphasise. It began long before that. My constituents ruefully recall the fact that some 13,000 of them were condemned to lose their jobs without any preparation for the future as a result of a decision taken by the previous Labour Government. When the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall)—who has left the Chamber now—speaks about poverty, thousands of my constituents recall the fact that their poverty, which has been appalling in the past few years in many cases, was inflicted upon them by the conduct of the previous Labour Government who knew that the steelworks was to close by the end of the 1970s but made no preparation for what would happen after the steelworks closed.

The Labour Government knew that the steelworks was to close because they knew that the quality of the local iron ore was diminishing and could no longer be sustained for steel production. The decision had also been taken to concentrate on the great five steelworks of Ravenscraig, Llanwern, Port Talbot, Scunthorpe and Redcar. They knew that the consequence of that would be to condemn every small steelworks in this country to extinction. That has happened at Shotton, Ebbw Vale, Consett, Corby and elsewhere. My constituents recall what happened in those days. When they hear Labour spokesmen talking about poverty as though it was something that has just emerged under this Government, they know perfectly well that that is a load of balderdash.

My constituents in east Northamptonshire also recall the storm which the boot and shoe industry has suffered in the past few years. Employment in that industry has halved because of the neglect for so long to build up the profitability of our firms, or to encourage an open trading system that would enable them to trade successfully. My constituents will therefore welcome the overall economic context of the Budget, the high and growing productivity and the most successful productivity record of any major country in the western world.

My constituents will welcome the fact that inflation is low and, as a result of the Budget, will fall lower. There is no doubt that because of the decision of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor not to valorise excise duties and because of what may happen with interest rates, inflation will drop still lower. As a result, growth is likely to remain buoyant and top of the league of western countries. The overall economic context is favourable and my constituents will benefit from that during the forthcoming year.

My constituents will also welcome individual measures announced in the Budget. Every small business man in my constituency will welcome the VAT measures. They will be of immense benefit to the local economy, to encourage confidence, and more people will go into business. The proposals in relation to profit-related pay will also be welcomed by many firms in my constituency.

Twice in the past three years I have had to propose a new clause to the Finance Bill abolishing on-course betting duty. I welcome the fact that I shall not be required to do that this year. It has come as something of a surprise to me that the Chancellor has yielded to pleas in that regard at this stage and I welcome the fact that he has done so in Cheltenham week.

I also welcome the changes that have been made to inheritance tax. Although no comment has been made about my next point so far in the debate, I welcome the modest but important proposals in relation to the friendly societies. Some hon. Members—although I cannot see any of them present in the Chamber now — will remember the hours of debate on friendly societies in Committee on the Finance Bill in 1984. We discussed friendly societies at considerable length then and considerable unease was expressed by Conservative Members in the Committee about the new proposals which the Chancellor introduced. The new measures that the Chancellor has announced today will be widely welcomed.

One point which has not received the emphasis that it merits and deserves this evening is the excise proposals with regard to petrol and fuel. The commerce in my constituency is carried around this country and abroad on lorries. There is no doubt that the decline in the oil price gave the road haulage industry an advantage which it was anxious should be sustained and should not be knocked by a renewed increase in duties on petrol fuels. In Irthlingborough, Raunds, Thrapston, Oundle, King's Cliffe and Corby tonight, my right hon. Friend's decision will be widely welcomed by the road hauliers who have become a booming section of the local economy.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment is on the Front Bench and he knows the way in which Corby has recovered in the past few years. It has recovered in part because of its extremely favourable location. It has a more favoured location for investment than any other assisted area. It has also recovered because of the Government's policies. One of the crucial policies which has enabled the recovery to take place is the 35 per cent. corporation tax. That has not been underlined enough in this debate. The decision to have the lowest corporation tax of any western Government is a major help in attempts to attract inward investment to this country. Substantial inward investment is taking place in my constituency from north America, the continent of Europe and elsewhere. That is becoming a major boost to employment. I welcome the extra stability that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been able to announce in that regard today.

It is also worth emphasising the fact that the tremendous growth which is occurring all the time in my constituency, which is brought about by location and central Government policies, has been encouraged and welcomed by local authorities in my constituency. There are two authorities in my constituency, one Labour-controlled and one Conservative-controlled. I do not mind —I have frequently done so— paying warm tribute to the way in which the local authority in my constituency has been determined to work with the Government to try to get the maximum to ensure that the reputation of the area is as high as it conceivably can be. All that has contributed. One can contrast that responsible attitude, of working with the Government adopted by the Labour council in my constituency, with the attitude that is adopted by some other councils, which has done irreparable damage to the reputation of their communities and made it so much more difficult to galvanise the local economy. That needs to be underlined.

I take up the theme used by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West. I am sorry that he is not here. He is a man whom I hold in great regard. I have listened to him for many hours in Committee on other Finance Bills and I know that he is utterly sincere in what he says and is anxious to do the best that he can by his constituents. I wish him every success in that.

At the root of the poverty —there is real, grinding poverty that cannot be ignored in my constituency today, even though we are bouncing back from the worst— there are two causes. The first is the absence of skills and the second the absence of incentives. The Budget has to be seen in the context of various other major statements of Government policy that have been made in recent months, beginning with the autumn statement, through to the employment initiatives. My hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) is here and has close responsibility for those initiatives. Taken together, they add up to an immensely important package of developments in Government policy.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) emphasised, the fiscal adjustment for this year is no less than £11 billion. I can understand that some Labour Members have found themselves rather floundering about and short of words because they thought that this would be an election bonanza and they have found that the hype in the newspapers has turned out to be entirely unfounded. That fiscal adjustment is dramatic and is the biggest one that has been possible for any Chancellor of the Exchequer in modern times.

Let us emphasise that the most important single element in the fiscal adjustment that is being made for the coming financial year is increased Government expenditure. When we hear people saying that they want extra services before income tax cuts, we have to remember that they also want income tax cuts. Hon. Members will recall that yesterday a BBC poll showed that no less than 81 per cent. of the country wanted cuts in taxes, but also wanted increases in services. Next year, the Government are planning to spend no less than an extra £5 billion or so. That is the biggest single ingredient in the fiscal adjustment, and will have an impact in Northamptonshire as it will have elsewhere.

The bottom line is that, if we are to eliminate, as we all want to eliminate, poverty in this country, we have to face the fact that we still have a work force that in certain respects lacks the skills that are required for the future and we still have an economy that does not give sufficient incentive, particularly to the unskilled, to get work.

There is one message that all of us have to try to hammer home to every one of our constituents, especially every one of our young constituents. It is that there is no future in a lack of skills. The part of the work force that is most at threat is always the unskilled person, so in dealing with the increase in Government expenditure for next year we should mention that the education budget is to rise by no less than 18·6 per cent. That is a substantial increase in public investment in a major sector.

The skills will come about through the activities of the MSC, for which my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen has some responsibility. In my constituency, school leaver after school leaver is able to go through training into permanent new jobs, jobs that will take them away from poverty for ever as long as we are able to continue to pursue sensible and prudent policies that take account of the many aspects of economic life in this country and do not get out of context any one particular element.

My constituents will welcome this evening the measures that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has proposed. They will note that those measures have been welcomed in wide and differing parts of the country —from Esgx, from my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis), from Buckinghamshire, Uxbridge, the west midlands and Scotland. No doubt what has been said will be underlined by others of my hon. Friends. Throughout this country, there will be a wide welcome for a sensible Budget.

8.46 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) will understand if I do not follow him down his path. I notice that he did not mention Yorkshire and Humberside in giving the Budget a welcome.

Mr. Michael Brown: I am here.

Mr. Lofthouse: I apologise if the area has been mentioned earlier, but the hon. Member for Corby did not mention it.

I wish that I could share the enthusiasm of the hon. Member for Corby. There is a different picture in Yorkshire and Humberside, especially in the mining communities. It is about problems there, rather than party political points, that I shall speak in the few minutes at my disposal. The Budget has achieved a widening of the north-south divide. The people who will benefit most from tax relief and inheritance tax relief will be, on the whole, living in the southern part of the country. That being the case, there is no joy for areas such as mine in the north.

Where has all the money gone? What about the money from the sale of the family silver, as the late Lord Stockton called it? An income of about £8 billion was generated from the sale of British Gas and British Airways and from the sale of land and so on. Such money has not gone to Yorkshire and Humberside. Since 1979, for every four production jobs lost in the region, only one has been replaced from the service sector. There has been a rapid rundown in employment in Yorkshire and Humberside.

In the mining industries, we have seen very little capital investment. In the Castleford travel-to-work area, 24 per cent. of those unemployed are under the age of 24. Many of these people have never worked since they left school. Many of the males would normally have gone into the mining industry, but unfortunately there are no jobs there for them to go into. These people will not benefit from the tax cuts or any Budget decisions. This is pure fact and not a political point.

In my own area, since the miners' strike—I do not want to dwell too long on that because it gives me too much pain—about 7,000 jobs have gone. I am referring to the Castleford travel-to-work area in which about 3,000 supporting jobs have also gone. If I am able to assess the information that we in the Energy Select Committee received on the mining Estimates, I expect that there will be many more such job losses during the next three years, and they will not be cushioned by the redundant mineworkers payments scheme. There will be no weekly pensions for those miners, as there have been before this month. Therefore, the local economy will take a further bump.

Time and time again, we have made approaches to the Minister in an attempt to get him to assist those areas which have lost their staple industries. My area has never been one for the small businesses to which the hon. Member for Corby referred. It has had two staple industries, mining and glass. Both have nearly been wiped out without any other industry being put in their place. Since the miners' strike and the loss of those 7,000 and 3,000 jobs, British Coal Enterprise Ltd., which I do not knock because it makes a good honest effort to assist, has, as I said a few weeks ago in the mining debate, attracted only two jobs to replace the 10,000 lost in my travel-to-work area. The following week, I was taken up on that in the local press by a senior NCB official who said that my figure was wrong. Bearing in mind that I used the figures that he had sent to me, I was rather alarmed. However, I must concede that I was wrong. I gave that figure as two, but his figure was four. One can see from that the problems that we are experiencing in those areas.

We have tried to persuade the Minister to consider those areas for intermediate status or for development status to enable or encourage other industries to come into the area and provide employment. That would also encourage assistance from the EEC. However, at no time have we had any assistance whatsoever.

Those are the problems, and that is the great north-south divide which, in my view, has been further widened today. Despite what the hon. Member for Corby said, the Budget gives no encouragement to some areas. There is no joy in this Budget for the people in the areas to which I have referred. There is certainly no joy in it for pensioners, people living on the poverty line or low-paid workers. No

hon. Member could really suggest that there is anything in it for those people. If there is any gain in it, it will be for people such as ourselves, who are reasonably well off. I cannot help but feel that in this Budget the Chancellor has written off the north as without hope and that he feels that there is no point in giving the north anything. He has put all his thoughts into assisting the wealthier parts of the country.

As I have said, in the coal mining areas, many young people have not worked since they left school and have no chance of getting a home because the local authorities have been unable to build any houses, despite large capital receipts. A few houses may recently have come on to the market for letting, but those houses were flogged off by the National Coal Board to racketeers and speculators.

I provided information to the House a few weeks ago to show that there were empty NCB houses. I can inform the House that I have already produced, for the appropriate Minister, information on tenancy agreements that offer youngsters houses that were purchased for £2,500 for a rent of £35 a week, plus general and water rates and a £350 down payment for key money. That is before they can take out a one-year tenancy. These are kids who have never known employment in their lives and who are desperate for a home. Some have small babies. These areas get no assistance from the Government and have not received any assistance in this Budget. On top of that, a £10 million tax has recently been imposed on the sick by the increase in prescription charges.

Today's Budget has been nothing but a smack in the eye for the lower paid and those in poverty. They will not receive one farthing. I hope that the Government will at least consider the areas to which I have referred. I must advise the House that the recent report from the Energy Select Committee about the future of the mining industry emphasised that there must never again be quite so rapid a rundown in any industry, especially the mining industry which has special communities, without preparation and advance financial assistance by the Government. That was the unanimous decision of that House of Commons Select Committee, which has a Tory majority.

I repeat that there is no joy in the Budget for those of us in the north or in mining communities. I had hoped that we might have received some sympathetic treatment, but it is fairly obvious that we shall not and that there is little sympathy for those of us in mining communities. I warn the House not to think that anyone in the mining communities is there to be knocked down because the Government think that they should be taught a lesson. The vast majority of the mining industry are hard-working, responsible people and they deserve consideration. I regret that the Chancellor has failed to consider them this afternoon.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am anxious to call hon. Members, particularly those who have sat through most of the debate, so I ask for brevity.

8.58 pm

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): I shall be as brief as I can, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to address two points to the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse). First, the family silver has been sold to the people and has given them, as shareholders, a stake in the country. Secondly, I congratulate him on the way in which he has represented his constituency. The Government must tackle the north-south divide, and I am sure that they will. I make those remarks out of courtesy to the hon. Gentleman.

Today's climate is the result of seven years' hard work by a Conservative Government, and the budget is both responsible and prudent. Our industrial output has increased by 2·5 per cent., and since 1980 our growth rate has been faster than that of any of our European partners. At the same time, we have invested £1,000 million abroad. That is not to be neglected, because it will bring in income in years to come. If one casts one's mind back to before the war, one remembers that we had vast overseas investments which paid for a great deal of our needs. We shall live to benefit from that investment, and I hope that the Government will continue it.

We are all glad to see a fall in inflation because it is an evil to all classes and all savers. We are also glad to see an incentive for North sea oil development, which is an important part of our revenue. The Government's approach has been cautious, and they are right. They have provided 1·5 million or 1·25 million jobs, depending on how the figure is calculated, but that is just the tip of the iceberg in reducing unemployment. Despite what Labour Members say, all Conservative Members are terribly worried about the level of unemployment.

The relaxation of corporation tax is welcome and will make life easier. As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) said, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), has worked hard for small businesses. We rely on them to become bigger. For goodness sake, let us have more encouragement from the banks to set up those businesses, if they are sound. We do not want the banks wasting their money on overseas loans which simply are not viable, and many never repaid, either capital or income. I ask the House to consider the debts that the banks have accumulated by doing that. It would have been far better if they had invested in our small businesses. For once, I disagree with the policy of the big banks.

We all recognise the value of the VAT concessions given to small businesses. If we want small businesses to prosper, the banks and the Government must provide money and the burden must be reduced, as the Chancellor has done today. Most important, we must ensure that they are not burdened with unnecessary forms to fill in at the end of the year. They exist to do business, not to fill in forms for the Government.

Profit-related pay will bring dividends. We have made 8·5 million people shareholders and 63 per cent. of householders are home owners. Those are ways in which we can make society more democratic and turn it into a property-owning nation.

I welcome the concessions on pensions, which make them more portable, and help to the over-80s. Provision for one's old age must be made by the state and private enterprise. Everybody likes to see VAT on charities reduced, but I am not so sure about income tax reliefs. I am all for taking people out of tax and not so much for reducing tax in the top brackets. However, I must admit that by reducing tax at the top, one increases the incentive to work which, indirectly, increases employment. We are in a fix, however we do it. Taking people out of tax is an encouragement to work, but taking money off the top layer also encourages people to earn more and to work harder. I do not know which is better. It is a mixed blessing.

The Government's aim, which is set out clearly in this document, is to create a property-owning democracy where people own their houses and are shareholders. They wish to create the feeling that everybody has a part to play. The harder they work, the more their company or institution will make, and they are benefiting from being shareholders.

There is one particular aspect of the Budget that I am unhappy about. We have not given sufficient thought to the training of young people. Technology has moved on and we must train young unemployed people at school, in jobcentres and anywhere else, so that they can compete in a modern, technological world.

9.5 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) will forgive me if I do not, in the interests of time, follow him down the route on which he embarked.

Nothing could have characterised more clearly the economic illiteracy of the Leader of the Opposition than his attempt to brand the Budget as a pre-election spending spree and a vote-grabbing Budget. No doubt that is what he expected when he prepared his speech, but it is not what he got. No doubt that was what the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) expected when he said in this morning's press, "Beware of the bribes of March." Where were those bribes? They were conspicuous by their absence from the Budget.

In his Budget this afternoon my right hon. Friend was a model of prudence. It was a highly responsible Budget. It may even have been thought by some people to have been excessively cautious. In a year in which Government revenues are unprecedentedly buoyant, with billions of pounds coming into the Government coffers, my right hon. Friend has chosen to reduce the PSBR by £3 billion from the level that was projected for this year — although we have had a £3 billion undershoot in the current year—and the total amount of tax relief that he has given is less than £3 billion. It is a model of responsibility. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the content of his Budget.

The Budget has been introduced against an exceptionally favourable background. That is not, as some people have suggested in the House and outside, a matter of good luck. It is the result of nearly eight years of good management. We are enjoying a steady growth rate of about 3 per cent. a year. This is not the stop-go cycle of the 1960s and 1970s, when the economy would charge ahead at 4 per cent. or more for a year or two and then the brakes would have to be slammed on. This is a sustainable rate of growth, and it is accompanied—this is important—by inflation being down at about 3 or 4 per cent. a year. That combination of steady growth and low inflation gives us the most favourable economic background that we have had for more than 30 years.

It is no surprise, therefore, that we are now seeing a substantial increase in productivity. It is no surprise that our share of world exports in manufactures—which is measured by volume — having declined steadily throughout the 1970s, as the chart on page 25 of the Red Book shows, are now holding their own in the 1980s.

That is why the trend in unemployment will improve substantially in the coming year. We are already creating jobs at the rate of 250,000 a year and we will see unemployment coming down handsomely in the third term of the Thatcher Government.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Carthcart): Are there more people in employment today than there were in 1979?

Mr. Yeo: There are more people in employment today than when I entered the House in June 1983.

Mr. Maxton: That is not the question.

Mr. Yeo: That is the question that I am choosing to answer.

Something else that we have now that we did not have in 1979 or 1983 is £110 billion of overseas investments, which is second only to Japan. Our overseas investments have been more soundly managed. We are not excessively large holders of United States Treasury bonds. Our investments are well diversified in a variety of currencies and they will see us through the kind of crisis that we might face at some stage in the 21st century, as the overseas investments which were built up in the 19th century saw us through the second world war. That will be a pot of gold for the country to draw on in any future crises.

This combination of favourable circumstances is the result of prudent financial management and proper control over public spending, accompanied by industrial relations reforms. We have transformed the industrial climate and trade unions are now in the hands of their members rather than those of their leaders. Trade unionists can choose now whether to go on strike, and this is allowing industrial management to manage. Coupled with these developments has been an immense increase in share ownership.

We faced an extraordinarily attractive set of choices this year. We wanted to know which taxes would be cut and which might even be abolished and where we could increase spending. Contrast these choices with those that we used to face under Labour Governments. In 1978, when the Labour Government were being sustained in office by the Liberal party, whose representatives are sadly absent from the Chamber, we were faced with rather different choices. These included which taxes were to be increased and which new ones could be invented, such as the employers' national insurance surcharge. That surcharge was invented by the then Labour Government and the Liberal party did nothing to reduce or remove it when it had the chance to do so. If that Government did not have the nerve to increase taxes or invent new ones, they could cut spending. If they were not sure which course to take, the IMF was standing behind them to tell them exactly where they should make cuts.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer most warmly on his Budget judgment. When the economy is growing already at a satisfactory pace, he is entirely right to use a substantial proportion of the resources available to him to cut the public sector borrowing requirement. We do not need presently another massive fiscal stimulus. Instead, we need a responsible Budget that will command the confidence of the financial market.

The Budget will lead to lower interest rates, and I believe that we shall see interest rates in single figures within days. The lower rates will benefit industry, and especially small businesses. There are other measures that will benefit small businesses. Lower interest rates will lead to the creation of jobs and will benefit directly every household that has a mortgage.

There would be little chance of lower interest rates if the policies of the Liberal or Labour parties, both of which are projecting a massive increase in the PSBR, were to be implemented. The Liberals, as always, want to have it both ways in their draft Budget. Despite advocating a huge increase in the PSBR, they imagine that, under their policies, interest rates will come tumbling down.

I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer resisted the temptation of introducing a tax cut of more than 2p in the pound. There is no economic or social case for a greater basic rate cut this year. Our long-term aim must be 25p for the basic rate and 50p for the top rate, and I am confident that we shall achieve that during the next Parliament. In 1987, our priority should be to help those on average earnings or below. My right hon. Friend reflected this, at least in part, in his decision not to raise thresholds for the 50 per cent., 55 per cent. and 60 per cent. rates. Indeed, he decided not fully to index the 45 per cent. threshold rate.

I should have been inclined to raise the basic rate threshold by more than the amount required by indexation, but I recognise that, having increased in real terms the basic rate thresholds by 22 per cent. since 1979, my right hon. Friend may feel that enough has been done. Of course, by this time next year, when the Social Security Act 1986 comes into operation, there will be less merit in raising basic rate thresholds because there will be a taper on the social security benefits that result directly from any increase in tax thresholds. It is, however, a most welcome aspect of the changes in personal tax allowances that a special increase in the age allowance for pensioners of over 80 years has been introduced. I am delighted that this has been done, and I am sure that it will be welcomed warmly by the many retired people who are living to a ripe old age in my constituency.

I have a passing regret that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer chose not to build on the changes in national insurance contributions that he introduced in 1985. The lower rate bands of national insurance contributions paid by employees earning up to £150 a week offer the most cost-effective way for any Chancellor to give relief to low-paid employees. Indeed, my right hon. Friend can target relief to the three groups earning up to £150 a week without creating any administrative burden for the employer or the Inland Revenue. Those bands are already the subject of separate national insurance contribution calculations.

Without doubt, all the tax cuts that have been made this year will go a long way to improve work incentives. The right way to widen the gap between the take-home pay earned by someone in a full-time job and the income that that same person could obtain if he chose to live on social security benefits—[HON. MEMBERS: "Chose?"]. We are aware that that gap is much too narrow. We cannot deal with this problem by inflationary wage increases that undermine competitiveness and ultimately destroy jobs, nor by reducing social security benefit because, for those who are genuinely unemployed, their benefit levels are by no means generous. The right way to widen the gap is by cutting the tax burden on the lower paid. I welcome the Chancellor's announcement today as it will help work incentives.

I also welcome the strengthening of the profit-related pay tax incentives. I hope that that scheme will have a wide take-up in all sections of industry. I also congratulate my right hon. Friend most warmly on resisting presssure—some of which may have come from close at hand—to increase the mortgage threshold on which tax is payable. I am glad that the threshold has been left at £30,000. Any increase in it would feed straight through into higher house prices. It would not help those on average earnings who are unlikely to have a mortgage of more than £30,000. It would do nothing to reduce the disparity between house prices in the north and those in the south that has already immobilised labour in the north and south. Any change would have represented money wasted.

I regret that the Chancellor proposed no significant change to capital gains tax for individuals. I believe it is wrong that capital gains are taxed at a higher rate than the basic rate of income tax. I also deplore the continued failure to index capital gains that arose from investments made before 1982. Many people are sitting on long-term investments that have made substantial gains most of which merely represents the effects of inflation during the 1970s. If the Chancellor introduced a lower rate of capital gains tax, it would lead to a significant increase in the yield from that tax. Many people are sitting on large gains that they will realise at a tax rate of 30 per cent., but if the rate was reduced to perhaps 10 per cent. we would witness a significant increase in the revenue received from this tax.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): What about charities?

Mr. Yeo: I will come to charities in a moment.

The relief available to people selling businesses on retirement is welcome. I am also pleased that the inheritance tax threshold has been raised bearing in mind that, in today's terms, £71,000 is not a large sum—it does not make someone rich to have £71,000.

Mr. Foulkes: What! The hon. Gentleman can write me out a cheque now.

Mr. Yeo: The Chancellor was right to emphasise that the inheritance tax is expected to yield £1 billion this year—more than three times the yield of the penal and confiscatory capital transfer tax that was left by the previous Labour Government.

I unreservedly welcome the VAT reliefs that have been given for charities. I am delighted to be speaking while my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury is on the Front Bench. He will recall that I visited him some months ago as chairman of the Charities VAT and Tax Reform Group to make representations about a number of VAT anomalies. I am delighted that my hon. Friend has been able to persuade my right hon. Friend to meet our demands.

The relief that will be available for the installation or adaptation of bathrooms or lavatories for disabled people in charitable, residential homes is extremely helpful. I hope that that will be a useful step towards a sign of sympathy on other building alterations that charities must carry out.

The extension of the medical research concessions dealing with drugs and chemicals used by medical research charities is valuable. The concessions on welfare vehicles used by hospices is also welcome. Those changes will receive widespread acclaim. The Red Book estimates that such changes will cost £5 million. I hope that those changes will cost more than £5 million, although I doubt that they will. Although we welcome the fact that the basic rate of income tax has been reduced year by year, each time there is a reduction there is also a reduction in the income that charities receive from covenants that the Government urged the charities to develop in the early 1980s. Two pence off the basic rate of income tax means a significant cut in the income received by many charities. They need the VAT relief which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has given this year to compensate.

I am delighted that excise duties have been subject to the most minimal changes this year. That will be good for inflation. I suspect that my right hon. Friend's forecast for inflation for 1987 is a little on the high side. I would not be surprised if it were less than 4 per cent. by the end of the year.

The encouragement of more portable pensions is welcome also, as is the greater freedom for people to make additional voluntary contributions. However, in the long term, we need to educate the public about the risks inherent in relying too heavily on unit-linked policies.

The tightening of the other tax provisions is welcome. The VAT change allowing small traders to opt for accounting on a cash basis is extremely desirable, as is the opportunity for them to make annual returns.

There is only one omission from my right hon. Friend's Budget speech which I regret. There was no reference to tax reform. I hope that there will be a strong commitment to tax reform by the Government in the next Parliament. It is high time that we overhauled some of the anomalous treatments, especially of married women, under the present tax system. I hope that we shall look at the merging of national insurance contributions with income tax because separation of those two no longer makes sense. Tax reform must mean tax simplification. To get tax rates down requires the abolition of concessions, not the creation of new ones.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) pointed out, the Budget must be considered in conjuction with last year's autumn statement, which contained almost £5 billion of new spending. That was the time of the big give-away. Today's Budget was a prudent and cautious statement. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made the right Budget judgment for the long term. His Budget is in the best interests of our economy. It is not an electioneering Budget and, for that reason, will win the election.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I should not like this opportunity to pass without raising the issue of those who are so often forgotten by the Government — the elderly and old-age pensioners. How does the Budget help them? How does it help the lady who spoke to me only a few days ago and told me of the time when she had applied for the special heating allowance but, because she had £536 in the bank, was not entitled to it? How does it help the lady who telephoned me today in tears and told me that she had to draw out the money that she had saved for her funeral to buy herself a new gas cooker because she had not had a hot meal for 10 days and her 30-year-old gas cooker had been condemned by the gas board?

How does the Budget help the elderly who are worried about the payment of heating bills? How does it help the elderly who are worried about paying for their television licences — something about which the Government are not in the least concerned? How does the Budget help the elderly who are worried about paying their telephone bills? Their telephone is often their only lifeline to their families, yet no help is given to them. How does the Budget help the people who are just above supplementary benefit level who have not been given any additional help and who do not get any rent rebates? They do not pay taxes and they have no savings.

The elderly have worked hard, often for little money. They have created this country's wealth and have been forgotten, yet again, by the Government and by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I join Conservative Members in welcoming the Budget in its prudence. It marks a turning point. The PSBR is low enough for us to see the prospect of lower interest rates, which I hope will soon be as low as those of our chief competitors so that British industry's costs through borrowing are no higher than those abroad.

The Budget holds out the prospect of continuous economic growth. We have had seven years of growth, and we can see the prospect of productive jobs instead of the sort of subsidised jobs that existed under the last Labour Government. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) was, I think, referring to a letter in the Financial Times yesterday from four previous chief economic advisers. I find it a quite extraordinary letter. I see it as a small tombstone to the death of Socialist economic policies. Our success results from the reversal of all the policies that these gentleman must have advocated. I do not have in front of me the name of the present chief economic adviser, but I must congratulate him and his colleagues on being able to advise the Chancellor better than their predecessors did, if these latter have learnt so little that they say that "the increase in the number of 2 million unemployed since 1979 results from errors of economic policy."

Quite right, but it was from past economic policy in the years when those people were in office.

Which of these four magnificent knights was the one who recommended the jobs tax? Was that not a brilliant piece of economic and fiscal advice, the 3 per cent. surtax on jobs? Strangely, none of the four knights mentioned the job tax as part of the economic advice which he was so happy to give and which it was supposed would help in providing real jobs.

These people do not seem able even to recognise the success of present policy. They say that the economy has grown "at a moderate rate". They fail to realise that during the period of their advice the economy was growing at a lower rate than that of our competitors, whereas now it is growing at a higher rate, so how they can dismiss it as a period of moderate growth defeats me.

Again, they say that "slow growth since 1979" is the reason for high unemployment. If it is slow growth that causes high unemployment and we now have a higher growth rate than do our competitors they answer their own question, because that must be an answer to the present problems of unemployment.

These economic advisers end their letter by saying that they "welcome the initiative taken by Hands Across Britain . . . on 3 May."

All I can say is that I hope that it will not be long after that that we go to the polling booths and make it "thumbs down across Britain" for Socialist policies. We all look forward to that.

One of the best bits of information in the Chancellor's speech was that export growth in the past three months was 6 per cent. above the previous year. That is where the real jobs will come from; that is the success of manufacturing industry.

I also very much welcome the downward trend of the unemployment figure, which has decreased in the past six months by 100,000. Where the policies of Opposition Members are so lacking is in their assumption that they can reduce unemployment by looking to local authorities as the instrument of growth, the sort of nonsense that we hear from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who seems to have been gagged for the past few days.

I would, however, like to draw the attention of the Chancellor to the fact that if we look at the unemployment figures in some detail we see that, although the number of people unemployed for a short time has come down, the number of those who have been unemployed for longer has increased. Perhaps I could just refer to the figures. In 1983, when I was elected, the number of people who had been unemployed for five years or more was 66,500. The last published figure for the number of people unemployed for five years or more was 232,000, so there has been a substantial increase in the number of people out of work for a long time. I urge the Chancellor to redirect restart and all the other employment measures so as to pay greater attention to those who have been out of work the longest.

I welcome the provision to allow tax relief for training, but I suggest that we need to go further than that. I draw the Chancellor's attention to a scheme which has been run in Bolton for the past year or more and in which priority has been given on the community programme to those who have been out of work the longest. This is a scheme that I initiated with the help of various right hon. Friends and Ministers in the Department of Employment, and it is fair to say that the scheme has been greeted as a considerable success.

Just today I was very pleased to receive a letter from one person who has been on the scheme and who had been out of work for over three years. I had been very pleased to give him a reference on the strength of the work that he was doing there. He wrote:

"Just a brief note to thank you for the reference you did for me, the reference indeed which helped me to secure a permanent position . . . I was one of the lads working on the site at the new Jerusalem Church . . . and my present employer (a nice term) said my appointment was due in no small part to the reference. So thanks again."

That was from Mark Longworth.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): The hon. Gentleman said that he recognised that there had been an increase in the long-term unemployed to well over 250,000 and that he regretted that. Does he see that figure as a success for the Government's economic policy?

Mr. Thurnham: I see it as a residual problem that arose from the policies pursued prior to 1979.

The people on that scheme were able to leave school and be given rates of pay that were above the market rate. They were people who did not feel it necessary or who were unable to gain the skills under previous policies. I call attention to the need to give greater priority to those who are in the predicament that they are in today because of the policies pursued by the previous Labour Government.

The Budget includes provision for the disabled, which is welcome. The blind allowance rises from £360 to £540, and there are additional charitable exemptions from VAT, including items for handicapped people in homes, as well as rescue and first-aid equipment. I should like to mention two stories in the newspapers in the past day or two. In one case, an award of £500,000 was given to a child who had been severely handicapped as a result of an accident and inadequate care afterwards. If it is possible for some people who care for a handicapped person to have £500,000 to help, why is that not available to all? In New Zealand and Sweden it is possible for funds to be made available on a no-blame basis, and I should like to draw the Chancellor's attention to the need for all people who have to care in such situations to have more help.

There was a great outcry about the need for the sterilisation of a young 17-year-old girl. People are living in cloud-cuckoo-land if they do not feel that adequate funds should be made available to help individual people provide care for that sort of person, rather than leaving it to institutions, where the problem is so much greater.

I congratulate the Chancellor on his excellent Budget, which lays the ground for continued economic growth and greater wealth. Through that greater wealth there will be an opportunity to provide care and greater provision for those in our society who are in the greatest need.

9.33 pm

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I listened to the Chancellor from the start of his speech to the end and I listened to the Leader of the Opposition's reply. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition was able to highlight the fact that the Chancellor has not given consideration to the people I represent in Wales, especially in Ogmore. Over the seven years of the present Administration, unemployment in the constituency of Ogmore has risen from 3·7 per cent. to 20 per cent. In part of my constituency, Maesteg, with a population of some 26,000, the male unemployment rate over the past three years has been 40 per cent.

Given those figures in an area such as Ogmore, the Chancellor should have looked more seriously at the bonanza he talks about. He pretends to be a Santa Claus to those who are rich but he is a Scrooge to those I represent—the 10,000 people in Ogmore without a job.

A number of people will obviously benefit from the Budget. Many rich city dwellers will receive tax relief on pensions amounting to £150,000. Most of my constituents —those in work as well as those out of work—would think that they had won the pools if they had £150,000 in the bank. Such tax relief would be out of the question for 99 per cent. of the people whom I represent.

Surely we must be concerned about underpaid and underprivileged people in society. Most low-paid people live in the deprived areas of Wales, such as that which I represent, where, in the past seven years, the Government's policies have deliberately de-manned the steel industry and resulted in the closure of mines. Five collieries in my constituency of Ogmore were closed in 1983. Two collieries in the area that I have represented since 1983 that were in the Pontypridd constituency have been closed. Seven collieries, with a work force of well over 3,500 people, have been closed as a deliberate attempt by the Government to ensure that coal mining areas in Wales were decimated. Indeed, the collieries to which I refer would have been of great national importance. They produced the best coking coal in Europe. They were closed in a deliberate attempt by the Government to force people into the unemployed ranks.

Comparing the present number of people who are out of work with the number who were out of work in 1979, we see that there was a deliberate attempt by the Government to suppress workers and their demands for extra pay for the services that they offered, and to suppress the trade union movement. That attempt might have succeeded. Together with the oil bonanza, it might have given the money that the Chancellor has to disburse. But all the evening newspapers have quite deliberately suggested that the money could have been better used in creating employment.

In Wales in particular, it will not create necessary employment. As the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) often says, it is passing strange that, for seven years, the Chancellor and his predecessor have continually talked about restraint and have assured us that successive Budgets would curb public expenditure. After seven years, and indeed on the eve of a general election, we find that the Chancellor has found money to disburse to people in the higher income bracket.

I wonder how much money will go to the Ogmore constituency. How much will go to the 10,000 people who are out of work in Ogmore? How much will go to the coalfield communities of Ogmore that are now totally depressed, annihilated, with few factories and with little money coming in for factory development? The people whom I represent do not have much hope for the future. This Government could have given £4 billion to the British people. Instead, the people who will benefit from the £4 billion will be the better-off.

In tonight's edition of the London Daily News, John Shields refers to the Chancellor of the Exchequer playing Santa Claus. In the second paragraph of his article, he says:

"They are the unemployed, who seem set to lose out once again, even though it is partly on their backs that the foundations for the current 'success' have been laid. Only six or seven years ago, in less bounty-ridden days, nothing was being given away. Cuts were applied only to public expenditure, never to tax. Priority was given to controlling the money supply, constraining public borrowing and cutting public expenditure."

What John Shields says is quite true. Public expenditure cuts in my constituency mean that a scheme for 500 houses in Ogwr borough has been cut since 1979. The number of people on the housing waiting list in 1979 was 1,720. The number now on that list is 2,500. A limited amount of money is available for spending on public housing. We can build only 100 new houses a year.

There are 177,000 people out of work in Wales. The Tory Government did not inherit that level of unemployment in 1979. Unless something is done about the unemployed in areas such as mine, the direct result will be an increase in crime. Instead of providing tax relief bonanzas, the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have tried to combat the increase in crime.

When I look at people in my constituency, I see the degradation of unemployment. I see that 16 and 18-year-olds have no chance of a job because of this Government's policies. Despite the opinion polls, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be kissing 100 of his hon. Friends goodbye at the next election. It is time that the Government appreciated that those who are out of work are demanding that this Government, or the next Labour Government, should do something about unemployment. Those who are out of work, with no chance of a job, will remember the Government's actions and this Budget at the next election—whether it is in June, or October, or next year—and they will vote for a Labour Government.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I shall not detain the House for very long, because I know that several hon. Members want to speak. However, I want to make a short speech as an employer who owns a small company in the licensed trade. I welcome much of what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor introduced in the Budget.

Mr. Fatchett: Is the hon. Gentleman supposed to be representing a constituency?

Mr. Couchman: Of course I am representing a constituency and I shall say so throughout my speech. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), wish to intervene from a sedentary or standing position?

For two years my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has taken steps to assist small companies and particularly the succession of ownership of small companies from father to son, which will improve the security of those small family businesses. I welcome the changes in VAT which will apply to businesses smaller than my own. A technical change in the partial exemption rules on VAT will be less onerous to the licensed trade than was first thought.

The decision not to increase excise duties on beers, wines and spirits for the second year running will be very welcome to a trade which is still suffering from recession and from a change in drinking habits. In 1981, when my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe) introduced his Budget, I had the doubtful pleasure as a licensee of offering instant comment on one of the most swingeing increases in duty ever. That increase had a marked and deleterious effect on the trade of all licensed outlets. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's restraint today will lead to a new buoyancy in the licensed trade.

Mr. Maxton: Does not the hon. Member have any regard at all to the appalling health problems created both by alcohol and tobacco? Does he not think that perhaps the Chancellor ought to have increased the price of both alcohol and tobacco to try to stop people partaking of them?

Mr. Couchman: The hon. Gentleman knows that we had an excellent debate a fortnight ago on the licensed trade, licensing reform and abuse of alcohol. The hon. Gentleman may have been present on that occasion to make his point.

It is in personal taxation that changes will be most widely welcome. My business employs many people on comparatively low incomes. Full-time bar staff generally live in and enjoy free board and lodging, but their weekly wages are comparatively modest. A gross wage of perhaps £125 a week will lead to an increase in net pay of something over £2 a week. I do not think those employees will take the £2 and buy a postal order and send it to the Chancellor in the hope that he may use it on increased public expenditure.

I do not think many people will refuse the reductions in taxation, in the amount of money which the Chancellor takes from us, and then ask for that money to be used on increased public expenditure.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Couchman: I am not giving way.

It is also fair to say that my managers will much welcome the Chancellor's proposals for profit-related pay. Those proposals are likely to be extremely beneficial to them and to many other people who will in future share in the profits of the company for which they work.

I join many other hon. Members in welcoming the VAT changes affecting charities, the increase in the allowance for the blind, and especially the new higher age allowance for those aged 80 or over, in line with this Government's institution of a pension as of right for all over 80, which was resisted by the last Labour Government, despite many attempts to bring it in.

Because of my responsibilities as PPS to the Minister for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton), I perhaps should confine to a warm welcome my comments on those aspects of the Chancellor's Budget which relate to the DHSS.

Some Opposition Members have complained that the Chancellor has not introduced various increases in public expenditure. I remind them yet again of the increase of nearly £5 billion which the Chancellor introduced with the public expenditure White Paper in the autumn.

I could say much more, but I am conscious that there are at least two more hon. Members who wish to speak this evening. This has been a good Budget for business and for the individual. I believe that it will be modestly beneficial in creating jobs. I am certain it will be invaluable in securing existing jobs, especially those provided by small family companies such as my own.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): I can hardly be the Member for Newbury, with its famous racecourse, without wanting to say at least thank you to the Chancellor for removing the tax on on-course betting. I hope that it will encourage people to come to that racecourse and enjoy the pleasures of racing. That will be good not only for the racecourse but for Lambourn in my constituency, where so many excellent race horses are trained to such high standards.

There can be few Chancellors who have had the opportunity which was presented to the Chancellor this afternoon of being able to bring forward a Budget in which he could restore income to people's pockets without affecting the broad thrust of economic policy. The fact that the Chancellor has been able to do that speaks volumes for the effective way in which he has handled the economy.

I am particularly delighted that my right hon. Friend has been able to reduce the basic rate of income tax by 2p and raise tax thresholds. Pre-Budget speculation from all shades of political opinion in the House endorsed the assessment that the Chancellor brought into effect, namely, that he had sufficient revenue for a massive redistribution. The only question that arose—I suspect one inspired as much by electoral considerations as by reality—was whether he should use that redistribution to reduce the burden of tax or to increase public spending. In choosing to reduce the burden of tax I think that he made the right choice.

The argument that a tax cut will simply stoke up a consumer boom, which in turn will suck in increased imports, seems to miss the point of tax cuts. The country is heavily taxed, whether in terms of direct taxation, value added tax or through national insurance contributions. We know that in wage negotiations the effect of tax and the likely effect of inflation have been dominant considerations which have led unions, particularly those in the public sector, always to ask for large pay rises on the basis that inflation would erode them after a short time.

I suggest that a reduction in taxation will be what the Chancellor said it would be—a true incentive toward wage restraint. Lower direct tax will reduce the pressure for unreasonably high wage settlements, particularly in the public sector. By that I do not suggest for a moment that the public sector should not get reasonable wage increases. But we are now in a different atmosphere in which those negotiating public sector pay rises will be able to recognise that they should not have to allow for high inflation and the effect of high taxation, and that they can ask for more reasonable wage increases.

In those terms, I also welcome the tax inducement in the Chancellor's proposals for profit-related pay. Like the reduction in the basic rate of tax, that must assist our competitiveness if it encourages people to hold down wage claims. As competitiveness is one of the most important factors in employment, I disagree totally with the claim of the Leader of the Opposition that there is nothing in the Budget for the unemployed. We must take account of the seven years of steady growth in the economy and the recovery in the manufacturing sector of industry. It has still perhaps some way to go before it reaches the level that we want to see, but there has been recovery from a restructured industry. Those facts and the downward pressure of wage claims that will result from the Budget will help to keep industry competitive and thus enable us both to hold current markets and to gain new markets.

Who in the House would deny that if we can gain new markets for industry we can find new jobs for our people and real prosperity for the nation? If the Opposition tell us that that is not the case, what case would they choose to argue? I believe that this Budget is good for employment opportunities.

Those who say that a direct cut in income tax will simply stoke up a consumer boom are claiming that it will also therefore increase imports. I suggest that they are wrong. If they choose to come to my constituency they will discover that Sony has established a large factory, that Norsk Data has also a factory and that Bayer Pharmaceuticals from Germany has also set up in my constituency. That foreign inward investment has brought job opportunities that did not exist before. Those who say that an import boom is bound to follow from a cut in taxation are providing a counsel of despair. In effect, they are claiming that this country is no longer able to pick up the challenge from the new demand that will arise from the reduction of taxation. They are also arguing that companies brought into this country will somehow not continue to come in to meet that demand. Far from seeing an import boom, I believe that we will see a growth in more British business.

We have become a little obsessive about referring to all—British companies. That is an old-fashioned idea. We are members of the European Economic Community and we hope for a European industrial structure. I believe that international companies should be set up in this country and elsewhere. It is important that Britain's input to those companies in this country should consist of an input of people and skills. British companies should find opportunities to do likewise abroad. That is why I welcome the fact that our overseas assets are now at such a high level.

Another advantage of the Budget is that it finds time to consider other areas of our society that are in need. Reference has already been made to the changes to be made to charities to improve what they are able to receive from companies wishing to help. We know that hospices and the vehicles that they use are to be freed from VAT, as are hospice drugs for sick people. The old age allowance is to increase and the blind allowance is to be improved. All these measures—small though they may be—suggest that the Budget is more broadly based than one that simply seeks to concentrate on any one sector of the economy.

The tax cuts to which I have referred and the other benefits in the Budget must be seen against the autumn statement, in which a further £600 million was given to the National Health Service to bring total expenditure on the Health Service up to about £19 billion, which is rather more than twice the amount that the previous Labour Government spent on the service. The autumn statement also included a further £2 billion for the education service. That means that expenditure on education is at its highest ever level. The old-age pension today is buying more than it has ever bought in the history of our people.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: We must remember that inflation has been running at less than 5 per cent. for the past two years and looks like remaining at that level. We must therefore realise that the economy is being handled by the Government in a way that the nation has not seen for several decades—if ever. When I put all these facts together and think particularly——

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way now?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I think particularly of the reduction in taxation and lower inflation rates, and the effect, as I have said, will be that wage restraint will become a new reality for all those going forward with wage claims. As I have already said—but will repeat because it is so important — this nation can regain its competitiveness because of wage restraints. Because it will regain its competitiveness, we shall have a real opportunity to expand the economy in terms of extra trade, more jobs and more real prosperity, from which will come the additional money that we would all like to see go into certain sectors of the national social economy. As we know, unless this nation earns its living and has more than enough out of that living, it cannot expand what it spends and we shall not be able to have the real funds that need to go into the National Health Service, education or higher education.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

Ordered,

That the provisions of paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 84 (Constitution of standing committees), paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 86 (Nomination of standing committees) and Standing Order No. 101 (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.) shall apply to the draft Revised Code of Recommendations for the welfare of domestic fowls, the draft Code of Recommendations for the welfare of ducks, the draft Code of Recommendations for the welfare of rabbits and the draft Revised Code of Recommendations for the welfare of turkeys as if the said draft Revised Codes and draft Codes were draft statutory instruments; and that the said draft Revised Codes and draft Codes be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

Part III Accommodation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn,—[Mr. Lightbown.]

10 pm

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): One of the characteristics of life is that we all want to live as long as possible and to a ripe old age. However, I wonder whether everybody looks forward to his old age with the same equanimity. Some people, as they get older, are less able to look after themselves and finish up in what is called, in shorthand, part III accommodation. This is often regarded as accommodation where once people have gone in they never come out on their own two feet. Happily, today more and more people are able to live longer and sustain themselves in a much more healthy state than in the past. Consequently, not only are people in part III accommodation in there merely because they are seeing out their last days, but they can and should be able to enjoy themselves in their twilight years, although they are old, ill and frail.

My Adjournment debate was prompted when I had the privilege of visiting some part III accommodation in my constituency last November, on the occasion of the 100th birthday of one of the residents who, I am pleased to say, still enjoys a long daily walk and is still able to have a good and lucid conversation with all people who visit that establishment. I was delighted to see so many males in that accommodation. I am accustomed to finding the ladies outnumbering us by about 10:1.

This gentleman assailed me on one particular point, which I felt bound then, and I am delighted for the further opportunity now, to bring to general attention. It is that people in part III accommodation are forced into a form of pocket money penury because of the rules that dictate how much they are allowed to spend while resident in the accommodation. The amount of money is so small that it is not sufficient to allow the ambulant but old people in part III accommodation to go out, as they have done throughout their lives, at night, round to their local pub and sit there and enjoy a pint, and smoke their pipe and perhaps tell a few tales of what it was like when they were young.

It is odd that the total amount of money that the people who are resident in part III accommodation are allowed is £7·75 a week, unless they have worked hard all their lives and have an occupational pension to supplement it. They may have a war pension or an occupational injuries pension. If they have a pension that they have earned while they have been working, all of it except for £4 is taken from them, and they are allowed to supplement their £7·75 with the £4. If they have not earned that sort of pension, they are stuck on the £7·75 limit.

When the Minister replies, I should like her to support me in saying that that amount of their own money, which they have saved and worked for all their lives, should not be confiscated in that manner and that people in part III accommodation should be allowed sufficient to meet simple needs. I doubt whether, if they were given total licence, they would want to drink three, four or five pints of beer, to smoke two pipes at once or that the ladies would want to put on new make-up six or seven times a day. However, that is the limit that they are now allowed to spend.

I repeat that those old ladies and gentlemen are not prisoners. They have not been sent to part III accommodation because they have committed a crime, unless becoming old is regarded as a crime in itself. They are there because they need to be looked after. It is not unusual to find, among partners, who have lived together for many years and shared the household duties and chores that, when one passes on, the other one is incapable, of sustaining himself or herself properly when alone. Quite rightly, they are admitted to part III accommodation. However, when they are there they must not, and should not, feel that they have been sent there as if to serve out a sentence. They should not have their money reduced to the extent that they do not have sufficient for a modest extra standard of living in their latter days.

It would not seem unreasonable for the Government to review the amount of clawback so that the residual moneys that are left to the old people will enable them, if they wish, to buy a drink for someone else in the pub at night when they go out, or to buy another person a cup of tea at the café round the corner when they go out for a walk during the day. It does not seem unreasonable that that should be reviewed.

I put that point to the Ministry after my visit to the old people's home last November. I received a reply in February. I do not know whether it was hoped that my 100-year-old would have passed on by then, but I assure everybody that he is still hale and hearty and going out for a walk every day. I do not need to remind my colleagues and others who have followed these matters that one of my constituents will be going to New York, via Concorde, in August for her 110th birthday.

If people can live that long and enjoy life, why, just because they have had to go into part III accommodation, should they be regarded as second class and inferior? The pocket-money syndrome is distasteful and a further aspect of this issue which requires urgent consideration and action. Not only are those people penalised because they have worked and earned their own pension, or served in the forces and earned their own war pension, but if they have owned their own home and followed the Conservative party philosophy of thrift they are penalised over and again.

If such people have assets of £1,200 or more, which include their house which may still be unsold, they are penalised by having a notional return on their capital calculated at the rate of 25p per £50 per week. That works out at 26 per cent. Any usurer who charged 26 per cent. on capital would quickly find himself in hot water with the press and with public opinion. Yet that is what we charge people who have worked, saved and bought their home when they go into part III accommodation.

The residual assets may be a modest £15,000. We are talking not about a grand house but the sort of house that many of my constituents live in. In practice, a house valued at £15,000 would be reduced in the first year by £3,600, in the second year by £2,600, in the third year by £2,000 and so on until no value remains. What is the point of encouraging people to become home owners, to live a family life and have something to pass on, if all their savings are likely to be swallowed up in their latter years simply because they become old and frail?

Every Government since part III accommodation was introduced have known about this position and every Government have tut-tutted and said, "We should do something about it, but, oh dear, what?" When the disregard figure is £1 from an occupational pension and everything else goes towards the cost of being kept, the position requires review. The majority who have done nothing for themselves and, equally, find themselves in part III accommodation are sustained in full by the state. The number of those who are penalised in this way is small. They are a minority who seldom grumble or have their legitimate grievances aired sufficiently or brought to light.

I noted two specific points in the letter of reply from my hon. Friend the Minister in February. First, the Government have set up a joint working party. As we all know, that is shorthand for saying, "This is a hell of a problem, so we have kicked it into touch and, having done so, we hope to God that no one will ask us to find the ball." The answer I am given is that the Government hope to have some sort of answer to harmonise fiscal support and people in all sorts of residential care in the spring of 1987.

The working party first met in March 1986. I cannot understand how grown men and women, presumably with some intelligence because they have been put on the working party, must take so long to reach a simple conclusion about whether £1 is a reasonable figure in this day and age. I do not know of any law which forbids an interim report or prevents the Government from introducing the recommendations of an interim report. But I know that this matter leaves a sour taste in my mouth. Some of these elderly people, for no reason, are finding that all they have lived and worked for is being eroded, while those who have not bothered to look after themselves, to save, to enter into a pension scheme or take out some personal pension plan and who share the same accommodation are in a different position.

It is equally difficult to understand why the Government have different figures for people in part III accommodation provided by local authorities and for those who live in private residential homes in the private sector. Why should somebody in the private sector be allowed more pocket money than somebody who is not? If they go out together and have a drink, the landlord does not say, "I will charge you more and you less." He charges the same amount of money.

Secondly, I was rather disturbed—indeed, offended—by one aspect of the communication that I received, which says:

"But even if the discretion is not exercised"— that is a discretion for the local authority to supplement the personal allowance out of the rates—

"there is nothing to prevent residents from supplementing their allowance from any capital they may possess."

I read that as meaning that if I am old the Government are saying that I may spend my money if I so wish. I hope to goodness that I am entitled to spend my own money. I should like to think that everybody is entitled to spend his own money if he so wishes. None of us should be hidebound by what was introduced in 1948. That was something to be euphoric about in the welfare days of 40 years ago, but it is time now for a review. It is not a time for the Government to hide behind working parties. It is time to recognise that the cost of living has risen considerably over 40 years. To suggest that we still do not make any special recognition of those who enjoy war pensions—in which I must declare an interest—is an insult to those who have obtained a war pension as a consequence of their service to their country.

The eyes in the House tonight may not be many, but the ears of the world will be listening for the Government to say that they have taken on board this anomaly; that they recognise the injustice and unfairness of the present situation; that to grow old is not a crime and to save money to spend in old age should not be something for which we should be penalised; that in the end there will be equal treatment of all people, and if one has saved money one will not suffer consequently.

Information that I have received suggests that the major weakness in the existing scheme is that the person who is in the know can divest himself of the greater part of his fortune, and will hence be obliged to pay only the minimum. That is not the proper way of going about things. I shall listen with interest to hear how the Government will tackle this problem.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I should like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) on his success in the ballot. I know how much he cares for the welfare of his constituents, as has been shown by his efforts in the debate.

As my hon. Friend rightly says, he wrote to us on 12 November. I am delighted to hear that his constituent is still in good health. Indeed, his constituent will have benefited from today's Budget, with the increase in tax allowances for the over-80s, and the excise duty on his favourite tipple remaining unchanged. Indeed, one suspects that my hon. Friend's constituents' children will have benefited from the increase in tax allowances for the over-80s as well. We are glad about that.

The overall aim of our community care policy is to enable elderly people to remain in the community, preferably in their own homes, for as long as possible. That is what they want and what those who are responsible for their care think is best for them. However, there will always be some people who are unable to live independently, even with help, and for them residential care in an elderly persons' home may be the only alternative.

Local authorities are responsible for providing residential care for any elderly person who, because of age, frailty or any other circumstance, is assessed as being in need of such care. The financial circumstances of the individual therefore do not come into it.

The number of homes and places provided by an authority is a matter for the authority. The number of people now resident in homes for the elderly who are aged 65 years or over has been rising quite dramatically. The provisional figures for 1986 suggest that the total has topped 200,000 for the first time, about 101,000 being in local authority part III homes, about 25,000 in voluntary homes and about 75,000 in private homes.

The provision of residential accommodation by local authorities was never intended to relieve people of responsibility for meeting the costs of their accommodation and upkeep, which they would have to bear if they were living in their own homes. It seems only reasonable that anyone who is able to make a substantial contribution towards the cost of his upkeep should do so. Successive Governments have supported this arrangement, which I am sure is right. Whether current arrangements for calculating how much someone should pay are fair is another matter. It is a number of years now since the details of the scheme were revised.

Local authorities are required to determine a "standard charge" for thier accommodation, which should represent the full economic cost. The average cost of a part III place in England is about £120 per week, compared with the current board-and-lodging limit in private homes of £125 per week. If a resident is unable to pay the standard charge, the authority is obliged to assess the amount that he is able to pay and to charge at such lower rate accordingly subject to a prescribed minimum, which is currently £30·95 per week and which is to be increased to £31·60 from 6 April. The resident retains a prescribed minimum allowance for personal expenses, which is currently £7.75 and which will be increased to £7·90 from 6 April.

My hon. Friend has referred to the working party, and we are trying to devise a new charging and assessment system for part III accommodation that might take account of some of the difficulties that he has mentioned. A consultative document was issued early in 1984, and the response to its proposals could not be regarded as enthusiastic. Further action was deferred pending consideration of the use of public funds to support people in all types of residential care. That is what is currently in the hands of the joint central Government and local government working party, which is chaired by our official, Mrs. Joan Firth, and which is due to report shortly. It is not known how many residents pay at the prescribed minimum rate for their accommodation but we estimate that about 70 per cent. do so. About 20 per cent. pay a rate between the prescribed minimum and the standard charge and 5 per cent. pay the full charge.

My hon. Friend referred to disregards and picked up some of them, as I would expect, with his normal accuracy. A local authority's assessment involves a calculation of income and capital resources based on the method used until 1980 for assessing eligibility for supplementary benefit. The method is set out in part III of schedule 1 to the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976. Certain limited forms of income—for example, payments to holders of the Victoria Cross or George Cross—are disregarded in full, as well as, at the authority's discretion, other forms of income such as gallantry and service awards.

In addition, charitable and voluntary sums for a specific purpose, such as payments for holidays, can be disregarded. Other forms of income, such as war disablement pensions, are disregarded up to an aggregate limit of £4. This rule is in line with current supplementary benefit provision. Under the income support scheme, most forms of income will be taken into account in full. Additionally, there is a £4 disregard from any weekly earnings, but the number of residents affected by this is likely to be exceedingly small.

My hon. Friend is right to say that occupational pensions are now taken fully into account. They are no different from other basic forms of income, such as the state retirement pension, which has always been taken fully into account. For part III assessment purposes, the £1 disregard which was set in 1966 is still allowed.

When dealing with capital, my hon. Friend was right to say that the first £1,200 of a resident's capital is disregarded. The tariff income is assessed at 25p per week for each complete £50 of capital above that level. That means that the assessed ability to pay rises gradually and does not reach payment of the full cost of a place in a home until a substantial amount of capital—about £25,000 depending on other resources—is held.

It is recognised that residents will gradually use up their capital above £1,200 to pay towards their accommodation. Of all the concerns expressed about the part III charging arrangements, the treatment of capital has attracted the most criticism. That is principally because of the higher capital disregard—£3,000—that applies to supplementary benefit claimants. This has been represented to us as anomalous and unfair and it is one of the key issues that is being addressed by the working party to which I have referred.

The personal allowance is intended to enable residents to buy personal items such as toiletries, stationery, newspapers and other personal items. The prescribed minimum rate that has been set by successive Governments is about one fifth of the standard rate of retirement pension.

The hospital downrating of national insurance benefits reflects the fact that for long-term patients in hospital their board and lodging is provided free and their needs will normally be limited to the personal items such as I have mentioned. People in part III accommodation are essentially in no different position in that their accommodation and upkeep—if they were at home they would have to pay for themselves—is provided by the local authority. In the case of people in hospital and part III accommodation, it is not expected that the allowance should be spent on expensive items such as clothing and footwear, as those should be provided by the local authority or hospital. Of course, residents are free to choose to spend their allowance in this way if they wish.

The average age of permanent admission residents to part III accommodation is about 82 years. Many residents are unable to make much use of their personal allowance.

In many cases, that allowance simply accrues and eventually forms part of the resident's estate. One must consider whether an increase across the board would produce any major increase or improvement in welfare.

We accept that part III residents may occasionally find it difficult to meet the cost of outside social activities. That could be equally applied to anyone remaining in their home in the community on a low income. The personal allowance of people in private residential care—my hon. Friend drew attention to this — and who may be supported by supplementary benefit is £9·05. That is intended to cover any item of personal expenditure, but it includes clothing. That is the reason for the difference.

With regard to the particular interest of my hon. Friend's constituent, I checked up in the 1985 family expenditure survey and I discovered that in households with a couple or one pensioner living alone, the average expenditure on alcohol and tobacco was 5 per cent. of income—£5·80. That suggests that the £11·75 that my hon. Friend's constituent has been able to enjoy should cover at least the expenditure that one might expect if he were living at home. It is to be hoped that the gentleman's generosity and sociability is also recognised by those he meets and that they are able to buy him a round in return for those he buys.

My hon. Friend spoke movingly about the problems that can arise. I wonder how much resentment might be generated should any Government decide to ignore large amounts of capital income and whether those without such benefit, savings and foresight — and perhaps, without such fortune—might regard that as fair. The home costs the same to run whether the residents are wealthy or have nothing. Admission to part III homes is based on the need of that person for physical help and not his financial circumstances.

I hope that I have been able to answer a number of the queries raised by my hon. Friend. Many representations have been made to us on those matters. They are under consideration and we hope that we may see some improvement soon.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-eight minutes past Ten o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Falklands Fisheries

1. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many fishing vessels have been boarded by fisheries protection personnel in the Falkland Islands conservation zone since 1 February; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): Seventy-four fishing vessels have been boarded by fisheries protection personnel in the Falkland Islands interim conservation and management zone between 1 February and 12 March 1987.

Mr. Cook: Does the Secretary of State agree that although fishery protection is important to the Falkland Islands economy, the broader issue of conservation is even more important for ecology? Does he agree that one should avoid the over-fishing that has taken place in the north Atlantic and resulted in the migration of seals to the Norwegian inshore fishing grounds? Are the current licensing system and the protection that is afforded sufficient to take regard of that, and will the right hon. and learned Gentleman sponsor a form of international symposium to ensure that the Falkland Islands get the best possible advice on the subject?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support for what we are doing. The fishery protection arrangements were established precisely to meet the conservation case that he has put. It is a matter of satisfaction to him and the House that the system is working as well as it is. Obviously, we would like to see that extended into a multilateral basis, and that is why we started our initial search for arrangements through the Food and Agriculture Organisation and would still be ready, if we could, to move to multilateral arrangements.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall the whingeing, cringing predictions of international conflict and disaster by the Opposition Front Bench when the zone was first introduced? Has the zone not been fully justified and has not the Government's policy earned the thanks of the Falkland Islanders and the British people?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding the House of that. There were, indeed, doom-laden predictions from the Opposition Benches, supported by the now benignly smiling hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on the Opposition Front Bench. Again, it must be a matter of satisfaction to the House that the arrangements have been put in place and have worked as smoothly and well as they have done.

Dr. Godman: May I say that I have the greatest admiration for the skippers and crews of the elderly stern trawlers which are carrying out the police work? However, what consideration has been given to the replacement of those elderly vessels by, for example, two newly constructed fisheries replacement vessels of the sort built by Fergusons, which just happens to be in my constituency?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I understand the hon. Gentleman's interest in that aspect of the matter. The main thing is that the vessels and aircraft selected for the task have been able to carry it out effectively, entirely in line with the normal pattern of fisheries promotion, with the granting of 100 licences to 50 vessels so far and a substantial revenue accruing to the system. No doubt the question of prolongation of the life or substitution of the vessels will be borne in mind by those responsible.

Mr. Foulkes: I am sorry to see the Secretary of State following his Back Benchers in jumping so prematurely to conclusions after only a few months' operation of the zone. As the Government have always said that the unilateral zone is a temporary measure, when does the right hon. and learned Gentleman expect the United States-inspired contacts between Britain and Argentina —I know that I must not call them talks—to result in a bilateral or, better, a multilateral agreement, which is the way in which any two civilised Western democratic countries ought to be concluding an agreement, instead of what is still a nerve-racking and tense arrangement that could flare up at any time?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman lives in lively expectation of that event, if only to fulfil his doom-laden forecast. I am not suggesting that he would like it for the sake of warlikeness. On experience so far, he has been shown to have made some extremely foolish and ill-founded predictions. Of course it is right to say that we want a multilateral rather than a unilateral arrangement. It is precisely that that we are seeking. It is on that basis that ideas are being exchanged. There is no secret about that. We are now awaiting a response to the ideas that we have put forward. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, with his care for arriving at a sensible conclusion, will recognise that here particularly it is most important to follow a step-by-step approach if we are to ensure the establishment of a proper basis of understanding.

Arms Control Talks

2. Mr. Cook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress at the arms control negotiations in Geneva.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The seventh round of the Geneva nuclear and space talks has been extended to allow further discussion of the United States draft INF treaty tabled on 4 March. The chemical weapons negotiations resumed on 3 February. We hope that it will be possible to build on the encouraging progress made last year.

Mr. Cash: Has my right hon. and learned Friend noted the desperate Houdini tactics being adopted by the Leader of the Opposition in a vain attempt to satisfy the negotiators at Geneva and the voters of this country that his party is no longer unilateralist? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it proves that the firm defence policy that is being followed by the Government will produce effective, verifiable progress towards genuine disarmament?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Like my hon. Friend, I am driven to speculate about the implications of reports in today's press about shifts in the position of the leader of the Labour party, suggesting that the Opposition are moving towards support for a zero-zero position. If indeed that is happening, one must, however belatedly, welcome the Opposition's attempt to evade the consequences of their previous disastrous policy. The logic of the Opposition's position of one-sided disarmament would be to speed up the removal of cruise missiles to encourage Mr. Gorbachev to remove the SS20s. The recognition, if it be the case, of the wisdom of keeping cruise missiles in this country to achieve success in the negotiations reveals the foolishness of the whole unilateralist approach.

Mr. Cartwright: Have Her Majesty's Government been consulted about the suggestion that American Pershing 2 missiles, which will be covered by the INF agreement, might not be removed but converted into shorter range systems? Since anything that can be converted can be reconverted, what are the implications for the difficult verification issues arising out of the agreement?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is because of the importance of the verification issues that the verification provisions in the draft treaty are themselves so important. It is because of the scope for variation in the capacity of the SS21s and the SS22s on the Soviet side that it is so important to achieve proper constraints on shorter range intermediate nuclear weapons. Among the constraints, the right to match, as well as everything else, has always been open to consideration.

Sir Antony Buck: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, put in succinct terms, there would be no progress in the various talks if the Opposition's policies on these matters were to be pursued? None the less, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that progress in the various negotiations is disappointingly slow? Is there no chance, perhaps with the help of our American allies, of being even more firm about these matters and getting the processes somewhat speeded up?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I can understand my hon. and learned Friend's impatience for quick headway in the matter. He must acknowledge that, in matters of such complexity where verification and constraints on shorter range intermediate nuclear weapons are of crucial importance, it is far more important to be right than to be speedy.

Mrs. Clwyd: Will the Home Secretary explain why the Government have changed their mind on the zero-zero option by now wanting an agreement on short-range nuclear weapons while reaching an agreement on the INF instead of in subsequent negotiations, as was the Government's position between 1981 and 1986?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There has been no change in the Government's position. If one looks back at the statements in the series of communiqués, one sees that it has always been regarded as important to secure proper constraints on the shorter-range intermediate nuclear weapons as part of the initial agreement, and, beyond that, to secure a commitment to a further round of negotiations for the rest.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Although there is now, fortunately, real hope of progress with regard to the INF and chemical weapons, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is equally, if not far more, important that we should reach some sort of accommodation over strategic weapons? Does he further agree that such an accommodation will be very difficult to achieve until there is some understanding with the Soviet Union on the testing and deployment of the SDI?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As the prospect of agreement on strategic weapons was one of the components that was endorsed by NATO at its two ministerial meetings at the end of last year, as well as at Camp David, it is clear that we should like there to be headway on strategic weapons. That may be easier to achieve if there is proper understanding of the way in which the ABM treaty is to be observed by both sides.

Mr. George Robertson: Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that the draft treaty on intermediate missiles that has been tabled by the United States at Geneva does not endorse the Prime Minister's line that catching up with Soviet short range superiority is a pre-condition for an agreement? Why is it that when this condition was not part of NATO's zero option offer in 1983 it is now so important and might easily obstruct a historic agreement that would get rid of both the SS20s and the cruise and Pershing missiles in Europe? Why does our Prime Minister, every time that there is a significant concession from the Soviet Union and the chance of a break through in arms control, insist on inventing some spurious objection to it and on moving the goal posts?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is doing his best with a profoundly bad brief. There is absolutely no validity in the points that he makes. From the moment that the zero-zero option was put forward in 1981 it was always accompanied by the suggestion that constraints on shorter-range intermediate weapons were necessary and part of it. As I have already said this afternoon, that position was clearly set out in the Defence Ministers' and the Foreign Ministers' communiqués of December 1986. We need to have constraints on the SRINF systems, which are capable of targeting western Europe, and those constraints need to be incorporated in any INF agreement on zero-zero. Thereafter, further negotiations must address urgently the substantial imbalance that currently exists in the SRINF.

Postal Communications

3. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom delegation to the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe review conference in Vienna will raise the subject of the free movement of postal communications between the United Kingdom and countries in eastern Europe; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): Our delegation has already raised this issue in debate on a number of occasions. With other Western countries, we have tabled a proposal aimed at ensuring freedom of transit of postal communications.

Mr. Sumberg: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's reply, but does he not agree that the Soviet record in these matters is a yardstick by which its general commitment to human rights should be judged? Will my hon. Friend advise our partners in Europe and at the Vienna conference that no agreement should be reached with the Soviets until the subject of the free movement of postal communications can be sorted out?

Mr. Renton: My hon. Friend is right when he says that freedom of postal communications is one area where we should be watching carefully porgress on the Soviet side. That is inherent in the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, and we shall be pressing the Soviets continually on that point.

Mr. David Atkinson: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of the recently released Soviet dissidents have returned home in very bad health, but that Soviet law currently prevents the mailing of medical supplies to them from the West? Will he take up this matter in Vienna and also when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister goes to Moscow?

Mr. Renton: I thank my hon. Friend for drawing our attention to that matter. I shall certainly ask our delegation in Vienna to raise it with the Soviets. When my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary go to Moscow at the end of next week, I have no doubt that human rights abuses will be high on their list of priorities. It is one matter that I shall see is in their brief as well.

EC Budget

4. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the EEC Council of Foreign Ministers last discussed the 1987 budget.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Foreign Affairs Council last discussed the 1987 budget on 26 January.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the European Community will spend about £3 billion more than its permitted revenue this year, and that the Commission's reaction to that is to try to switch to a more generous revenue system so that the budget can continue its upward path? Will my right hon. and learned Friend undertake to veto any such scheme? Will he bring to the European budget the prudence and financial rectitude for which he was famous when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I acknowledge with gratitude the tribute from my hon. Friend. He is right to remind the House of the continuing problems of securing effective control over the Community budget. He will know that our position with regard to any possible increase in resources rests absolutely on the Fontainebleau agreement, which provides that the maximum rate may be increased to 1·6 per cent. on 1 January next year, by unanimous decision of the Council and after agreement by national Parliaments. I emphasise the word may, not shall. We stand by the letter of that agreement. We see no case for going beyond it. We intend to achieve control over the budget that is as effective as my hon. Friend would like.

Sir Russell Johnston: When will the Delors proposals that budgetary contributions be based on national GNPs be discussed by the Council, and what is the Government's initial response to them?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Delors proposals are now under consideration by permanent representatives, having received preliminary discussion by Ministers. The Foreign Affairs Council will have its first discussion of the Commission's proposals on 27 and 28 April, on the basis of which there will be a report to the European Council. However, our position is as I have stated it. We stand by the letter of the Fontainebleau agreement, as I have just described it.

Mr. Durrell: Is it not a distortion to say that the main responsibility for Community budgetary discipline rests with the Commission? Does not the main responsibility for the problem rest with the Council of Ministers in its various guises being unwilling to impose upon itself a proper set of budgetary priorities? Is it not the case that we are unlikely to produce a permanent solution until we tackle that institutional aspect of the problem?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I wish that it was as easy as something that could be solved by reshuffling the institutional responsibilities. The basic reason for the extreme difficulty in securing control over Community expenditure on agriculture is the same as the reason for achieving similar discipline in the United States, Japan and most other industrial countries — the problem of protecting the health of rural communities in a fashion that is compatible with the cash resources that are available. I am afraid that it will be a matter for the whole House, just as for the whole European Parliament and all those engaged in institutions, to seek further and better ways of protecting the rural environment that do not depend upon the production of food surpluses that cannot be sold and can be stored only at great expense.

Mr. Deakins: Is the Foreign Secretary satisfied, and is the Council satisfied, that the revenue side of the budget agreed by the Council recently will be adequate to produce the revenue needed in 1987? If not, do he and the Council favour a supplementary budget or a new intergovernmental agreement?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have made it clear in the discussions that have taken place so far that we shall not provide additional finance outside the own resources system.

Mr. Forth: Does my right hon. and learned Friend mean by what he has just said that he sticks by the triumph of the Fontainebleau agreement, with its commitment to strict budgetary discipline, and that he is not prepared to support any form of intergovernmental agreement or any other form of financing that goes outside the budget as defined and as limited by the Fontainebleau agreement?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I said in my earlier reply that we shall not provide additional finance outside the own resources system. There is scope for savings in the agricultural price fixing. There is also some headroom in the 1·4 per cent. ceiling. Of course, there is scope for consideration, under the Fontainebleau agreement and subject to the requirement of unanimity, of the possible increase provided for there.

Mr. George Robertson: The Foreign Secretary has come to the House before and told us all this. It is all very well his saying that he will stick to the Fontainebleau agreement, but the Community is already working at 1·6 per cent. of VAT and its accumulated liabilities now total £12 billion. If the Government were to reject the Delors package, which would put the price tag up to 2·1 per cent. of VAT, what would happen then? Even these proposals provide for an increase in CAP of 2·5 per cent. a year. Why is there such a silence from the Government about this very important crisis affecting the Community? We have had no debate, no statements from the Finance Ministers Councils, nothing except a lot of dithering. How is the circle to be squared? Where will the extra mony come from to fill the huge hole that exists in the Community's finances?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman should really know better than to make that kind of observation. He should know perfectly well that we have put in place the budgetary discipline arrangements of the Fontainebleau agreement. They are fortified and sustained by the specific limitations of the own resources system. The limits of the room for manoeuvre are as described, with the possibility —and I emphasise the word possibility—of a 1·6 per cent. ceiling with the unanimous agreement of all member states. It is a matter of may, not must. We are entitled to look to the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) for his support for the range of extremely difficult measures that are likely to be necessary if we are to secure effective control of the financing of agricultural policies.

Mr. Speaker: Dr. Blackburn. I am sorry, I meant to call Mr. Willie Hamilton. That was my mistake. I was listening to something else.

Brazil

5. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications for diplomatic relations between the United Kingdom and Brazil of that country's decision to suspend interest payments on its overseas debts; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): I am delighted to have the opportunity to answer the question. Although we have made clear to the Brazilian Government our regret at their decision, this has not affected our generally good relations. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office is visiting Brazil this week and will no doubt discuss this subject.

Mr. Hamilton: Does the Foreign Office still accept the opinion that the Under-Secretary expressed in the House a week or two ago that the solution to the problem can be found only by accepting IMF conditions? That would quite clearly be impossible for the very poor people in that country. Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that the poverty of these countries is as big a threat to world peace as any nuclear weapon? Unless the problems are solved, principally, I believe, by the commercial banks accepting lower rates of interest rather than having unacceptable conditions imposed by the IMF, the problem will never be solved. What proposals will the Minister take from banks in this country when she visits Brazil later this week?

Mr. Eggar: We very much regret the decision to suspend payment of interest on commercial debt. However, debt negotiations are a matter for the Brazilian Government to discuss directly with commercial bank creditors. It is not for Her Majesty's Government to interfere, although we obviously hope that negotiations can begin very soon.

Mr. Sayeed: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way to decrease the debt burden and increase the ability of countries such as Brazil to pay is for the West to reduce interest levels? That will occur only when they have prudently run economies.

Mr. Eggar: I very much agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister confirm that these are strictly commercial loans between British banks and foreign agencies and Governments? Will he give an undertaking to the House that in the event of there being a major default by one of these countries it will be up to the British banks to bear the consequences?

Mr. Eggar: I gladly confirm to the hon. Gentleman that the debts that we are talking about are almost overwhelmingly commercial debts between commercial banks of Western countries and Brazil.

Sir Russell Johnston: Does the Minister agree that unless there is a major initiative by the West on these matters, perhaps based on reducing interest rates and rescheduling debts, we shall face the unpalatable alternative of even more people defaulting, following the example of Brazil and now Ecuador?

Mr. Eggar: The situation in Ecuador is slightly different, as there has been a significant natural disaster there. It is impossible to have a general prescription on this as it is a matter for discussion between the countries involved and those who hold their debts. There are a number of possible solutions and each must be considered on an ad hoc basis.

Soviet Union (Human Rights)

6. Dr. Blackburn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is satisfied with the Soviet response to representations made by the United Kingdom delegation at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe review conference in Vienna on the subject of human rights and freedom of religious rights.

Mr. Renton: No, Sir. Our delegation has vigorously raised human rights issues, including freedom of religious rights, at Vienna. We still await satisfactory answers to many of our questions, particularly from the Soviet delegation.

Dr. Blackburn: Will my hon. Friend note that there is considerable support in all parts of the House and throughout the country for the British delegation to stress the abhorrence in this country at the restriction of human and religious rights, both Jewish and Christian, in the Soviet Union? Will he give an assurance that action will be taken on these very important issues?

Mr. Renton: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. It is important to ensure that the spotlight is focused not just on the hundreds who may be obtaining release but on the thousands still suffering either for their Christian beliefs or because, as Soviet Jews, they cannot obtain exit visas. The Vienna conference provides an opportunity, and our delegation will continue to stress this.

Mr. Janner: I thank the Government for their approach to this issue. Does the Minister agree that the release, however welcome, of people such as Josef Begun, Slepak and Ida Nudel from prison or exile is not enough and that they must also be released from the Soviet Union, even if Members of this House and their spouses are not allowed into the Soviet Union? May we expect the Prime Minister to protest about both matters when she is in Moscow?

Mr. Renton: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for his support. I note that he has a later question——

Mr. Janner: It will not be reached.

Mr. Renton: I hope that it will be reached. That question relates to the lack of entry visas for some parliamentary colleagues to go to Moscow, which I very much regret. I have no doubt at all that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will have the whole question of human rights and the points raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman very much in mind when they visit Moscow at the end of next week.

Mr. Cormack: Does my hon. Friend accept that his last remarks will be very reassuring to most people? Will he ask our right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to stress to Mr. Gorbachev that if he is to create an atmosphere of international trust which could be the basis for real progress in disarmament talks it is essential that proper freedoms are granted in his own territories and that Jews and Christians are allowed to worship in peace and freedom?

Mr. Renton: I am sure that the whole House agrees with my hon. Friend. It is a matter not just of securing the release of the famous few but of ensuring true and proper freedoms for the obscure many. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will have that in mind next week.

Mr. Anderson: Does the Minister agree that although we should continue to ensure that the Soviets pay a very heavy political price for their failure to release the 1,500 and more Christians who are in prison simply because of their religious activities, it would be wise at the same time to give some credit for the progress and positive signals since December and the release of Sakharov from internal exile? Does the Minister agree that in this, as in other matters, we should have a twin-track policy?

Mr. Renton: Yes, I think that the hon. Gentleman has a fair point. We are cautious about the developments that have taken place in the Soviet Union, but we are certainly ready to put Mr. Gorbachev's comments and promises to the test. The real issue is that glasnost should apply not just to some but to all. Only then will we be convinced that there is fundamental change in the Soviet Union.

Turks and Caicos Islands

7. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to be able to set a date for elections for a new administration in the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Mr. Eggar: We are studying the report of the Turks and Caicos Islands constitutional commission and its recommendations. On present plans, we hope to publish the report and our response towards the end of April.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that there is considerable concern over the delay that has followed the announcement of 25 July, that everyone hopes that the timetable that the Minister has now given is adhered to, and that democracy is restored to the islands as soon as possible?

Mr. Eggar: I very much appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point, and I also appreciate the constructive attitude taken by the Labour Front Bench. We are well aware of the pressures referred to by the hon. Gentleman, and we are doing our best to reach a decision and make the necessary publication by the date in question.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Does the Minister agree that our experience in the Turks and Caicos Islands brings into question the perceived wisdom of automatically allowing independence to small islands and other small dependencies?

Mr. Eggar: As my hon. Friend is aware, a review of our policy on dependent territories is taking place, and we have his point very much in mind.

Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces

8. Mr. Lester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement on the intermediate range nuclear forces negotiations.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) earlier this afternoon, the seventh round of the Geneva nuclear and space talks has been extended to allow further discussion of the United States draft INF treaty tabled on 4 March. Our aim remains the conclusion of a global longer range intermediate nuclear forces agreement based on zero-zero missiles in Europe and incorporating constraints on Soviet missiles in Asia and on certain shorter range intermediate nuclear forces in Europe. Effective verification will be a vital part of the agreement.

Mr. Lester: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for his reply. As he knows, during the recent visit of the Soviet delegation to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee Professor Zaglndin suggested that we might jointly pursue the concept of adequate defence rather than that of mutually assured destruction. Has my right hon. and learned Friend done any work on that subject?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That question raises massively wide issues beyond which it is difficult to go. We cannot escape from the conclusion that for the foreseeable future the nuclear component will be an effective and essential part of our deterrent defensive policy, and any changes must be calculated to enhance rather than undercut the effectiveness of that defence.

Dr. Owen: In his welcome speech in Brussels the Foreign Secretary asked us to look beyond the INF agreement to the strengthening of the WEU. Why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman find it necessary to imply that the WEU headquarters should move close to NATO in Brussels, apart from the fact that he was speaking in Brussels?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman also tell us whether he wants Spain to become a member of, and a signatory to, the treaty and join the union? Is he worried that an expansion of the membership might detract from the capacity to discuss nuclear strategic questions, and in particular from the importance of using the framework for increased Anglo-French strategic nuclear co-operation?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The suggestion of possible co-location in Brussels was prompted, not by the fact that I happened to be speaking in that city, but by a fact that has not escaped the perceptive intelligence of the right hon. Gentleman, namely, that the NATO headquarters are in Brussels. To have part of an organisation's institution in Paris and another part in London is not necessarily the best way of ensuring that it contributes effectively to the dynamic of the Alliance. No doubt many people will disagree with the suggestion, but it is worth considering.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the membership of Spain and other possible applicant countries. As I said in my speech on Monday, it is most important that any expansion of membership should contribute to the cohesion and effectiveness of the WEU, which is why it is important for the WEU's existing members to be clear about their purpose and intention. I do not think that if any prudent alteration in the membership took place, it should affect the prospect of the necessary increasing consultation between Europe's two nuclear powers, the two permanent members of the Security Council, France and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Whitney: In response to an earlier question my right hon. and learned Friend referred to the need for a proper understanding between the two signatories to the ABM treaty. Can he confirm that article 13 of that treaty established a consultative committee precisely to consider questions of interpretation and that, as a result of those arrangements, that committee meets twice every year? Can he tell the House whether he has any information about disputes relating to the interpretation of that treaty, the so-called broad or narrow definition, having been raised in the consultative committee?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend, with his long experience and knowledge of such matters, is quite right to draw attention to the existence of the consultative committee and to the fact that it meets to consider matters within its terms of reference. However, it is equally clear that it has not been able to resolve all the matters currently under discussion. The question of any possible change as between broad and narrow in the application of the treaty would go beyond the scope of that consultative committee.

Mr. Freeson: Returning to the original supplementary question asked by the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester), will the Foreign Secretary express a view as to whether the existence of about 50,000 nuclear warheads throughout the world is adequate for security, or do we need more?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I repeat the view that I expressed in Brussels on Monday, and which I have expressed on many other occasions. There is a super-abundance, far beyond any necessity, of nuclear warheads on both sides of the European divide. That is one of several good reasons for seeking to achieve progress in arms control, including the reductions that could be made possible if we secure the present INF agreement.

Mr. Hickmet: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, in negotiations with the Soviet Union on arms reductions, consistency of purpose and firmness of resolve are essential? Does he further agree that if we were unilaterally to abandon our independent nuclear deterrent or require the United States to remove cruise from Europe, we would have a position of instability in Europe and fundamentally undermine those arms negotiations? Is not the lesson that if one gives anything to the USSR, one gets nothing in return?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is quite clear that the prospect of progress in the INF agreement and in the negotiations that may now be before us is a consequence of the coherence and firmness of the Western Alliance and not of our willingness to embark on unilateral disarmament.

Soviet Union (Human Rights)

11. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will seek opportunities to raise the question of the reunification of divided families both with the Soviet Foreign Minister and at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe review conference in Vienna.

13. Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any official response from the Soviet authorities to representations which he and his ministerial colleagues have made during the past six months on individual cases of abuse of human rights in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Renton: There has been no official response. But a number of cases that we have raised over the past six months have now been resolved, for example, those of Irina Ratushinskaya, Josef Begun and Alexander Ogorodnikov, who are now at liberty. We shall continue to press for further improvements in human rights and family reunification cases in bilateral contacts with the Soviet Government and at the Vienna CSCE review meeting.

Mr. McKay: Bearing in mind that there are more than 9,000 Soviet Jews who have been waiting for more than five years for permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union, will the Foreign Secretary advise the Prime Minister that, when she meets Mr. Gorbachev, she should make it clear to him that Her Majesty's Government will not be satisfied until all those Soviet Jews who wish to emigrate to other countries are allowed to do so?

Mr. Renton: I very much take the hon. Gentleman's point. When I was in Moscow in January I was promised by Mr. Kashlev, the head of the Russian delegation in Vienna, that the number of exit visas this year would increase by an order of several magnitudes from that of last year. However, so far I notice that for February there have only been 146 exit visas for Soviet Jews, compared with more than 4,000 per month in 1979. Therefore, I am sure that my right hon. Friends will have the hon. Gentleman's point in mind when they go to Moscow next week.

Mr. Lawrence: May I, too, thank my hon. Friend for the work that he is doing in this area? May I ask him, when he next meets the Russians, to tell them that, happy as we are that they are ending their abuse of human rights in respect of a few individual cases, they cannot persuade the West that they are serious about their undertakings on peace and security which have been entered into internationally if they are breaking wholesale their international undertakings on human rights? Will he also say that, instead of doing a bit here and there to keep the West sweet, they should honour those international undertakings to the full?

Mr. Renton: I very much agree with my hon. and learned Friend. As I have said, we must now think not only about the famous few who are in the spotlight, but about the thousands who are either still in prison as prisoners of conscience for their beliefs or who have been waiting 10 or 15 years for an exit visa. My right hon. Friends will certainly have those points in mind next week.

Mr. Mikardo: While I join warmly in the appreciation expressed to the Government for their work and the work of others in this area, may I ask the Minister whether it is not the case that, in making representations in Moscow about the crime of keeping families divided, our hand would be strengthened if we stopped keeping some families divided?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman's analogy is somewhat obscure to me, but I thank him for the tribute that he paid. It is important that we should continue to put pressure on the Soviet Union over the whole area of human rights and to make certain that the promises that are now being made from the top are genuinely fulfilled to help the human rights position of the many thousands who are still suffering in Soviet Russia.

Mr. Dykes: May I, too, express appreciation for the many hours of work that my hon. Friend has put in on human rights and divided families with the Soviets? Is he aware that the fourth Member of Parliament who was recently refused a visa, namely, me, was refused on the day when a Soviet fireman was here receiving honours for his work at Chernobyl? Will he confirm that Soviet visitors, including political visitors, are free to come here on individual or official visits and that they do so frequently? Will he kindly explain to Mr. Zamyatin that the crucial difference on the divided family syndrome is that our problems arise because people want to come into the country, whereas in the Soviet Union people want to leave?

Mr. Renton: I am sorry that my hon. Friend was not able to obtain his entry visa to the Soviet Union, but I hope that he will continue to apply and, that on another occasion he will be successful. It is, indeed, ironic that it is only from the Soviet Union that literally thousands of people are wishing to obtain exit visas and to leave. There is no such record from this country or the United States. That is a point that we must continually press on the Soviet authorities, including the Soviet ambassador in London.

Mr. Mason: Is the Minister aware that in 1985, ; when Mr. Gorbachev came to office, there were 383,000 outstanding invitations to Soviet Jews from their friends and relatives to go to other countries? In his first year of office he released fewer than 1,000, last year he released 1,100, and this year the figure is about the same. Therefore, will the Minister call upon the Prime Minister to draw Mr. Gorbachev's attention to those figures? Is the Minister further aware that in January this year Soviet emigration rules were tightened to make it even more difficult for Soviet Jews to emigrate?

Mr. Renton: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his remarks. I have already commented on the rapid fall-off in exit visas for Soviet Jews and others, particularly since the high point reached in 1979, when more than 50,000 exit visas were granted. That compares with last year's total of 5,000, of which 1,000 were for Jews. We shall continue to stress that point. I note the right hon. Gentleman's point about the change in the emigration rules and I raised it in Moscow. I was told that, nevertheless, the authorities expected a great increase in exit visas this year. We are waiting to see that happen, but so far it has not. The proof of the pudding will lie in the eating. We shall continue to press vigorously for it.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: May I add my voice to those urging my hon. Friend to explain once again to the Russian authorities that, despite some window dressing, their refusal to honour their obligations with regard to human rights will cast some doubt upon their sincerity in disarmament negotiations?

Mr. Renton: I believe that what we have to do now is accept what Mr. Gorbachev and some of his Ministers are saying with caution, but put it to the test. We have to test them—and I have no doubt that my right hon. Friends will have this in mind in Moscow next week—to see whether the major changes which they have promised they are envisaging really will happen. I certainly take my hon. Friend's point that until there is a radical change in the human rights position in the Soviet Union it is difficult to accept wholeheartedly all that they promise us about arms control.

Iran-Iraq War

12. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent initiatives Her Majesty's Government have taken towards ending the Iran-Iraq war.

16. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received about the possibility of an end to the Iran-Iraq war.

Mr. Renton: We take every opportunity to encourage progress towards a peaceful settlement of the Iran-Iraq conflict in bilateral contacts, in concert with our European partners and at the United Nations. The Foreign Ministers of the Twelve issued a further statement on 26 January, and we are taking an active part in discussions at the United Nations. We support the constructive role played by the United Nations Secretary-General. There are, however, regrettably, no firm indications that an end to the conflict is in prospect.

Mr. Parry: Surely the appalling loss of life, particularly among young people, calls for an immediate ban on sales to both countries? Will Her Majesty's Government continue to raise this particular question with the Council of Ministers and the Security Council?

Mr. Renton: Let me first reassure the hon. Member that, as I have said many times in the House and in answer to letters from parliamentary colleagues, the guidelines that we have had in place since the end of 1984 are strictly impartial as between Iran and Iraq. They have lost British manufacturers many millions of pounds' worth of orders, but we are scrupulously seeing that nothing is exported from this country that would significantly enhance the capacity of either side to prolong or exacerbate the war. Yes, we will certainly continue to pursue these points in both the Council of Ministers and the Security Council in New York.

Mr. Greenway: Is it not a fact that chemical weapons have been used in the war and that innocent people have been killed by them? Will my hon. Friend condemn the use of chemical weapons, both in this war and anywhere else?

Mr. Renton: What my hon. Friend says is right. A United Nations team investigated the use of chemical weapons by Iraq and reported on this to the Security Council, when the use of chemical weapons was condemned. We continue to press both sides not to use chemical weapons and we remain active in Geneva in pursuing negotiations on a total ban on the production and stockpiling of chemical weapons.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Minister accept that his words about bringing peace in the Iran-Iraq conflict would make much more sense and be much more plausible if there were an absolute ban on the sale of arms to either side and on the sale of any precursor chemicals that could be used for the manufacture of chemical weapons? Does he not accept, further, that he would be well advised to ensure that this ban was effectively co-ordinated throughout the EC and the United States?

Mr. Renton: I find it rather hard to be lectured on this point by the hon. Gentleman. We have put an export embargo on a number of precursor chemical weapons. We have introduced a warning list, which is circulated to manufacturers, about other chemicals that could be used as precursors. Many chemicals which have a perfectly bona fide civilian use can also be used as precursors, which is one of the difficulties with a tight export regime. But we have been taking a lead on this and if all other countries were being as prudent and careful as we are about the export of military equipment there would be very much less danger of the Iran-Iraq war escalating.

Sir John Farr: May I ask my hon. Friend whether he will say something about aerial attacks on British merchant shipping using the Gulf, whether he can say anything about any new counter-measures which may be available and whether he has anything encouraging to say to the House in this respect?

Mr. Renton: Yes. As my hon. Friend will know, there was an attack by the Iranians on the MV Isomeria, a Shell gas tanker, towards the end of January. We protested strongly to the Iranians subsequent to that attack. We have since then taken care to see that the Armilla patrol is more regularly in the Gulf near the area where these attacks have been taking place, not only on the vessel that I have just named, but on other neutral merchantmen. The job of the patrol will be to help and to stay in the vicinity of British merchantmen.

Iran (Arms Supplies)

14. Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received on the implications for Her Majesty's Government's foreign policy of the supply of arms to Iran.

Mr. Renton: We have received a number of letters from hon. and right hon. Members and members of the public on this subject. We have no plans to change the guidelines on defence sales to Iran and Iraq. They have proved effective in implementing our policy of strict impartiality in the Iran-Iraq conflict and of not supporting the war-making capabilities of either side.

Mr. Robertson: Is the Minister aware of the concern throughout the country at the existence just across the road from this palace, at 4 Victoria street, of an office which reputedly organises over 80 per cent. of all Iran's arms imports? Is not the continued operation of this office, in the face of representations from the American Government to shut it down, an outrage in view of the Government's declared policy to end this dreadful war? Will the Minister now take resolute action to stop the activities of these "neighbours" of ours who are indulging in this evil trade?

Mr. Renton: On the hon. Member's main point, may I say that we are, of course, aware of the allegations concerning the activities of the Iranian military procurement office in London. He must understand that the arrangement from the United Kingdom of arms sales to Iran is not illegal unless the goods concerned are exported from the United Kingdom in breach of British law. There is no firm evidence of this.

As to the hon. Gentleman's general point, he seems to revel in guilt by accusation and innuendo. He appears to think that if he throws enough mud some of it will stick. There is no firm evidence for the allegations that he has made now and on previous occasions. He should learn to put the national interest before cheap scaremongering in order to make political points.

Mr. Nelson: In welcoming my hon. Friend's restatement of the Government's policy of not selling lethal arms, may I invite him to agree that we have international obligations as well as a national interest in the security of the Gulf, and that, following the increasing extent to which American policies in the middle east have become discredited, there is a real vacuum which could be filled by this country? Will my hon. Friend consider taking an initiative in that regard, but, before doing so, will he consult most closely with our allies in the region who are directly affected in the Gulf Co-operation Council, that is, the United Arab Emirates and the Sultanate of Oman?

Mr. Renton: I take my hon. Friend's point. He knows the region well. I was in the Arabian peninsula three weeks ago and my noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement is in the area at the moment. From those visits we are well aware of the points my hon. Friend makes and of the need to work closely with the Gulf Co-operation Council to try to defuse the risk in the Gulf of the present worrying Iran-Iraq conflict spreading. We shall do all we can in that respect, with the advice of our friends in the area.

Mr. Foot: Does the hostility to the sale or provision of arms to Iran expressed by the hon. Gentleman a few minutes ago include hostility to the sale or provision of arms from the United States of America? Can the Minister tell us when last either the Foreign Secretary or the Prime Minister put that point to the President of the United States?

Mr. Renton: We are clearly talking today about our policy in relation to arms sales to Iran and Iraq. We remain in consultation with the United States and other friendly countries about what we can do to stop the spread of the conflict. This was a matter that I discussed with two Government officials from Iraq only yesterday. We shall do all that we can to see that the conflict does not spread.

United States (Trade)

17. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to meet the United States Trade Secretary to discuss any effects of United States trade measures on the Atlantic Alliance.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to meet the United States Trade Representative or Commerce Secretary, although my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry met them in Washington on 3 March. My right hon. and learned Friend last discussed EC-US trade issues with Secretary of State Shultz in January, and will be meeting him again on 9 April next.

Mr. Stern: Will my hon. Friend or any of her colleagues take the first available opportunity to draw to the attention of any United States Ministers in the list that she mentioned the admirable document that has been placed in the Library by her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry showing the extent to which the United States aircraft industry is subsidised through military budgets? Will she ask them to stop attacking the extremely successful European aircraft industry on the basis of false figures?

Mrs. Chalker: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. He is absolutely right. The way in which the United States aircraft industry has been supported in the past should be considered carefully by those Ministers. The Airbus partners reject the allegations of unfair subsidies. We have acted, and will continue to act, in accordance with GATT. It is clear from the funding of Boeing and McDonnell-Douglas just how much United States money has been put into defence-related projects in the United States, and that must be clearly borne in mind in any discussions of such trade matters.

Mr. Foulkes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the hon. Gentleman's point of order after the private notice question.

British Rail Engineering Ltd.

3.32 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement about the 1,600 redundancies announced today at British Rail Engineering Ltd. at Crewe, Derby, Doncaster and York.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): At a meeting yesterday afternoon, British Rail Engineering Ltd. informed the national officers of the trade unions concerned that it would unfortunately be necessary to make a further reduction in the staff of the new build and repair group. These changes are largely prompted by further reductions in British Rail's repair requirements for coaches and locomotives and do not reflect any new policy initiatives.

The new build and repair group has around 13,000 staff, and the BREL announcement covers a reduction of 1,400 staff by March 1988. About 1,000 of the job losses are new—600 at Crewe, 350 at York and about 100 at Derby. A further reduction of some 350 jobs at Derby had already been announced last year but is being brought forward from 1988-89 to 1987-88.

The Government fully recognise the importance of the railways. British Rail is investing heavily in modernisation —a total of £3 billion since we took office, with a further £2 billion planned for the next five years. But, as the House will recognise, modern rolling stock needs much less maintenance and repair.

Three factors flow from BR's major investment in new rolling stock. First, from the moment that BR decides to order new rolling stock, heavy maintenance on the old stock ceases. Secondly, fewer modern vehicles are needed to provide the same level of service. Thirdly, new rolling stock itself requires less maintenance, and the design is such that much of it can be done by component exchange in the depots rather than in main BREL works.

Decisions on work load and employment are matters for BR and BREL. Naturally, both I and the Government greatly regret that further redundancies are now unavoidable. I say that because we recognise the human problems and personal difficulties caused by such a solution. I understand that BREL will be seeking voluntary redundancies and early retirements wherever possible.

Mr. Snape: Is the Minister aware that his latest batch of excuses just will not wash, that 87 per cent. of British Rail's locomotives and power cars entered service prior to the Government being elected in 1979; that the Central Transport Consultative Committee, in its latest report, draws attention to what it terms "massive overcrowding on trains" and demanded large-scale new expenditure on rolling stock; that if the Government were to implement a proper programme of mainline electrification and ensured that British companies were top of the list for new orders there would be a lot more business for British Rail Engineering Ltd. and better prospects for that company in the international market?

British Rail is about to put out to tender a major order for heavy freight locomotives. Will British Rail Engineering Ltd. take part in that tendering? If so, why is it once again running down capacity? The hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) said on local radio this morning that he would be in the House and would raise this matter to defend the interests of his constituents. Why is he not raising it, and why am I doing it for him? [HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful."] It is a fact. He said it on the radio this morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that that decision rests with me.

Mr. Mitchell: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will wish to check whether my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) also sought to table a private notice question. That must have placed you, Mr. Speaker, in a difficulty in having to choose between two applicants.

The hon. Gentleman said that the explanation that I gave to the House about the reasons for this reduction in jobs would not wash. He cannot deny that when new rolling stock is brought into operation there is immediately no need for old rolling stock to go for heavy maintenance. He cannot deny that new rolling stock requires less maintenance than old rolling stock requires. [Interruption.] There is no point in the hon. Gentleman shouting and blustering. He cannot escape the fact that, when he and others call for more investment in British Rail and when I accede to those requests, it inevitably means that less heavy maintenance is required.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must tell the hon. Member that he should not refer to any application that he may have made for a private notice question.

Mr. Gregory: I share with the whole House the sadness expressed in response to the private notice question. Redundancies are a matter of great concern to us all, including families, and I hope that we all sympathise with the families that are affected. If there have to be redundancies, will my hon. Friend give a commitment that he will ensure with British Rail Engineering Ltd. that they are on the most favourable terms possible and in line with redundancies in other nationalised industries? Concern about that has been expressed in the past.

Secondly, in his discussions with the management of British Rail Engineering Ltd., will my hon. Friend ask the company to put more resources into gaining a greater proportion of the export market in which there has certainly been a lacklustre performance?

Thirdly, given the success of bus deregulation, will my hon. Friend draw to the company's attention the possibility, as occurred some 15 to 20 years ago, of a greater amount of bus and coach heavy maintenance being undertaken to absorb the ups and downs in that sector?

This is a time of great concern and I hope that my hon. Friend will respond positively, thus reflecting the fact that the Government have invested substantially in British Rail resulting in the efficiencies that are now bearing fruit.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend asks about favourable terms for those who will lose their jobs. Certainly I shall respond to his request that I should discuss that matter with the chairman of British Rail. I know that British Rail will make every effort to find alternative employment for employees displaced from British Rail Engineering Ltd. British Rail hopes that the changes will be covered by voluntary redundancies and early retirement.

My hon. Friend asked about exports. British Rail Engineering Ltd. has put a big effort into exports, but the market is fiercely competitive. It submitted bids in 1986 for about £185 million worth of export work and members of staff have made no fewer than 300 overseas trips in the last six months in an endeavour to obtain export business. I hope that my hon. Friend will take some reassurance from that. I shall draw to the attention of the British Railways Board my hon. Friend's point about bus maintenance possibilities.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Does the Minister recall that the Secretary of State came to my constituency as recently as 11 February and at a private meeting gave an undertaking to the Conservative party that there would be no change in the job position in BREL? Can the hon. Gentleman reconcile that with the fact that 400 recent job losses which were supposed to occur over three years occurred in less than six months? Yesterday, the chairman of BREL and of British Rail told me that another 600 jobs were to go in my constituency. How can the hon. Gentleman pretend that this is not the grossest betrayal of men who have worked hard in the industry all their lives and who have great expertise but will now be forced to tender even for work that they could do standing on their heads? How dare the Minister come here today and talk such arrant rubbish.

Mr. Mitchell: I am afraid that the hon. Lady has misunderstood what my right hon. Friend said in Crewe. He said that there was no change in the Government's policy. That is still the position. The redundancies do not arise as a matter of Government policy. They arise according to the level of demand for services provided by BREL for the British Railways Board. If the hon. Lady is as anxious as I am for work to come to Crewe, perhaps she will be a little more enthusiastic about the Channel tunnel, with all the work that it can bring.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Although the loss of any job is to be regretted, will my hon. Friend confirm that the main problem facing British Rail Engineering relates not to new build but to the reduction in maintenance work caused by advances in new technology and a fall-off in British Rail's freight business? Will my hon. Friend speak to British Rail and urge it to give employment priority to British Rail Engineering workers who are to be made redundant?

Mr. Mitchell: I can certainly give my hon. Friend the assurance for which he asks. I shall ask British Rail to ensure that, so far as is possible, those who are made redundant at BREL are offered other job opportunities on the railways. Nearly £600 million of investment in new rolling stock has been authorised in the past three years. That has a direct bearing on maintenance requirements.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Clearly the job losses which the Minister has announced are appalling. I should like to extend the sympathy of my right hon. and hon. Friends to the communities, particularly the families, over which the cloud of redundancy now hangs.

Will the Minister confirm that one reason why Freightliner Ltd. has to close a number of depots in Scotland and in north-east of England is that it does not have resources available for investment in new rolling stock? Why are the Government presiding over a spiral of decline? Would it not be better if there was the political will to provide the resources for that new investment as this might not only stave off some of the redundancies which were announced today but put off the closure of depots which are threatened?

Mr. Mitchell: The closure of the Freightliner depots to which the hon. Gentleman refers is entirely a management matter. It was the judgment of those responsible that they would have a more efficient business which was able to win more business if they cut out some of their loss-making depots.

As for investment, the hon. Gentleman should know that I have not turned down any submission from British Rail Freight. It is for the railways to propose investment and for Ministers to respond to the proposal.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): My hon. Friend does not need to hear about my credentials as a railway enthusiast. Is he aware that I have just come from Swindon? It gives me no great pleasure to say so, but when the works there closed it was considered to be a major disaster; in fact, the work force have almost all found other jobs in that growth area in a very short time.

There is, however, one thing that my hon. Friend could do. I should be very grateful if he would look at the question of railway investment and examine the criteria laid on British Rail by the Government which British Rail has to use in deciding what investment proposals to put to the Government. Does he agree that these criteria are extremely stiff? There are many investment projects which British Rail would like to undertake but which will not meet the Government's criteria. If he would ease the criteria, we could maintain more worthwhile investment in the nation's infrastructure through the railway system.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend and I share enthusiasm for railways. I recently visited Swindon myself to see the progress being made in job creation by British Rail as it seeks to ensure that alternative employment is provided for those who lost their jobs in BREL. My hon. Friend is quite right: it has had considerable success already, and a large number of people who lost their jobs have now taken up other employment.

As to the criteria for investment, the chairman has not approached us to ask for any change in them.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Is the Minister aware that two years ago Mr. Bob Reid made some very boastful statements, telling the nation that he would buy 1,500 new locomotives and that everything would be rosy in the locomotive engineering industry? May I remind the Minister that, although he keeps on referring to lack of maintenance, engineers are quite adaptable and capable of changing from maintenance to new build? All these skilled men — electricians, coppersmiths, fitters, turners, and grinders — could be used on new build. Why does not the Minister do something about giving them some new locomotives to build instead of doing maintenance?

Mr. Mitchell: There are two parts to the answer. First, I do not give orders to British Rail. The British Rail chairman says to us that he wishes to invest in this, that or the other new rolling stock or to make some other major investment. If British Rail puts forward a further programme for new locomotives — we have already approved a substantial number — we would consider it very carefully. But every major investment in new locomotives will mean less heavy maintenance work.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): Does my hon. Friend agree that, if Opposition Members had supported the Government's efforts to speed up the Channel tunnel link instead of opposing it and filibustering, more jobs could now be saved at Derby and there would certainly be more orders?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is quite right to draw attention to the potential value of the substantial amount of orders for BREL and other engineering works arising from the Channel tunnel. As to the proportion of those orders that BREL wins, it will, of course, depend on how competitive it is.

Mr. Ron Lewis (Carlisle): Is the Minister aware that since 1979, when the Conservatives took over, British Rail Engineering Ltd. has closed roughly seven main workshops and shed about 20,000 jobs? The figures that British Rail has just announced will add to that total. Is he further aware that British Rail is now looking very closely at the west coast main line and has given notice that there will be a large number of redundancies on it, together with further closures such as at Kingmoor in my constituency? Is he proud of that?

Mr. Mitchell: Of course I am aware of the job losses and closures in British Rail Engineering Ltd. Indeed, I have taken a special interest in and followed a number of them, including Shildon, where work has been done to try to find alternaive employment. I know of the closures, but I also know that that matter is directly related to the £3,000 million spent by British Rail on modernisation since 1979. I wish that the hon. Gentleman would stop spreading false rumours about the future of the west coast mainline.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is my hon. Friend aware that I have a number of constituents who work at the BREL factory in Derby and are therefore under threat, as does my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), who shares my concern in this matter? Would my hon. Friend consider what more assistance we might give to BREL in securing overseas contracts, particularly in the far east, by improving our aid and trade provisions, as recommended by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. and learned Friend's final point is a different issue and I shall write to him about it. On the matter of exports, Ministers have been helping wherever British Rail Engineering Ltd. has indicated that such help would assist in clinching orders. Certainly that offer of assistance remains.

Mr. Michael Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): Is not the Minister saying exactly what he said a year ago when he announced the closure and 3,000 redundancies at the Springburn works where, at the end of the month, we will be down to 300 employees? How can he tell the House that he will try to find alternative work within the railway industry when 3,000 people in my constituency left their place of work and will never see another job in British Rail?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman will know that there is a substantial number of job vacancies in British Rail, but not in Scotland, and that British Rail is having difficulty in filling them. As for his comment that I am saying the same thing today as I said 12 months ago, I do not think that consistency is necessarily wrong.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw)rose——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call the two hon. Gentlemen, provided they ask questions about railway redundancies.

Mr. Ashton: Is it not a fact that it is the Conservative party's long-term policy to privatise and profitise any part of any nationalised industry that it can, including maintenance or contracts, just as it has done with the Health Service? Can the Minister give us an assurance that this is not the first step to reducing manpower in order to let the maintenance go to private enterprise?

Mr. Mitchell: The position on privatisation has nothing to do with the job losses that British Rail Engineering Ltd. has now announced. We have asked the chairman to tell us his proposals for the future of BREL. I have no doubt that he will consider, among other options, the possibility of privatisation, but I have no report or recommendation from him at this stage.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that the people I have been able to speak to in my constituency who work at the Derby workshops and could well be affected by the announcement today said that there was a great opportunity for the Government yesterday to formulate a Budget that would have supported the infrastructure of Britain and provided jobs and would not have thrown those people on the scrap heap? It is nothing short of hypocrisy for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to go on television last night showing charts proving that Britain was providing more jobs than the rest of Europe put together, when we have this pathetic Minister coming to the House saying that another 1,600 workers are to be put on the Tory scrap heap. The truth is that the Government have written off millions of people in this country in the past eight years, and the railwaymen are now among them.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman wants increased expenditure on the railway infrastructure. I remind him that the increased expenditure for which he calls is likely to lead to a smaller requirement for maintenance and to fewer jobs for the people involved. In any case, I remind the hon. Gentleman that British Rail is in the middle of a massive modernisation programme involving expenditure of about £5,000 million, £3,000 million of which has already been committed.

Mr. Snape: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that it is not customery for an hon. Member to refer to applications that may or may not have been made by other hon. Members. For that reason, I apologise to you for raising the matter and withdraw what I said.

Points of Order

3.55 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask you to make clear what responsibility you have for decisions taken by the Table Office in relation to written questions? What is the position when there is a dispute between an hon. Member and an Officer of the Table Office?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member concerned should, if he wishes, ask for the matter to be brought to my attention. If the hon. Gentleman has a specific case in mind, perhaps he will let me know about it.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your advice. As you may know, some hon. Members have been trying for nearly three weeks to get an oral statement from the Foreign Secretary on reports of the British connection in the supply of arms and mercenaries to the Contra terrorists in central America. I have now had a letter from the Prime Minister refusing such a statement. She also arranged for a question to be put down and answered it, thereby blocking any parliamentary questions about her private meetings with Major David Walker of KMF, one of the people who have been named——

Mr. Speaker: I cannot see how this can possibly be a matter for me. It seems to be a matter between the hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister. It is not a matter of order.

Mr. Foulkes: I am seeking your advice, Mr. Speaker, on the method by which we can get the Foreign Secretary to go to the Dispatch Box to answer questions on a matter that has become an absolute scandal.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It is not really a point of order. I shall in fairness take it, but it has not been a point of order so far.

Mr. Ottaway: Is not the real reason why we have not had a debate on central America the fact that the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) did not turn up to ask question No. 9 in Foreign Office questions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That may be so, but it is not for me to advise the hon. Member on parliamentary tactics. Question Time is a method of getting at such matters.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for raising the matter before an important debate, but it would have been less appreciated if I had tried to raise it before yesterday's Budget Statement. It clearly is a matter of responsibility for you, as you implied in your reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees). It is essential that, before Prime Minister's Question Time tomorrow, we clarify a matter that arose from Prime Minister's Question Time yesterday. I believe that, as the Prime Minister twice misled the House on the issue of sub judice, yesterday——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman must not allege that any hon. Member misled the House. Will he please withdraw that remark?

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Williams: Yes, I shall do it in my own way. No doubt, as the Prime Minister inadvertently——

Mr. Speaker: No. I shall be grateful if the right hon. Gentleman would please withdraw that allegation.

Mr. Williams: I said "inadvertently" because it was inadvertent. Nevertheless, at the time, Mr. Speaker, you had to overrule the position that she took in relation to the House and for which she did not apologise. Yesterday, no doubt equally inadvertently, she again misled the House in a reply to my right hon. Friend——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Twice?

Mr. Williams: Yes, twice, in reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that he said that the then Prime Minister's statement on 8 December 1977 applied to allegations against the security services that were different from those that were under discussion at Question Time yesterday. At column 812 of Hansard, which I believe you have with you, Sir, my right hon. Friend said

> "Fresh allegations should be looked at."

He was referring to the new information that had been pinpointed by the judge in the Australian courts, to the effect that now we have a confession that there was a seditious attempt to undermine the——

Mr. Speaker: What is the point of order for me? The right hon. Gentleman must come to it straight away. What he is alleging is patently not a matter for me. I cannot be held responsible for anything that the Prime Minister may say or for what anybody else may say.

Mr. Williams: The last thing that I would try to do on an occasion as important as this would be to stand up on a non-existent point of order. I trust that you will see that it is a point of order, if you will allow me to develop it. My right hon. Friend said yesterday that we are in a new situation because there has now been a confession——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am very sorry, but this is surely a continuation of yesterday's Question Time. What the right hon. Gentleman is saying cannot possibly be related to my responsibility for dealing with points of order. The right hon. Gentleman must relate what he is saying to a point of order, and then I shall consider whether I have any responsibility; but I cannot believe that I have.

Mr. Williams: I am not trying to repeat points unnecessarily, but my right hon. Friend made the point that now we have a confession to an act of sedition—a confession that did not exist before. In reply to that, the Prime Minister—also at column 812——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is unfair of the right hon. Gentleman, who is on the Opposition Front Bench, to seek to involve me in an argument that took place yesterday on an issue that is not a matter for me. I cannot be held responsible for answers, or for the motives behind answers.

Mr. Williams: I should not be raising it, Mr. Speaker, if it were not a matter for you. In column 812 of yesterday's Hansard, in reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) the Prime Minister said:

> "The right hon. Gentleman is certainly referring to matters for which I am not, and cannot be, responsible."

She later said—you will appreciate the significance of this, in terms of blocking questions—that

[Mr. Williams]

"I can take no responsibility whatsoever for matters that happened before my time." — [Official Report, 17 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 812.]

If that position is allowed to stand in relation to the point that was raised by my right hon. Friend, it means that the Table Office will be unable to accept further questions relating to this matter. That is one of your direct responsibilities, Sir, as you have just ruled. It also means that the Prime Minister is precluding herself from taking the very important action that she alone can take, which is to refer this matter to the Security Commission.

Mr. Speaker: I should certainly like to clear up that matter. I am not responsible for any questions that may be asked in the House or for anything that is said here, provided that it is in order. What the Prime Minister said was perfectly in order, otherwise she would have been stopped, like any other hon. Member. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) alleged something without being specific about it, and I said that I would look into it if he drew it to my attention. However, if the Prime Minister gave a blocking answer that is not a matter for me.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it a genuine point of order?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if I try you will rule. My point of order relates to the tabling of questions and specifically to the reply that you gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams). You know that I have been endeavouring to table questions about the alleged Cunard incident in 1975 and the implication of those allegations for the democratic government of this country. The Table Office has resisted those questions——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that the hon. Gentleman is discussing this matter with the Table Office. He should not seek to bring it before me. I think that it would be wrong of the hon. Gentleman to raise openly in the Chamber any discussions that he is having with the Table Office. That is against all our conventions.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am not having discussions with the Table Office. Those discussions were completed last evening when my questions were refused. The Table Office resisted the questions on the basis that the Government are not responsible for matters that took place——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must stick to the conventions. If he is dissatisfied with the advice that has been given to him by the Table Office, he should ask that the matter be referred to me. If he does that, I will gladly look into it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: But, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. Gentleman must do as I have asked him to do.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: But, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to resume his seat.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must please do what I have asked him to do. I am not prepared to have private discussions with the Table Office raised in the Chamber in this way. It is against all our conventions, as the hon. Gentleman knows. He must do as I suggest. I shall not listen further to his point of order.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If you look at the records and consider the development of blocking questions, I think it is fair to say that initially they began on the basis of Ministers not wanting to answer questions for which they had no departmental responsibilities or were trivial. For example, the Prime Minister would give blocking answers to questions about ministerial broadcasts because she did not want to answer. That is how the practice developed.

I come now to a more substantial matter that applies particularly to the office that you hold, Mr. Speaker. It makes sense to have blocking answers from Ministers to prevent the tabling of questions that some would think are of a trivial nature. If the same question is put down three months hence and the Table Office accepts it, under your guidance, that is okay. But in a number of instances, of which this is one, the practice has grown up, especially under this Prime Minister, of using the blocking mechanism to stop very unsavoury matters from being raised on the Floor of the House.

I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, a very important question in the run-up to the next election — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Oh, yes. Will you hold an investigation into the blocking mechanism system, with particular reference to what has been happening in recent months and years so that we can have a full report about the way in which that system is being used for purely party political reasons? The job of the Opposition in any Parliament is to test the Government. That can be read in any textbook. However, we are now being prevented from pursuing a very important political matter that relates to security, and it is important that the nation should know about it. The blocking mechanism system is being used by the Prime Minister, and in my view that is contempt.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his point. He should raise it with the Select Committee on Procedure and ask it to look into the matter.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On another point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is a completely different point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not prepared to hear it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is unrelated to my previous point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I repeat that I am not prepared to hear it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is unrelated.

Mr. Speaker: I am not prepared to hear it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is unrelated.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I am not prepared to hear it.

Opposition Budgets Bill

4.8 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require the Treasury to cost proposed budgets put forward by political parties in Parliament.

I move this motion in a spirit of comradeship to the Opposition parties—the alliance and the Labour parties. The whole House is fortunate that in my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, who is sitting in his place today, we have a man of great integrity. Faithfully and voluntarily he has done for the benefit of the whole nation what my Bill now proposes, but new pledges come day by day from the Opposition and we need a Bill to cost those pledges. We do not want the Tory media, about whom the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) frets so much during the long night hours, to distort the spending plans of the Opposition parties. That is why we most definitely need my Bill.

The full light of critical analysis needs to be thrown on the Opposition's spending plans. We want that analysis so that after the election, which I am sure the Conservatives will win, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) will not be able to say what he said after the previous election:

"Nobody believed that our theories could be put into practice. Our vague hopes of achieving growth through government spending were barely understood and rarely believed."

My Bill would ensure that we could dig beneath the razzmatazz, the glossy packaging and the red rose, and find out exactly what pledge the Labour party intends to carry out and what pledges it intends to abandon.

For instance, does the Labour party intend to abandon the £360 million that it is pledged to spend on abolishing the right of all parents to spend what they want on their children's education? Will Labour abandon the pledge to spend £1,460 million on increasing overseas aid, although it must be said that that pledge strangely slipped out of the jobs and poverty package last week? Where has it gone? Perhaps the begging bowls of the Third world are to go unfilled. Will Labour honour the pledge to spend £760 million on new hospitals, although, again, that pledge seems to have slipped from last week's package? Does the Labour party recall the fact that spending on hospitals was cut by 30 per cent. under the previous Government? I know not.

Perhaps, through my Bill, we can hear about whether the Labour party intends to carry out its bribes for pensioners, although again perhaps wiser counsels will have reminded it about the sad fate of the £10 Christmas bonus under the previous Labour Government. After all, the hon. Member for Olham, West (Mr. Meacher) has a habit of shooting from the hip, so perhaps a clause in my modest little Bill can provide him with a box of matches so that he can do his sums, although in the case of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), that might be a bit inflammatory, so I shall not suggest that.

We might hear a little more about the pledges that the Labour party has already made on local government. We had to wait until page 11 of last week's jobs package before we saw a mention of local government. Perhaps after all the publicity of the past few weeks about the loony Left, even the forces for moderation such as the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) have forgotten his description of the barmy scheme by Sheffield district council to spend real ratepayers' money on phoney jobs as "an imaginative and workmanlike initiative."

Perhaps that was an exaggeration.

Perhaps the Labour party has realised all too late the truth of the wise words of the Audit Commission:

"Throwing money at a problem all too often simply means more waste."

My little Bill will also be able to delve deep into how the Labour party intends to borrow money for its spending plans. Perhaps the preamble to my modest Bill can contain the wise words that it is

"the Government's intention in the years ahead to reduce the share of resources taken by public expenditure. It is also part of this strategy to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement so as to establish monetary conditions which will help the growth of output and the control of inflation."

Those are not my words or the words of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They are in fact the words of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) in his pathetic letter to the International Monetary Fund in 1976.

Most of all, we shall have to look at the Labour party's taxation plans. Will its plans result in a basic rate income tax of over 50p in the pound? Let me quote the candid words of Mr. Blunkett:

"There will have to be a return to the higher standard rate of income tax".

Will those candid words come true? Like Walter Mondale winning Minnesota, perhaps the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook will win Sheffield. Whether he wins much else is a matter for conjecture.

Finally, I must refer to the alliance. Its members are here in the Chamber in some force. I well recall the wise words of Mrs. Shirley Williams, when she said:

"The danger for any new Party . . . is that it becomes all things to all men".

I know that the alliance does not want to fall into that trap. I am sorry to say this, but there are many weasel words in its latest policy document, "The Time Has Come". There are weasel words such as "The Alliance parties' ambition is . . . Ultimately we would wish to . . . We would try to . . . New and improved services could . . . As a long-term goal . . . we would aim".

I am sure that with my Bill we could excise those words. It would ensure that the alliance spoke with the same candour as Dick Taverne in introducing its tax and benefits package. He said:

"You can't make an omelette without breaking eggs."

We could make sure that the wise—perhaps not so wise—words of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) when he told the British people last year:

"Your responsibility is to forgo . . . tax cuts." —[Official Report, 13 November 1985; Vol. 86, c. 596.]

—are brought home to the British people.

This is a modest little Bill, which I hope will result in the British people knowing that when they go to the polls, if they are determined not to vote Conservative, they will be signing a blank cheque made payable to Her Majesty's Government to repay the tax cuts that they received yesterday. While it is undoubtedly the privilege of Opposition parties to make promises, it is their bounden duty to make only such promises as they have an even chance of carrying out. What we have from the Opposition parties is jam today and pie in the sky tomorrow.

I commend my Bill to the House.

4.16 pm

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman seek leave to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Wainwright: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I suppose that virtually every Member of the House wishes not only political parties in the House but all hon. Members to have the best possible informaton from the most independent, reputable and reliable sources on any matter that is introduced for debate. I go further and hope that hon. Members will agree that it is most important to set out on the right foot and not to confuse the issue, as the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) has done. I can vouch for at least one group of Members who have gone to considerable expense to obtain an independent costing of their proposals so that the House may be fully informed.

Our procedures would need to be revised so that the Houe may have some control over Government proposals to borrow. One of the great gaps in the House's power over the Executive is that the Executive is left virtually free to borrow what it wants, often with lamentable consequences. Secondly, it would be necessary to find some way round the difficult situation created by the fact that the Crown has the sole initiative in this place for proposing to raise taxation, which means that all Opposition parties—most of us have taken advantage of it from time to time—are let off the hook because we are not allowed to propose to increase taxation as the Finance Bill goes through Parliament. Those two matters need to be put right first.

The hon. Gentleman proposed that, of all the bodies in the country with economic knowledge, the Treasury should be chosen to have that duty. That is absurd and cannot have been put forward seriously. I apologise for reminding the House, first, that the Treasury is necessarily the servant of Government. Secondly, it is the protector of the Revenue. In those capacities, the Treasury is bound to put the worst possible face on any proposals from anybody in opposition, whether a party or an hon. Member.

I cite this as evidence. It happens every year when the Finance Bill is debated. It is an annual ritual, whichever party is in power, that its obedient servants, following the course of duty meticulously, keep a score sheet of the cost of every Opposition proposal for reducing taxation. Those proposals are in fact a set of alternatives. No Opposition suppose that they will ask for all those reductions to be granted simultaneously—of course not. We know that we will be defeated on one matter, so the following week —[Interruption.] Conservative Members know that, so it is no good their trying to cover it up with hilarity. We come back to the charge the next week with another proposal for the Treasury — [Laughter.] Some Conservative Members do that every time. The Treasury, in the most simplistic way, keeps a milometer of the cost of such proposals, adds up the whole lot and every week gives Ministers a horrific figure that they duly retail in Committee. Nobody believes them. It is just part of the ritual.

I have an alternative which I am sure has occurred to most hon. Members. There are many independent economic institutes in the country, academic departments and others that are perfectly capable of costing Opposition proposals. The House should make funds available—within reasonable limits—so that independent institutes can provide information for the House. That seems to me to be very much more constructive than the obviously tendentious proposals made by the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle. I hope that the House will divide against the motion.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and Nominations of Select Committees at Commencement of Public Business):

The House divided: Ayes 91, Noes 13.

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [17 March].

Amendment of the Law

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the national debt and public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or

(d) for any relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lawson.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

4.31 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): There is one aspect of the Budget on which I am sure that the Chancellor and I are in complete agreement — the opportunity that it provides for the two major parties to show how wide is the gulf that now divides them. The alliance will no doubt take refuge in the abandoned trenches of no man's land. We believe that at the next election the voters must be offered a clear alternative, so we shall not counterfeit agreement where none exists, opposing tax cuts before they are made but supporting them once they are in the pay packets. We believe that the Budget is wrong—socially wrong, economically wrong and, in its neglect of the unemployed, morally wrong—and we propose to say so.

While I am on the subject of the alliance, I should take this opportunity to offer my congratulations to the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) on his victory last Saturday. Labour Members were never in any doubt about his success. As the creator of the SDP, he must have been irresistible to what Matthew Arnold described as the "home of lost causes". In any case, I understand that there was considerable apprehension in Oxford that if the right hon. Gentleman failed to get the top job there he would go off and found a university of his own.

I also congratulate the Chancellor on his remarkable performance yesterday. With £6 billion to spend, he managed to make its distribution an anti-climax. Dead sheep have done better in their time. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, there was some hope among Conservative Back Benchers that the lost page of his speech — the dramatic highlight of his entire performance—contained the tax cuts for which they longed but which they were denied. Notwithstanding that, I can offer some cheer to those Tories who wanted a party political Budget and felt that they were not getting it. It was, of course, exactly what they got. The Budget was intended to buy votes, but the Chancellor has carefully targeted the voters whom he hopes to buy. The men and women who have been written off as potential Tory converts were ignored. There was nothing for pensioners without a second income, nothing for families living on poverty wages, and nothing for the unemployed. By neglecting the people who need help the most, the Chancellor has widened the desperate and destructive divisions within our society.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will the right hon. Gentleman explain how the fall in interest rates, which has already begun and will inevitably continue as a result of my right hon. Friend's long-term Budget—for that is what it is — can fail to benefit the business community and therefore employment in the long run?

Mr. Hattersley: Everyone agrees — the Tory's own model agrees and every economist and institution of every point of view agrees — that if the first priority is to reduce unemployment, spreading money about in tax cuts is the slowest, least effective and least economic way of achieving that.

Mr. Forth: What about interest rates?

Mr. Hattersely: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me for more than a couple of minutes of my speech, I shall be developing exactly that point.

Before the hon. Gentleman's wholly irrelevant interruption, I was referring to the fact that the desperate and destructive divisions in our society have been intensified and deepened by the Budget. They have been intensified in the name of prudence. The price for the reputation of prudence that the Chancellor thinks it expedient to promote is to be paid by the families on the dole, those living in houses unfit for human habitation, the sick waiting for hospital beds and the pensioners unable to pay their fuel bills. No Budget every relied so heavily on the dictum that no one with a conscience votes Conservative.

Prudence is the word that Conservative spokesmen have been advised to put into their speeches, but this is not a prudent Budget. It is not prudent to spend £20 billion per year holding unemployment at more than 3½ million. It is not prudent to sacrifice the £30 billion per year that this country would earn if those 3½ million men and women were back at work. It is not prudent to allow our housing stock, our hospitals our schools and our roads to decay to the point of disintegration. It is not prudent to squander our oil revenues. It is not prudent to encourage the reduction of manufacturing output and the collapse of manufacturing investment and to escalate the deficit in our balance of manufactured trade. It is not prudent to refuse to secure the homes of the old and the weak against the disastrous rise in burglary and robbery over which the Government have presided. I repeat, this is not prudent Budget.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): If the right hon. Gentleman is so converted to the mertis of genuine prudence, which I take to be the burden of his argument, what is so prudent about the Labour party's spending plans which would increase public expenditure by £28 billion at the minimum estimate?

Mr. Hattersley: "All this and more", as they say. If the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will bear with me, they will find that I deal with exactly that point on page 78 or 79 of my speech.

I repeat, this is not a prudent Budget. More important, it is generally irrelevant to our economic needs. It is built around income tax cuts which cannot be sustained and will worsen the growing deficit in our balance of payments — a danger that the Chancellor at present finds it convenient to ignore. Even if the prospects were as rosy as the Government pretend, the Chancellor's choice of spending priorities would be wrong. It is not simply the economic outlook which demands that available funds should be invested in our future rather than used to fuel the credit and consumption boom. Short term or long term, the extra resources at the Chancellor's disposal should be concentrated on the reduction of unemployment, the alleviation of poverty and the improvement of essential services. They should have been used to build a united country; instead, they have been used to finance a failed publicity stunt.

The public expenditure White Paper, which was the curtain raiser to the Budget, was described by the Spectator as having fallen off the back of a lorry. The simile is now continued. We are in the middle of one of those closing-down sales that advertise their bargains with whitewash messages painted on grubby shop windows: "Everything must go. Buy while stocks last. Amazing reductions." Customers who fall for such blandishments find, when they return to complain about the shoddy character of the goods, that the hucksters have cut and run. So will it be with this Government. That is their clear intention, and that is the message of the Budget.

The tax cuts that the Chancellor announced yesterday, intensifying as they do both the credit boom and the pressure on imports, cannot be sustained. Were the Government to be returned in the general election, for which the Budget is no more than a trailer, value added tax would be increased to fill the gap left in the revenue and to reduce the consumption of imported goods. We would be left with tax cuts that help the rich the most, and those cuts would be replaced by tax increases that hit the poor the hardest. An increase in VAT is the Prime Minister's clear intention. On television in January 1984 she was absolutely explicit. She said:

> "It is the balance between indirect and direct taxation which we want to switch."

It is the pattern of Tory behaviour to cut direct taxation before elections and, given the chance, to increase indirect taxation afterwards.

Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) referred to the history of Conservative tax duplicity, notably the behaviour of Mr. R. A. Butler. Hon. Members shouted then, as some are shouting now, for more recent examples. An hon. Gentleman, whom I am afraid I cannot identify as I do not know his constituency, has asked for such an example. Let me give him one. I suspect that the occasion of his election in 1979 was such an example. Before that election, the Prime Minister promised that there would be no increase in VAT. Immediately the election was over, VAT was increased from 8 per cent. to 15 per cent.

At least the Prime Minister has learnt that lesson. When pressed on television, on the radio and at press conferences, she now refuses to say categorically that she will not increase VAT if the Government are re-elected, and I understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was similarly evasive with journalists yesterday evening. If, now or later today, the right hon. Gentleman wishes to give a categorical assurance on the subject, I am sure that we shall listen to it with a good deal of interest and with absolute belief. Until then, it will be clear—and I believe it to be true—that the Government firmly intend to increase VAT should they be re-elected. That must be true, because the use of the Chancellor's extra revenue for tax cuts cannot be sustained. Anyone who looks at the causes of the extra revenue that the Chancellor distributed yesterday will understand that.

Let me make it clear that I do not intend to accuse the Chancellor of being lucky; luck is an essential part of our trade. But no one believes—and I do not think that the Chancellor even pretends—that the £6 billion that he has to distribute is the result of four years of careful planning. In December, the Chancellor told the House:

"I very much doubt whether there will be much scope for reductions in taxation in next year's Budget." — [Official Report, 17 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 1242.]

In the present Treasury team, invention is one of the jobs allocated to the Chief Secretary, so I assume that the Chancellor was telling the truth in December. If he was telling the truth then, he did not expect the £6 billion fiscal adjustment in March; therefore, he cannot legitimately claim credit for it. He should be surprised by the sudden bonus, and, as well as being surprised, he should be worried.

That £6 billion is underpinned—indeed, it has largely been created — by four underlying factors that have made it possible for the Chancellor to reduce income tax and the public sector borrowing requirement simultaneously. Those factors should oblige a rational and honest Chancellor to take responsible decisions about how the available money should be spent. If it is used to expand the real economy, it can be turned to advantage. Only by using it for investment can we turn the temporary bonus into permanent gain. If it is frittered away on a brief spending spree, it can only intensify our underlying economic problems.

The Budget is underpinned by a bogus calculation of Government borrowing. The temporary expedient of selling Government assets is recorded as a reduction in the PSBR. We have argued in the past, and no doubt will argue again, about the wisdom and propriety of privatisation — especilly privatisation at knockdown prices, which has allowed speculators to make £2 billion in profit on the instant resale of wilfully undervalued assets. However, there can be no argument about one fact: the sale of capital assets is now being used to finance increases in consumption.

The buoyant revenues of which the Chancellor made so much yesterday are an even more short-lived and even more dangerous phenomenon. They are the product of circumstances that either cannot continue, or cannot be allowed to continue, without massive damage to the real economy. It is folly to use them for immediate spending rather than for investment in our future.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): How does the right hon. Gentleman square what he has said with the rapid increase in corporation tax during the past year, which is far above my right hon. Friend's estimate and cannot be described as either temporary or bad for the economy?

Mr. Hattersley: I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is wholly temporary—at least, I hope it is. It results from two phenomena — the first is the changes in the tax regime brought about by the Government, which have now made it more likely that capital will be distributed rather than being ploughed back into industry. The other is the fact that the capital investment has been reduced, and that that reduction has produced a phenomenon about which the House should be concerned—namely, the decline in investment, especially in manufacturing. In a moment I shall give the figures and develop the case—I hope with the general agreement of the House, if not with that of the hon. Gentleman.

The Revenue collected an extra £500 million in stamp duty as a result of house price inflation and the extra share transactions that result from merger mania. The corporation tax payments to which the hon. Gentleman referred amounted to an extra £1·7 billion, but I repeat that they are not the marks of success. They are largely the result of the withdrawal of investment incentives and stock relief, and the failure to invest increased profits. The extra revenue in that sector is the direct product of a disastrous fall in the most important area of new investment. Investment in manufacturing industry has fallen to 20 per cent. below its 1979 level.

I shall give another example of that. Government income has gained almost £1 billion from increased VAT receipts on consumer durables and imports. The increase in VAT revenue creates a perfect vicious circle. That revenue is increased when imports rise. The extra revenue is distributed in income tax and the extra spending power thus engendered is used to suck in more imports. Those are the sources of revenue that the Daily Express yesterday described as the result of economic success. Lord Beaverbrook must be turning in his grave to learn that his old paper is congratulating the Government on promoting the exports of Germany and Japan.

Central to the increases in VAT and corporation tax receipts is the explosion in indebtedness which the Government first allowed and then encouraged. Personal debt now accounts for almost 70 per cent. of net income after tax. Indebtedness now increases by 20 per cent. a year and stands far higher than it did during the much derided Barber credit boom.

The Government are obsessively opposed to increasing public borrowing to finance investment in British industry. However, they actively encourage private borrowing to finance the purchase of German cars, Japanese videos, Italian footwear and south-east Asian textiles. The result is unfortunately recorded for all to see. It is the continual decline in Britain's balance of payments, despite oil income that has contributed at least £100 billion during the lifetime of the Government.

Let us consider the actual figures. In the 1985 autumn statement, the Chancellor predicted a £4 billion balance of payments surplus for 1986. Naturally, he brushed aside, with all his usual charm, the idea that he might possibly be wrong. Each subsequent forecast, the Budget and the 1986 autumn statement, was worse than its predecessor. There was a £1 billion deficit last year and this year the deficit was originally forecast to rise to £1·5 billion. Yesterday, the Chancellor increased his estimate of the deficit to £2·5 billion. We have seen a £5 billion deterioration in the 1986 deficit between the 1985 autumn statement and the actual outturn.

If, in 1979, the BBC had prophesied that, despite oil, the Government would still preside over a balance of payments deficit which would grow year by year, the chairman of the Tory party would have got on his bike and pedalled round to Broadcasting house to sort out the Bolsheviks who were spreading such nonsense.

About manufacturing trade, the Chancellor cannot even simulate confidence. The manufactured trade balance has slumped from a surplus of £5 billion in 1978 to a forecast deficit of £8 billion this year.

The Government know that the balance of payments is deteriorating fast. It is impossible to imagine a more irresponsible way of reacting to that deterioration than escalating the consumer and credit boom by cutting 2p off the basic rate of tax.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: No, I shall not.

The folly of that choice is underlined by the inability of British industry to meet the increased demands upon it that more purchasing power will bring. Manufacturing exports are a subject on which the Government make great claims and repeat great boasts.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): They are right.

Mr. Hattersley: Yes, they are right. Manufacturing exports have risen by 15 per cent. since 1979. The only problem is that imports have risen by 48 per cent. Manufacturing trade is in deficit for the first time since the industrial revolution. Net manufacturing is negative for the fifth year running. Manufacturing output has fallen and is still lower than it was in 1979.

The first necessity of a responsible Government is to increase Britain's capacity to meet domestic demand and expand foreign sales, especially to fill the gap that will be left when oil revenues begin to run out. Once we were told that rescue would come from invisible earnings. However, now even the forecasts for invisible earnings are beginning to be scaled down.

I ask the Chancellor a question today which I have often asked him before but which, so far, he has refused to answer. What are his plans for getting the balance of payments back into surplus? What will replace the oil income? He must know that yesterday's Budget makes that gap harder to fill. It will boost the import of consumer goods and do little or nothing to improve the prospect of manufacturing industry. A brief balance of payments deterioration, in preparation for increases in manufacturing output, is sustainable. However, a continuing balance of payments deterioration, brought about by a flood of consumer durables, cannot possibly be sustained.

There are some parts of the Budget which we approve of and applaud and which I should like to put on record as receiving our support. I refer, for example, to the tax differential for unleaded petrol, the concessions to charities, the increased allowances for the blind and for those aged over 80 and the new tax allowances to assist with training. I have taken examples from the four parts of the Chancellor's speech with which we especially agreed.

Mr. Hill: What about exchange controls?

Mr. Hattersley: I hear the hon. Gentleman ask, "What about exchange controls?" I shall answer, perhaps improperly, the question that was shouted out from the Front Benches rather than the one to which the hon. Gentleman would like me to reply.

We are told that we are to have the formal repeal of exchange control. However, since the present powers are incapable of effective operation, I am not quite sure why the Chancellor chooses to bother. In the one passage of his speech that was meant to be a joke, the Chancellor asked whether Opposition Members would support repeal. I am pleased to tell him that we shall, gladly. However, we shall want a debate on the Floor of the House to draw attention to the money that has flooded out of Britain since the end of statutory exchange control and to describe the new way in which we propose to bring that money back to invest in the British economy, British industry and British jobs. However, after we have debated it we have no intention of attempting to breathe life into an already dead Act when we have a superior instrument to put in its place.

I should also like to tell the Chancellor how much we applaud his conversion on the measurement of broad money. Once it was the criterion against which all policy was tested and the centrepiece of the medium-term financial strategy, of which the Chancellor was the author. The only problem with the broad money target was that the Chancellor could never hit it. Yesterday, in a moment of rash frankness, the Chancellor described what he proposed to do about M3 and said that he would follow the "wiser" course. It is certainly wiser for his reputation.

We equally welcome the changes in VAT that the Chancellor proposed for small businesses. However, we must confess to bias because we proposed them all in last year's Finance Bill, but the Government voted them down. We welcome the sinners come late to repentance. Would that we could say the same about the Chancellor's manipulation of statistics. He told us yesterday—as he has told us so often — about the seven years of continuous growth. However, I invite him to tell the House what the average rate of growth was during those seven years. Knowing his reticence, I offer him the answers. For 1979-1986, the average rate of growth was 1·5 per cent. Including the forecast for 1987, it increased, on average, to 1·7 per cent. However, under the previous Labour Government, from 1974-1979, it was 1·9 per cent.

I am not surprised that the Chancellor chooses his statistics with such scrupulous care. I give another example. He did it again yesterday evening when he entertained the British public with what I can only describe as some interestingly creative diagrams, mostly based on the notion that if they did not record the performance of our most successful competitors, it would look as if Britain was top of the league. There are some attractions in that technique. By assiduously applying it, Yorkshire always wins the county championship, and Sheffield Wednesday the football league. However, even applying that unusual technique, the Chancellor could not bring himself to publish a table for inflation on his television broadcast. That is because, according to the Government's forecast, we are about to become bottom of the inflation league in Europe. It would have been a peculiar diagram that showed we were at the top by not having any of our competitors on it.

The Chancellor has been just as selective in his descriptions of the reasons for cutting the basic rate. The most unattractive excuse is the pretence that the basic rate has been cut because of anxiety about the low-paid. That is simply a deception. The low-paid, or at least low-paid families, would have received far more help if available funds had been used to increase child benefit. That would still have left the problem of single low-paid earners, among whom are many nurses, about whom the Prime Minister speaks so feelingly when she thinks it convenient to do so. In February she said:

"Nurses on £150 a week who have to pay £41 a week in income tax and national insurance contributions . . . pay too much."—[Official Report, 24 February 1987; Vol. 111, c. 134.]

Why the sudden conversion? Why the sudden concern?

In 1978-79 a nurse paid 25 per cent. of her earnings in tax and national insurance. After seven years of Conservatism she now pays 27·5 per cent. and more on VAT than previously. Today nurses' total direct tax bill is still higher than it was under Labour and they pay twice as much on VAT.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: No.

If nurses or any workers on £150 a week were the Government's genuine concern, the Government would have introduced a reduced rate band, increased allowances above the inflation rate or cut national insurance contributions. If the poorly paid were the Government's real concern, the Government would have helped the lower income groups during the past seven years, not the highest paid 5 per cent.—the only people significantly to benefit from Tory tax policy. Nurses, and indeed the low-paid in general, are being used as an excuse for making changes which are designed for and help most the highest paid. If the Chancellor and the Prime Minister asked a typical nurse to choose between across-the-board tax cuts and extra investment in the Health Service, that nurse would choose an improved Health Service without hesitation.

As the debate continues I hope that we shall be spared nonsense about lower tax rates yielding higher tax revenues by encouraging harder work. That view does not stand a moment's examination and finds absolutely no support in the study of the subject which the Government commissioned from Professor C. V. Brown. Tax yields from the high-paid have increased because primary incomes have rocketed for reasons wholly unrelated to lower marginal tax rates. The Treasury's own figures confirm that the earnings of the richest 10 per cent. have risen six times as fast as the earnings of the lowest 10 per cent. Is there any hon. Member, even on the Conservative Benches who will pretend for a moment that the big bang salaries in the City — the City salaries which the Chancellor compared with telephone numbers — have come about because of lower marginal tax rates? They have come about because of greed. Cuts in the standard rate of tax across the board are not necessary for our economy and I do not believe that they are the choice or wish of our people.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Every survey confirms that standard rate tax cuts are not even the priority of the highly paid. The British Institute of Management, speaking for the men and women, who, according to the Prime Minister, need extra incentives and will leave the country if they do not get them, found that three quarters of its members, anticipating this year's Budget, preferred improved services to tax cuts. The summary of its survey states:

"The principal message put forward was that managers preferred some specific increase in government spending to a cut in taxation."

I invite the Chief Secretary to answer this question directly: why was the cut in the basic rate more important to the Government than an improved Health Service and higher pensions? Why was it more important than more textbooks in schools and an end to the crisis of homelessness? Why, above all, was that cut more important than a cut in unemployment? I hope that the Chief Secretary will not further enhance his reputation for keeping the truth at arm's length with the pretence that a general cut in income tax—the general reflation, about which the Government used to be so scathing—is the best way of fulfilling their obligation to reduce unemployment.

Last month at Question Time I asked the Chief Secretary whether he found the repetition of fraudulent statistics demeaning and he assured me and the House that he did not. With his recently acquired frankness, I trust that he will now admit that the Treasury's economic model demonstrates that tax cuts are the most expensive, least effective and most economically damaging way of encouraging additional jobs.

The Chancellor talked to us about unemployment and employment yesterday and gave us some figures. I would like to ask the Chief Secretary to give today the true figures for the unemployment record that the Government can, rightly, boast. But since he would be reluctant to do that, I propose to do it for him. The Government's unemployment record does not put them in a position which justifies their denial of and refusal to accept all the advice that they are given about how unemployment can be cut.

Since the Government were elected we have lost 750,000 jobs in the British economy—more than the rest of the European Economic Community put together. The whole of the reduction in unemployment last year is accounted for by either special measures or changes in the method of calculation. The triumph which the Government proclaim and the Chancellor attempted to proclaim yesterday is the product of schemes, special measures and statistical manipulation.

The Labour party believes that the money at the Chancellor's disposal should have been used to put Britain back to work in real jobs. At a net average cost of £6 billion the unemployment register could be cut by 1 million in two years. There is now no doubt that the money is available. Yesterday the Chancellor had at his disposal easily enough to finance Labour's job programe. It is not that he could not afford to put Britain back to work; he chose not to put Britain back to work.

We set out a week ago the details of our programme, which should have formed the centrepiece of this year's Budget. The Budget should have been built around four elements. The first is an expansion of employment in the private sector, stimulated by new investment and the carefully targeted incentive of reductions in national insurance contributions in selected areas.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: The second is the introduction of genuine skill training to make the British work force in the next 10 years the best trained in Europe and in the short term to begin to redress the scandalous neglect of training which has accompanied the seven-year cycle. The third is investment of public sector capital in new and improved houses, roads, schools, hospitals and sewers. The fourth is investment in public services — teachers, nurses and home helps.

The jobs that we intend to create are real jobs which people need and will be glad to pay for. There was a time when the Prime Minister was in favour of real jobs. Before the 1979 election in Birmingham she said that the Tories would reduce unemployment — I promise you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that she said that, incredible though it now seems — by "creating the conditions for real jobs, not artificial ones, so that once again the products stream from our factories and workshops whilst the customers of the world scramble over each other to buy them."

That is now the sickest joke of the Prime Minister's seven years — although I know that there is much competition for that accolade. The exact opposite of her promise is what has happened. We are scrambling over ourselves to buy foreign goods. Our factories and workshops are starved of new investment. The Government, far from relying on real jobs to reduce unemployment, rely for their propaganda on the manipulation of statistics by Lord Young's inventions. If he were truly confident of a fall in unemployment I doubt whether even he would resort to such tactics.

The most deplorable of all the schemes and inventions are the job clubs, at which young men and women are obliged to play kindergarten games as the price which they must pay for continued unemployment benefit. I will give the House an example of one of the kindergarten games as seen on television. Young men and women were required to go to the jobcentre and take it in turns to have a piece of paper pinned on their back. Then other members of the group wrote on that paper their opinion of the person wearing the label. Would the Chancellor risk that in the Cabinet?

The only positive and specific proposal for the reduction of unemployment which the Chancellor made yesterday was the quadrupling of the number of job club places. It seems that there is nothing to which the Secretary of State for Employment will not stoop in order to massage the unemployment statistics. I make it clear that we would not contemplate such schemes. It was clear when the Chancellor lost his temper on radio this morning how vulnerable he feels on this issue.

I repeat that we will create real jobs. There are thousands of projects which are essential to the economic well-being of this country and which need to be organised within the public sector. Many of them—roads, houses, new hospitals and schools — will be commissioned by public authorities from private sector contractors. The rehabilitation of dilapidated housing in Birmingham and the replacement of crumbling sewers in Manchester is real work, as is the work done by nurses, teachers and home helps. So is the work generated by new investment in the nationalised industries, not the padding of their payrolls but the new capital work which the chairmen of those industries have already told us needs to be done, which they want to do, but which they are prevented from doing by the arbitrary and artificial limits placed on their power to raise and invest capital.

Of course, the achievement of those plans obliges inflation to be kept in firm check and interest rates to be reduced. That requires that firm decisions be taken about spending and borrowing. I propose to make Labour's position clear on both subjects.

We are committed during our first two years to the job creation programme which I have described and the anti-poverty programme to which I shall turn in a moment. the anti-poverty programme will be financed by redistribution. There will be higher taxes on the highest paid 5 per cent. of taxpayers, the only major recipients of the long-promised tax cuts, recipients whose cumulative annual tax cuts now total £3·6 billion. The cost of Labour's job programme can be met out of the Chancellor's own fiscal adjustments, though, of course, it requires that borrowing be kept at the level which last year the Chancellor was happy to recommend to the House as a mark of prudence. That will keep indebtedness well below the level which is accepted by our more successful competitors. The rational measure of borrowing is the public sector financial deficit, which we will hold below 4 per cent. of national income. Indeed, under our proposals the ratio of debt to national income will fall. The increase in borrowing which we propose for the economy as a whole is the equivalent of a man on £10,000 a year borrowing an extra £150. That is why the increase in Government borrowing is a burden which most families will gladly carry in order to ensure jobs for their families, friends and neighbours.

Since the Chancellor is mumbling to me about the problems of increased borrowing, I will ask him now to answer a simple question. Is it the problems of higher borrowing that cause the unacceptable levels of interest rates? Did he cut borrowing in order to reduce interest rates? Is he still arguing that the weakness in our policy is the relationship between borrowing and interest rates?

The Chancellor says not a word. On any other occasion during the last five years he would have leapt to his feet and told us that of course everybody knows — every economic illiterate, including the shadow Chancellor — that borrowing and interest rates are intimately linked; the more we borrow, the higher the interest rates, and we must borrow less in order that interest rates can be cut. At some time, unbeknown to us, the Chancellor has been wholly converted, for it says in his own Red Book, under what is still called, poignantly, "The Medium Term Financial Strategy":

"Private sector borrowing has been rising and is now over 10 per cent. of GDP. It has clearly contributed more than public borrowing to upward pressure on real interest rates."

What is all the fuss about? Why is he not attacking the private borrowing boom that he complained about? Why is he still talking in terms of a policy which his own financial statement and Budget report now denounce?

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury) rose——

Mr. Hattersley: I hold the view that for a sustained policy of industrial investment interest rates must be reduced below the figure at which they stand today. Despite all yesterday's rejoicing, real interest rates in Britain, assuming a 1 per cent. reduction, remain higher than those in America, Japan and Germany. They are still higher than at any time before the election of this Government. All yesterday's announcement will provide is a return to the interest rates which prevailed during the Conservative party conference. All yesterday's provisions will result in is interest rates at the level at which they stood when the Chancellor was holding them down in October in order to guarantee the Prime Minister's standing ovation. Since then he has been holding them up to ensure a good reception for his Budget, selling sterling in order to postpone the full cut of 1 per cent. until today and in consequence holding back reductions in mortgage rates in order that the good news should be associated with yesterday's Budget statement.

The Chancellor must know that we shall have persistently high interest rates whilst there remains uncertainty about our ability to move into a balance of payments surplus.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South) rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Were British interest rates to be reduced to anything like those which our competitors enjoy, the pressure on sterling which a series of bad balance of payments figures is bound to create would hit us at once. The myth that the market determines interest rates has been exploded by the way in which the Chancellor held them down during the Conservative party conference and held them up before the Budget. He is still holding them at an unacceptably high level. Were he to do anything else, sterling would still collapse. We will not get the right level of interest rates without a change in economic policy. That new policy must be about the real economy, about investment, output, exports and, above all, jobs.

I repeat that in this Budget the Government have once more turned their back on the unemployed, who suffer the most corrosive form of poverty.

Two weeks ago Mr. George Will, the distinguished Washington Post journalist, whose enthusiasm for President Reagan is almost as great as the Prime Minister's, told me that the Chancellor had described 3 million unemployed as "manageable". Ever anxious to do the Chancellor credit, I reminded Mr. Will that when that report had appeared in newspapers the Chancellor had denied that he ever said it. Mr. Will replied:

"He said it. He said it to me."

To Labour, 3 million officially registered unemployed is not simply unmanageable but intolerable, and we will not tolerate it. Nor will we tolerate the continued poverty which is made all the more morally indefensible by the Government's claims of economic success.

If we are doing so well, why cannot we help the hard-pressed families, the pensioners and the long-term unemployed? The Chancellor by implication has already rejected, and no doubt the Chief Secretary directly in a few moments will reject, the view that the money he had to spend yesterday would have been better spent on job creation. He is therefore left with another choice. If he rejects the Labour party's plan for financing improved pensions and higher benefits by higher taxes on the top 5 per cent. of earners, why does he regard another cut—yesterday's cut in the basic rate of income tax—as more important than, for example, allowing pensioners to live in comfort and dignity? Why does he think that a cut in inheritance tax is more important than increasing child benefit?

The Labour party believes that action could and should be taken in three areas. First, the retirement pension should be increased by £5 a week for a single pensioner and by £8 for a pensioner couple. Secondly, child benefit should be increased by £3 a week; that is the most precisely targeted way of reducing family poverty, yet its real value has been allowed to fall since 1979. Thirdly, long-term supplementary benefit should be extended to the long-term unemployed. Despite all Lord Young's machinations and manipulations, the official total of men and women out of work for more than a year is higher than total unemployment in 1979. Today to the hopelessness of long-term unemployment is added the indignity of inadequate benefit.

I have no hesitation in asking the most highly paid 5 per cent. of the population to finance those three proposals. Many of the top earners would understand the necessity to do so, because they know that choices have to be made. Today there are 50,000 taxpayers with an income of more than £70,000 a year. They have benefited from income tax cuts by an annual total of £880 million. The average cut before the Budget was worth £19,000 a year; that is, £367 a week. What sort of society and what sort of Government give the rich a tax bonanza of an extra £50 a day but will not increase retirement pensions by £5 a week? The answer to that question is a Government obsessed with power and cynical about principle, a Government anxious to paper over the crack of potential economic catastrophe, at least until they get the election over.

The Economist, hardly the Labour party's friend, judges that had the Government published the honest and accurate balance of payment figures in 1986 sterling would have slumped out of control. The Government know that on existing policies their present strategy cannot be sustained. City forecaster Phillips and Drew judges that the markets are holding their breath for an early election and expects an immediate reversal of policies afterwards.

The Government are holding their breath as well. They have a majority in the House of 144. They have more than a year to run. Why then, except for the fear of economic crisis, are the Government preparing for a snap election? The tactic is transparently obvious. There is no need for the Conservative party to waste money on Saatchi and Saatchi. The slogan has alread been published—vote now, pay later.

In preparation for that, this is a Budget for the next few weeks, not for the next few years; a Budget to bribe selected voters. It offers no hope to the unemployed and no assistance to education, health, housing or pensioners. It ignores poverty. It divides the nation. On the Labour Benches we have enough faith in the public to believe that the Budget will be dismissed with contempt.

Mr. Yeo: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. About 45 minutes ago the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) told the House in response to an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) that he would explain how a £28 billion spending spree——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. It is clear that the hon. Gentleman is raising a point of argument, not a point of order.

Mr. Baldry: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Yesterday Mr. Deputy Speaker reminded House that it was traditional for the Chancellor to be listened to in silence. Does that apply also to other speeches during this debate because it was extraordinary that the Shadow Chancellor seemed totally unprepared to give way to any right hon. or hon. Gentleman. Is that simply because he is frit at being confronted by the arguements?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is the normal convention that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day, when he is delivering his Budget statement, is listened to without interruption. But that does not apply to other right hon. and hon. Gentlemen whether they are speaking from the Front Benches or the Back Benches.

5.25 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook, (Mr. Hattersley) made a long, though hapless and completely unconvincing, attack on the Budget. He tried to claim that it was not prudent. No one will believe him. He said it could not be sustained. I assure him that it will be. He displayed extraordinary views when he described this party as a party that was cynical of principle. I recall that it was the right hon. Gentleman who said, "Whatever the Labour party stands for, I support." The way in which he has repudiated his beliefs over nuclear defence demonstrates that absolutely.

I can understand his difficulties. What the right hon. Gentleman cannot stomach is the thought that in the Chancellor's Budget and in the public expenditure White Paper before it we are seeing for the coming year in the most positive and clearest way the fruits of the success of our economic policies, prudently and persistently applied. Far from being transient, as the right hon. Gentleman tried to suggest, they are solidly based on good foundations and strong public finances. I repeat straight away to him that the Budget will be sustained. For what we are seeing now is an economic hat trick — [Interruption.] It is interesting that, because they are afraid to hear the good news, Opposition Members try to prevent anyone speaking on this side. They simply sit and shout — hardly a contribution to a serious economic debate.

The economic hat trick is a hat trick of good news. It is important to take all the items together — a £4·7 billion increase in public spending in the coming year concentrated on our high priority areas such as the Health Service, education care and support for the sick, disabled and those in need; a £3 billion reduction in the public sector borrowing requirement to maintain prudence and keep borrowing and inflation low; and a £2·6 billion cut in taxes to give back to people more of what they have earned and to provide incentives for continued economic progress. To that today we can add the 0·5 per cent. reduction in interest rates in response to the Budget and the 0·5 per cent. reduction last week in anticipation of it.

The reason that we are able to have all three is that we now have a strong economy because we have followed from the outset a clear medium-term prospectus for sound, steady finances, together with a whole bank of measures to improve our economic and industrial performance and to release the British people's energies and enterprise.

That the country is now getting the benefit of higher spending, lower borrowing and lower taxes is not due to luck. It is because we have now had six years of healthy, balanced growth, close to 3 per cent. a year on average. Year in and year out we have continued steadily upwards, building up a strength durable enough to withstand two whirlwinds—the collapse of our oil revenues and a long and costly coal strike.

In the stop-start years of the 1960s and 1970s, events of much lesser magnitude threw the economy out of kilter and brought growth to a halt. Now we are strong enough to take them in our stride.

After decades of falling ever further behind our competitors, we are beginning to show the way. In the 1960s, ours was the slowest growing of the major European economies. The same was true in the 1970s. In the 1980s, however, we have been growing faster than any of our major European rivals.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): We heard all that yesterday. Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why he only gives statistics from 1981? Does he not recognise that this country suffered the greatest slump of any country in 1980 and 1981?

If there have been six years of economic growth, why is manufacturing output still not back to its level of 1979, and why is manufacturing investment still 20 per cent. below it?

Mr. MacGregor: I am deliberately including the whole of the 1980s. The position since 1979 is quite simple, as the hon. Gentleman knows, and as we have often said in the House. We faced a worldwide recession during that period, with a heavily disabled and uncompetitive British industry that was over-manned and riddled with restrictive practices. Today all that is much changed.

A reinvigorated British industry — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I am coming to the point now. Company profitability is now the highest for over 20 years — the highest since 1964. Company profits are one and a half times as high as in 1980, over and above the effect of inflation. That is now showing up in tax revenues, despite a corporation tax rate that is lower than that in any other major industrial nation, although the United States is now set to emulate us.

A key reason for this success is the dramatic improvement that manufacturing companies have made in productivity. In the 1960s and 1970s, productivity growth was well below that of our competitors. However, in the 1980s our manufacturing productivity has gone up faster than that in Germany, the United States and Japan.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): The right hon. Gentleman speaks of productivity. Will he now tell us about manufacturing output, and answer the question put to him a moment ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw)?

Mr. MacGregor: I am coming to that. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook tried to put the resurgence of the British economy today down to what he called a consumer boom. Once again, the facts belie such an argument. Since the present upswing began, investment has gone up by an average of 4 per cent. a year, faster than consumption and twice as fast as the European average. That pattern is set to continue, with investment and manufacturing output and exports set to rise by 4 per cent. in 1987. In this Parliament we have seen manufacturing productivity growth of over 4 per cent. a year, and manufacturing output up by over 10 per cent., with a further rise of 4 per cent. forecast for 1987. Manufacturing export volumes are up by 30 per cent.

Mr. Raynsford: Juggling the figures.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman well knows that I have also explained the position from 1979 to 1981. I have given the figures for the 1980s and for the life of this Parliament. They all show big increases in manufacturing productivity, investment and exports. By contrast, in Labour's upswing from 1975 to 1979, investment rose by only 1·25 per cent. a year—compared with the 4 per cent. that we are achieving—with consumption rising faster than investment. It is a bit rich—indeed, it is a travesty of the record—for the Opposition to speak as they do in their recent so-called policy document about the need to stimulate investment.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is still trying to peddle a myth. I had thought that he would give it up—he has used it often before, and always been wrong—but perhaps it is all he has. The myth is that there is something fragile about the present strength, and that there is a stop around the corner. Perhaps that is because the right hon. Gentleman was so used to both problems in office. Quite apart from the fact that that has not happened in the past six years, other evidence that is independent of the Government confirms what I am saying. The last CBI monthly inquiry reported a sharp improvement in firms' total order books and export order books. Over a third of firms in the survey expected to increase their output over the coming months.

The Association of British Chambers of Commerce, not always the most optimistic of bodies, confirms the CBI view. Its latest survey reveals higher orders and more firms expecting to increase investment and employ more people. Those improvements are taking place across the country. Only last week the Engineering Employers Federation reinforced the positive outlook.

If confirmation were needed, both of business optimism and that the Budget contains the right strategy for business and jobs, it comes from the industry itself. The House will have noted that the CBI has said that the Budget is good for business and reinforces business success—just what it wanted. That is a much better barometer of the prospects for industry and jobs arising out of the Budget than anything that the opposition parties might say, because it comes from people who are actually improving our industrial performance.

No wonder then that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook clutches at straws. He points again to the position on the current account of the balance of payments. But the Chancellor's forecast of a £2·5 billion deficit is only 0·5 per cent. of GDP, compared with an average of 1·25 per cent. of GDP under the Labour Government. It is backed by the strength of our overseas assets, which are thought to have risen to around £110 billion by the end of 1986—four times higher as a percentage of GDP than when we took office. That is bound to stand the country in good stead as long as a Conservative Government remain in office to ensure that those assets are not frittered away.

Instead, the right hon. Gentleman resorts to predictions. For some months he has been telling us that there is a crisis around the corner, and that we are about to cut and run. However, I have just told him that is not how industry thinks. His predictions have been lamentably and persistently wrong. The right hon. Gentleman is not much good with the crystal ball. His balls have a habit of breaking apart in his hands.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor, in his speech to this House on 20 January this year—Hansard c. 775—catalogued the way in which, ever since the last election, the right hon. Gentleman's forecasts of gloom—[Interruption.] I understand why the right hon. Gentleman does not want to listen to this. His forecasts of gloom have turned out to be wrong: on inflation in 1983, on growth in 1984 and on living standards in 1985.

In 1986, casting about for another statistic to predict wrongly, the right hon. Gentleman said that there would be no significant fall in unemployment before the next election. Yet in the past six months the most significant fall since 1973 has taken place.

The right hon. Gentleman's prediction for 1987 is that the tax cuts that my right hon. Friend has just announced will be unsustainable and that when we are re-elected we shall have to reverse them. He should look at the Red Book. He will see there the strength of our finances. The only reversal—I grant that it would mean a big increase in taxes—would occur if the right hon. Gentleman, disastrously, ever got the chance to carry out his policies.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was not straight with the taxpayer? My right hon. Friend's Budget reduced the average taxpayer's tax by £3 a week, but if the Shadow Chancellor ever brought in a Budget he would claw back not £3, but more likely £6 or even £9 a week from the average taxpayer.

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is right. My point was that, year after year, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has made predictions of gloom which have proved to be wholly wrong. The right hon. Gentleman must have been the kind of person that Noel Coward had in mind when he wrote his song

"There are bad times just around the corner".

As one of the lines tells us:

"the reds and the pinks believe that England stinks."

I shall now look in more detail at the three aspects of the economic hat trick. First, I shall deal with public expenditure. Although for reasons of public sector management and planning we announce the public expenditure plans in the autumn, it is right that in this debate we should look at them together with the Budget changes, because all are relevant for next year.

I repeat: our public finances are strong, so we have been able to plan for a significant increase in public spending next year of £4·75 billion—an increase which will be sustainable and which will not impose undue burdens on the taxpayer and the economy. The point I wish to underline is that, as in previous years, we have provided the extra resources for the programmes to which we attach the highest priority.

The biggest increase in the White Paper—and a substantial one—was for education, with extra provision across all sectors. On health, we are building on the 26 per cent. real increase in spending on the Health Service that has occurred since we took office.

Mr. Raynsford: What about hospitals?

Mr. MacGregor: We are building many more hospitals, as the hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well. We have provided next year for a further 2·8 per cent. real growth in net Health Service spending. We are building on the 20 per cent. increase in spending on the roads programme that has occurred since we took office. That programme includes 600 miles of new motorways and trunk roads. Our plans provide for an 8 per cent. real-terms increase next year. On housing, we are able to provide for a further £11 billion of spending over the survey period, following on the 40 per cent. real-terms increase in spending on renovation since 1978-79.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned employment and training measures. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment will speak about those tomorrow. In the coming year we will spend about £3·1 billion on employment and training. I note that despite all the scorn poured on our measures by the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) the Opposition now include in their jobs package the kind of measures that we have in the employment and training programme — a programme which is on a scale much larger than Britain has ever seen before.

Finally, our law and order programmes provide for an increase to meet the Home Secretary's commitment to increased police manpower given at last year's Police Federation conference. In that and in a number of other programmes we are building on a 40 per cent. increase in real terms in law and order spending since we took office.

That is a substantial increase in public spending but none of it is at the expense of the prudent management of our public finances. I need say little about the reduction of £3 billion in the public sector borrowing requirement. It has already been widely and favourably commented on. One newspaper this morning described the general reaction to it as "admirably prudent and confidence building".

I simply make three points. First, it is the clearest of signs to all that, within a careful and prudent course which is sustainable now and for the longer term, we have been able to increase public spending and make a modest reduction in tax. Secondly, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been able to get the PSBR down to 1 per cent. of GDP—its appropriate level for the longer term — and has declared his firm intention of keeping it there. Thirdly, this is in marked contrast to both the Labour party and the Liberals and SDP, whose policy proposals for the coming year, as we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman, would have resulted in substantially higher PSBRs and higher taxes. The right hon. Gentleman claims that he wants to see interest rates come down, but the policies that he advocates would push interest rates and the mortgage rate in only one direction—and that is up.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about our tax measures. I grant that we have still to reach our target. We shall reach it, but only when it is safe to do so through the continued success of our economy. The Labour party makes no bones about where it stands. It would put up taxes—and not only by the 2p reduction in this Budget. Combined with the other tax changes that it proposes it would, if it ever got the chance, in its very first Budget have a level of taxes far higher than the levels now. But that would not be all, because to meet their other spending plans a Labour Government would later have to put them up further still. The Opposition are daily making it clear that they are a high-taxing, high-spending, high-interest rate, high-inflation party with policies for a level of taxation which is far higher than when they left office.

I understand that the SDP and the Liberals will vote against the tax cuts, but as usual, what they will do after that is not clear. As usual, they will oppose a little bit and then forget it. I suspect that they do not have the courage of their temporary convictions. By contrast, we believe that lower rates of income tax are good for incentives and stimulate enterprise. We also believe in greater choice for people to spend more of their own earnings as they would wish, including on essentials.

Last year we had much debate about the choice between allowances and basic rate reductions. I believe that the case for the latter is now very much better understood. Until last year we had been concentrating on raising the allowances, so that they are now 22 per cent. higher in real terms since we took office, and the married man's allowance is at the highest level since the war. But there is a strong case, both last year and this, for concentrating on the basic rate. It is not just the starting point at which one pays tax that matters. It is also the effect of the marginal rate on every extra pound earned once one has started paying tax. It is most of all the marginal rate which has an effect on incentives.

The cut in the basic rate improves incentives for nearly 21 million taxpayers of working age, 94 per cent. of the total, whose marginal rate is the basic rate. It improves incentives for everybody paying tax at the basic rate including — and this is important — unincorporated businesses and the self-employed, while an increase of equivalent cost in the allowances improves incentives only for those people taken out of tax. Moreover, under 10 per cent. of the 1·2 million who would have been taken out of tax by such an increase are families with children. It was right to concentrate again this year on the basic rate.

We have again designed the income tax package so that it benefits as many people as possible and, as last year, we have limited the benefits for those paying the highest rates of tax. All income tax rates need to come down if we are to remain competitive with those countries which are also currently making substantial changes in income taxes—including reductions in their top rate, but we thought it right this year to give priority to reducing the marginal rate for the largest number of taxpayers. Let there be no doubt about the beneficial effect on living standards of these changes. The rates and allowance changes combined mean about £4 a week extra for married men and single people on average earnings.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about nurses. I can tell him that a nurse earning £155 a week will be £2·64 better off because next year she will pay £40·72 a week in tax and national insurance compared to £43·36 now. It was interesting to hear what the right hon. Gentleman said about that nurse, and I should like to make a number of points in response. First, he ought to take into account that in real terms the income of nurses is up by 33 per cent. compared to 1979. Secondly, he concentrated his suggestions on the reduced rate band. I should like to make three points about the reduced rate band. For the 2p off the basic rate that we are proposing the right hon. Gentleman would get a band of only £1,300 at 20 per cent. —not a very significant difference to incentives.

Thirdly, it would reduce the marginal rate for single people earning less than £72 a week. The nurse that the right hon. Gentleman talked about would find her marginal rate reduced by that proposal. When the right hon. Gentleman's party left office there was a reduced rate band at 25p. He will recognise that ere long we shall not just have a reduced rate band at 25p, we shall have the basic rate at 25p.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about living standards. Most significantly of all, following the Budget changes the effect of wages and tax changes combined mean that in real terms the take-home pay for a married man without children on average earnings will be up since 1979 by 22·5 per cent. It will be up over 18 per cent. for the same man on half average earnings. That compares with a 1 per cent. fall and only a 2·4 per cent. increase respectively over the whole lifetime of the Labour Government.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has again laboured over his claim that tax reductions mean jobs in Cologne or Tokyo—in Germany or Japan, as he put it today—rather than here. Of course, he will know that the consumer is free to exercise his choice on which goods in the shops he wishes to buy, and it is up to British industry to ensure that its goods are competitive in quality, design and price, as increasingly it is doing, so that the consumer is attracted to them. But I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to reflect also on this: wage increases put money in people's pockets just as much as do tax reductions. Is he really saying that he is opposed to further wages increases of any sort, because that, too, gives people the chance to buy goods that were made in Germany or Japan?

Indeed, I would go further. Bigger wage increases, unearned by higher productivity, make British goods less competitive and add to inflation. Tax reductions, because increasingly they should have an impact on wage demands, have the opposite effect. For a married man or average earnings this year's Budget is equivalent, in itself, to a 2·7 per cent. pay increase without adding a penny to industry's costs. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook should reflect before he argues that again. I hope that this change will be reflected in pay bargaining.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State will be speaking more fully in the debate later about the income tax relief to encourage the spread of profit-related pay. Those firms that already have profit-related pay schemes generally believe that they have worked well. The relief now proposed to stimulate these arrangements could be equivalent to a further 4p reduction in the basic rate of tax for a married man on average earnings whose company takes maximum advantage of the scheme with 20 per cent. of pay profit-related. I believe that this initiative will over time make a significant contribution to tackling the problems of the inflexibility of the labour market and will reinforce the many other measures that the Government have taken to make the economy work more efficiently.

There are two other major tax packages in the Budget to which I wish to refer. As a former Minister with special responsibility for small businesses, I am delighted that, as with all other previous Budgets under this Government, there is yet again a substantial small business package. This year it amounts to £115 million of revenue forgone in 1987-88 and £105 million in 1988-89, without taking account of the benefit of the income tax reduction on unincorporated businesses and the self-employed. But it is only when one looks at the complete effect of the tax changes, the totality over all our Budgets, that one appreciates the full impact. For example, the successive reductions in the small business corporation tax rate, down another 2p this year, mean that since 1979 the rate has come down from 42p to 27p. That is by any standard a distinct and substantial change.

The business expansion scheme, which has again been further improved this year, not only has helped directly to fill the equity gap for small businesses which for decades was inhibiting growth—raising over £400 million in the first three years—but has been one of a number of Government measures which have transformed the climate for venture capital investment as a whole. Between 1979 and 1985 this increased fourtyfold in the United Kingdom. Indeed, the United Kingdom now accounts for almost half the venture capital in the whole of the European Community.

But, like many of my hon. Friends, I find that one of the biggest complaints from small businesses is that of late payment of bills. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment—the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier)—has done all that he can to persuade the large companies especially to ensure prompt and due payment of bills. This Budget now contains a substantial help from the Chancellor for hundreds of thousands of small businesses in this respect.

The House will note that in introducing his VAT cash accounting package my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has gone far beyond the proposals in our consultative document. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook tried to claim credit for this measure by saying that it had been raised last year by the Opposition. He demonstrated his ignorance of the VAT changes in the Budget and of what the Opposition tried to do last year. I assure him that, although the Opposition raised one VAT point, they certainly did not raise this. Our consultative document proposed this change in the autumn and it is we who are bringing it forward. Provided we obtain European Commission approval, the option of cash accounting will be available to businesses with turnovers of up to £250,000—a substantial improvement over the £100,000 which we originally proposed. This covers more than 800,000 businesses—well over half all VAT registered traders.

The cash accounting scheme will mean that businesses do not have to pay VAT until they are paid by their customers. If their customers fail to pay at all, no VAT will be due, thus giving automatic relief for bad debts. The total cost of that measure in the coming year will be £100 million. I believe that increasingly the significance of this change will be appreciated and very warmly welcomed throughout the small business community.

As with small businesses, so with popular capitalism.

Mr. Raymford: Ha, ha.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman does not even begin to know what it means, but the enthusiasm for both is spreading fast. Popular capitalism not only is here to stay but is on the brink of transforming social attitudes, indeed society itself.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred yesterday to the continued spread of home ownership, now the ambition of the vast majority of young people. He spoke of the remarkable extent to which millions more are becoming direct share owners, as revealed by recent research which the Government and the stock exchange have undertaken.

Two other important aspects of this Budget which also develop popular capitalism have not yet, in my view, received sufficient attention. The first is the changes in inheritance tax. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor explained, these have been concentrated on the smaller estates, particularly with the increase in the threshold from £71,000 to £90,000. This will take about a third of estates out of inheritance tax altogether. The increase in the threshold gives the greatest proportionate reduction to the smaller estates which are the least likely to have gained from the abolition of the lifetime charge last year and where the family home is often the main asset.

But its significance for popular capitalism is this: over the next decade or two, we shall see a very substantial number of families inheriting for the first time that are for them very sizeable free assets, as a result of the earlier spread of home ownership and of course, in particular, the right-to-buy schemes for council houses. That means that they will have considerable resources to invest. They will not simply have their occupational pension and perhaps very modest proceeds from a life policy. They will have the funds to invest directly, to have greater choice and to build up more substantial savings under their own control for their retirement than ever before.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sorry, but I do not have time to give way again.

This leads me to the second aspect — the pensions package in this Budget. It builds on the various measures to promote private pension provision already put on to the statute book by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, but it goes further. The proposal to allow employees to make additional voluntary contributions, outside their employers' scheme, introduces a further new dimension of choice to the pension scene.

I should like to stress the wider significance of these measures. They will give everybody more choice in how they provide for their retirement. They will allow a much greater sense of ownership of pension rights. They will make it easier for people to take their pensions with them when they change jobs. They will result in more people having their own pension on top of what the state provides.

Here, too, there is a significance which clearly escapes the Opposition. In the past, all the emphasis when discussing pensioners and their future was on the basic state retirement pension; and on this the Government have more than fulfilled their commitment with an increase in April which means, over the past 18 months, an increase of £5·95 in the pension for a married man. But increasingly as we look at the position of pensioners as a whole, that basic pension will assume much less importance. Already, in 1985, the average married pensioner household had a weekly income of just over £115, more than twice the basic state pension for a married couple, which was then £57 a week. Some of the balance comes from the state earnings-related pension scheme and other state benefits, of course, but a substantial and increasing proportion comes from occupational pensions and income from savings.

As far as SERPS is concerned, a man on average earnings retiring in 1979 would have received 95p a week but his equivalent retiring in 1986 now receives £16·25—41 per cent. of pensioners had occupational pensions in 1979, 51 per cent. in 1985. More tellingly, the number of pensioner households with investment income has risen from 62 per cent. in 1979 to 71 per cent. in 1985, nearly three quarters of the total.

The Government's policies for pensioners are much more attuned to the needs of the last part of the 20th century and much more in pensioners' interests than those of the Labour party. Through the added encouragement to private pensions provision featured again in this Budget, we are extending the ability of our citizens to build up much bigger savings of their own for their old age. Through the reduction in income tax and the abolition of the investment income surcharge we are reducing for the retired the burden of tax on the income from those savings. By developing an economy with low inflation we are protecting the capital value of those savings.

This is a Budget which will help to keep inflation down, and the pensioner is a clear beneficiary from low inflation. When inflation was rampant under Labour, the gaps between increases in the state basic pension meant that a pensioner's standard of living was falling sharply every week. The pensioner's income was growing less and buying less, and his capital was dwindling away.

So this is indeed a good Budget for pensioners, present and prospective. I remind hon. Members on the Opposition Benches who ask about pensioners that under the last Labour Government the average income of pensioners increased by 0·6 per cent. a year in real terms. Under this Government the annual real increase has been 2·7 per cent.—over four times as much. They made the same promises in 1974 as the right hon. Gentleman has made today, and look what happened. It is far better to deliver than to promise and so completely to fail.

I referred earlier to Labour's so-called alternative Budget. That is what the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is prepared to own up to. But it is only a small part of the spending plans to which the Labour party is committed. I have been keeping a careful track of statements made by Labour spokesmen since I issued a detailed list of their spending commitments last July. I have taken due note of the statement of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East in the House on 6 November that the Labour party has abandoned its pledge to introduce a 35-hour week, a minimum wage, and a policy to introduce early retirement. I am sure that it will have been of great interest to many in the Labour party to know that it has given up these pledges. But I accept it. I have, therefore, removed these from my table of Labour's spending commitments.

But not all spokesmen for the Labour party have been as careful and studied about what they say as the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East. We have witnessed a stream of further pledges from the Labour party, including pledges on pensions, energy, the Christmas bonus, a winter premium, alcohol abuse, Scottish devolution, crime prevention grants, and a pledge to increase health spending. I have to tell the House that with these new pledges — and the hon. Gentleman is nodding — taken on board and the abandoned pledges removed, the full-year cost of Labour's spending plans now totals around £34 billion. This sum would represent a basic rate of income tax of 56p in the pound or an increase in value added tax to 49 per cent. Nothing could point up more sharply the contrast in the Budget and spending policies being put before the House—at least here I agree with the right hon. Gentleman: there is a contrast.

For the Labour party it is the old story: cash in on the resources of others; cash in on the success of others. Let others earn and we shall spend the fruits; we shall go further, irrespective of the costs in taxes, borrowing and interest rates.

This Budget builds on the successes of recent years. It is good for the economy, good for business and that means good for jobs. And it is built to last.

6.3 pm

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): I congratulate the Chief Secretary on being somewhat more succinct than the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), though perhaps not all that much. I will endeavour to improve on both, in that respect at least.

It would be churlish not to recognise that 1986-87 has turned out better for the Chancellor than I expected a year ago or than the City expected last October when his Mansion House speech aroused scepticism rather than confidence. Nor should one begrudge a Chancellor a bit of short-term luck. Anyone who holds the office of Chancellor—I am referring to the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, of course—has so many hazards to contend with that he is entitled to enjoy it when something goes right. As Adlai Stevenson said about flattery, "It's all right provided you don't inhale." It will be all right in this case, provided the Chancellor does not deceive himself that he has solved the underlying problems. But this is what I think he is in some danger of doing. His caution is more that of complacency than of prudence. On television last night he began by saying that the British were frightened of being accused of bad manners if they said that something was successful. I can assure the Chancellor that he is remarkably free of both aspects of this fear of his fellow countrymen.

It is also all right provided that we use the elbow room which fortune has given us in the best possible way for the future of the economy—and that, the Chancellor, in my view, has not done.

There are two main features of the Budget by which it should be judged—the reduction in income tax rates, and the reduction in public borrowing. Everything else is subsidiary, although there are some moderately important changes, some of them desirable. Neither feature exactly came as a shock to us since it had been heavily leaked for weeks past—not perhaps quite as precisely as in some previous years but certainly to an extent which would have made that famous diarist, Hugh Dalton, not only turn but gyrate in his grave with a sense of unfairness.

Both these major decisions are, on balance, mistaken. Income tax cuts would not have been our priority, and all the indications are, perhaps somewhat surprisingly, that they are not the priority of a majority of the nation either. The majority give a higher priority to jobs and to public services. It is not, therefore, a question of relentless public demand, and one must look at the economic justification, and this is extraordinarily thin. There is no question but that the impact upon unemployment is very weak per million pounds spent, or whatever other unit of management is chosen. Investment in construction, for instance, would without question produce a bigger impact on unemployment; and, almost in a causal relationship, the effect on imports, and consequently on the balance of payments, is correspondingly high.

The Chief Secretary tried to refute that by the rather surprising argument that the impact of wage increases on imports could be high too—income increases, let us say. But there is no choice between wage increases and tax reductions — at least, the connection is extremely tenuous; and if the right hon. Gentleman thinks that tax reductions automatically preclude the other, he is, from some points of view, being very optimistic.

These bring together, therefore, the small impact on unemployment and the big impact upon imports, the two glaring weaknesses in this Budget.

Mr. Baldry: Can the right hon. Gentleman help us by telling us in clear terms what basic rate of tax the Social Democratic party feels would be appropriate now and what it would introduce if it ever had any influence over a future Budget?

Mr. Jenkins: I am proceeding in what I hope is a logical order, and I will come to almost precisely that point. So often, just asking a Member to anticipate his argument instead of waiting until it comes merely wastes the time of the House. There is a good deal to be said for seeing whether it comes before one asks a question.

There is nothing directly in the Budget for jobs, and what is there indirectly is, on the whole, so tenuous as to be supportable only by asseveration and not by rational argument.

The balance of payments outlook, with a revised deficit of £2·5 billion this year, is, to say the least, insecure. However, I would not make too much of the prospect of a balance of payments deficit in itself. Indeed, our alliance proposals, although showing a better result than the Government's proposals on inflation and a markedly better one on employment, show a somewhat worse, but not dramatically worse, balance of payments outturn. It would be reasonable to go through a balance of payments deficit tunnel of several years if it took us through to a new landscape of lower unemployment and higher investment.

During the years of oil spate, as the Chief Secretary reminded us a few minutes ago, we built up great assets overseas — he said £110 billion — but put up a weak performance in both public and private investment at home. In those circumstances it would be reasonable to use some limited part of the overseas assets to float ourselves off the domestic shoals but that is not what we are offered. We are offered a drift into deficit without purpose or plan. The Chancellor talked last night about a steady hand on the tiller. That got me a little nervous. It sounded too much like one of the equally nautical but less happy utterances of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). [AN HON. MEMBER: "He is no longer your friend."] He can be my friend. He said, "Steady as she goes," in his last Budget before devaluation and his resignation. Therefore, I do not think that income tax cuts were the correct priority this year. We shall, as we have previously intimated, vote against the relevant Budget resolution.

Sir Peter Hordern rose——

Mr. Jenkins: I am sure that I shall come to the point the hon. Gentleman is seeking to make if he will wait.

The Labour party has, I understand, also picked up its courage to vote against that resolution, although it failed to do so last year when we did. If the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was in the Chamber, I should like to hear from him how he justifies that, provided it would not involve him in competing with his right hon. Friend the

[Mr. Jenkins]

Leader of the Opposition in the verbosity stakes in which the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) yesterday established a commanding lead. I remember when Lord Attlee used to reply to Budgets in seven minutes flat with a mixture of congratulation and deflation, leaving it to Hugh Gaitskell to do the job on the second day. But those were the great days of the Labour party.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook announced that the Labour party will automatically reverse the tax cuts as well as vote against them. We do not say that, for very good reasons which I shall explain to the House. Circumstances will have moved on and may well have changed. After all, the Chancellor, to his surprise, finds himself £3 billion better off than he or anyone else expected in the autumn. We are not in favour of taxation for taxation's sake, still less for envy's sake, nor do we believe in pendulum politics in which one automatically reverses what the other side has done. However, we shall certainly not pledge ourselves never to increase taxation because no Chancellor of the Exchequer or would-be Government ought to do that. If the economy and the needs of the nation demanded it, we would not hesitate to do it.

Mr. Forman: The right hon. Gentleman is taking this statesmanlike approach, as he sees it, towards economic policy and failing to give the electorate any clear guidance on his policies, whether on tax cuts or borrowing. How can he expect his policy to be taken seriously if the electorate does not know where his party stands?

Mr. Jenkins: What is the hon. Gentleman's recollection about what has happened in the past? Did he think that in 1979 the present Government and the present leader of the Government set out the exact course of taxation? Does he think that the Prime Minister announced that for years to come there would be a substantial tax burden upon nearly everyone paying tax except the very rich? In my view, the only sensible and responsible thing to do is to set out one's broad approach to such matters. Income tax cuts would not have been my priority this year. We would not automatically reverse what has been done because pendulum politics is silly, but I would reserve the right, as any sensible Government ought to do, if it is in the interest of the nation as things appear at the time, to be prepared to face up to increasing taxes.

The next main aspect of the Budget is the battening down of public borrowing. That is mistaken in the present circumstances. It is, by historical standards, a severe policy. The deadweight total of national debt is already low as a proportion of GNP and the Chancellor now proposes to maintain, as he pointed out yesterday, a lower ratio of public borrowing than in any year apart from two years since 1950. Both of those years must have been mine; one was certainly mine and the other probably was too. Therefore, I start with some strength and, it might be thought, some dialectical weakness. I refute the latter immediately. The circumstances were very different, with unemployment under 600,000. Do not let us forget Keynes's parrot, and do not let us pretend that the negative borrowing requirement of 1969-70 was a prophylactic against the depredations of Lord Barber and the dethronement of the dollar. Within a year or two, under the prim guidance of Lord Barber and the end of the Bretton Woods system, we were plunging into the great inflation.

The rational as opposed to the incantatory argument for reducing borrowing to 1 per cent. of GDP and keeping it there is that it should bring about a reduction in interest rates. I would in no way underestimate the importance of lower interest rates to business. Clearly the Confederation of British Industry and other business opinion has given priority over tax reductions this year. Also, through mortgage rates, lower interest rates are extremely important to many individuals. The question is, what is the price one pays for doing it; and, more importantly, is that the only way in which such a reduction could be achieved? I think that we could have got much the same benefit, possibly more, from full membership of the European monetary system as well as a number of other advantages, although we should have joined before the recent 6 per cent. revaluation of the pound, which is undermining many of the reasons for the present favourable conditions for export, output and revenue. The prospect of knowledge of the degree of stability would also be of considerable importance to exporters' plans.

The Chancellor and the Treasury need an explicit exchange rate target to replace the complete abandonment of the sterling M3 loan stock. This morning's edition of the Financial Times was sharp about the matter. To some extent, the Chancellor accepts that. He is not strong enough to get his way against the stubborn and now almost solitary veto of the Prime Minister. The price we pay for such chauvinistic stubborness is having to bring own interest rates by a method that precludes many other desirable actions against unemployment and poverty, in favour of vital public services and, perhaps above all, in favour of adequate training, education and research.

A small item on the front page of The Independent this morning stated:

"New scientific research in British universities will be cancelled from today, for the time being.

The Science and Engineering Research Council (SERC), which funds most of the scientific research done in universities, faces a shortfall of £8m.

The Council meets later today to try to make ends meet. Just about the only option on its agenda is to stop financing new scientific research projects for the rest of the year." It is already March.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): What about the £2 billion?

Mr. Jenkins: The £2 billion is clearly inadequate to deal with that position. The £2 billion is not directed to scientific research, either.

What is happening, as described in the article, is no way to underpin success or to safeguard the future. Can it really be argued that a PSBR of 1 per cent. rather than 1·25 per cent. is a higher priority so clear that it should be achieved at the price of damage to British science? Every leader of scientific research I have recently met—I have met rather a lot in the past few weeks—believe that that is happening under our noses.

Not only, by any stretch of the imagination, is this no Budget for jobs but it is no Budget for the growing number of the deprived in our society. I do not believe in the almost mechanical egalitarianism of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, but I believe — [Interruption.] I am not sure how much he believes. It is the duty of the state to lean firmly but unvindictively in favour of greater equality—for the natural forces all lean the other way, and, if left untrammelled, produce results that might shock even the Chancellor's conscience. But, for eight years, the Government have leaned the other way. Two thirds of the tax concessions have been given to the top 20 per cent. The effect has been accentuated by the splurge of City and some other incomes.

The results have been predictable to nearly everyone, except the Government and their more extreme apologists. They argue that if the rich are made rich enough, some wealth will spill over to make the poor less poor. There is no sign of that happening. On the contrary, the gap has widened. The number of those below the poverty line and with little hope of rising above it has grown inexorably. Connected divides become deeper and wider — that between the employed and the unemployed, that between the north and south, and that between those who share prosperity and those to whom it looks like a closed fortress. The Budget, despite its room for manoeuvre, of which the Chancellor is so proud, does nothing to counteract that. It does not grossly exacerbate it, but it pushes it along, extending the existing evil. If I were the Chancellor, I would be deeply apprehensive for the future cohesion of our society under his policies, even if—and it is quite a big "if"—his luck holds.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) said that he saw no economic justification in tax cuts, but, later in his speech, he said that he was not against tax cuts as such because he would not abolish them if he were in a position to do so.

Mr. Roy Jenkins: I think that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood my point.

Sir Peter Hordern: I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman in a moment. I have not finished dealing with his speech. He clearly said—I wrote down his words—that there were no economic justifications for tax cuts, and later he said that he would not consider it necessary to reverse such tax cuts. That is perfectly understandable, but the right hon. Gentleman must be responsible for what he said. He went on to say that if he were Chancellor, he would look forward, if necessary, to some tunnels of darkness in the balance of payments through which it would be necessary to go and that, in practice, it would be necessary to use some of our overseas investments to bolster the position. I am happy to give way to the right hon. Gentleman to explain to the House how he would repatriate the overseas investments that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor yesterday said amounted to £100 billion. How would the right hon. Gentleman seek to repatriate such investments to bolster the balance of payments?

Mr. Roy Jenkins: In exactly the same way as the Chancellor will repatriate them to finance the £2·5 billion deficit this year. It is automatic. Of course, substantial assets are in reserves in the form of drawing rights. I should have thought that it is obvious that there is no problem about that. What is the difference between what I propose and what the Chancellor proposes?

Sir Peter Hordern: I carefully noted what the right hon. Gentleman said. He distinctly said, "repatriating assets."

Mr. Jenkins: I did not say that.

Sir Peter Hordern: I wrote down what the right hon. Gentleman said.

In any case, any deficit is financed automatically by borrowing overseas. That is what the right hon. Gentleman, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and his predecessors consistently did. When he was Chancellor of the Exchequer the Government had to borrow a great deal of money.

Mr. Jenkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Hordern: I shall not give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jenkins: Surely the hon. Gentleman must give way.

Sir Peter Hordern: I shall not give way to the right hon. Gentleman. He must accept some comments on his speech. He may be chancellor of the university of Oxford, but that does not mean that the rest of us have to listen in total silence.

There was one noticeable absence from the right hon. Gentleman's speech. There was no mention of an incomes policy. The right hon. Gentleman should have mentioned it. It was a prime feature of the alliance parties' policy. Only the other day, he said that it was part of his economic policy. The alliance parties must face up to how they would impose an incomes policy, in the knowledge that all such policies have failed in the past, as the right hon. Gentleman, to his certain experience, knows.

How would the right hon. Gentleman, at the head of such a Government, impose such a policy without the willing support of the trade unions? As he well knows, the Labour party enjoyed the support of trade unions for most of the time in which it was trying to operate an incomes policy, and much good it did it. If the right hon. Gentleman is to say that an incomes policy would work if we were to tax any increases in pay, he and the alliance parties would have to explain to the country how they would inflict such a tax upon nationalised industries when workers get increased wages, and also explain the effect on the fortunes of industries if any such thing were to happen. The right hon. Gentleman is like the last of the Bourbons. He has learnt nothing and he has forgotten nothing while he has been a Member of Parliament.

There has been a decided improvement in our affairs. A few years ago, 365 economists wrote a letter to The Times protesting about the policies of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Now there are four.

Sir Peter Hordern: My hon. Friend says four, but I think that there are five. That demonstrates an enormous swing of professional economists' confidence in the Government's policies. I do not think that there has been such a change since the conversion of St. Paul.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Does that mean that the hon. Gentleman is happy to accept the joint forecast of 18 economists that the balance of payments deficit this year will be £5 billion—much bigger than the Chancellor's forecast in the Red Book?

Sir Peter Hordern: I am not and I never have been a great believer in forecasts. All the forecasts that were made in the past as a result of pressure were a great mistake. They may help some people but I do not find that they are very helpful.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that the deficit would be £5 billion. What serious consequence would that have?

Sir Peter Hordern: My hon. Friend asks a very good question that I shall deal with later.

It is incredible that economists should advise that there should be even more spending than there is at the moment. I do not believe that anybody can suggest that there is inadequate demand or inadequate expenditure at present. My right hon. Friend has now dropped M3, the money measurement, but he would not dream of concealing the fact that credit is now being extended very freely indeed. Debt in the personal sector is now about £202 billion, representing about 80 per cent. of disposable incomes. The savings ratio has decreased and is now down to 10 per cent. It is not just the quantity of credit that has been extended but the speed at which it has been extended that has created a considerable strain on our resources, which can for the most part be met only by production overseas. Therefore it was very prudent of my right hon. Friend to have such a small borrowing requirement, and I congratulate him on it.

The effect of such a small borrowing requirement is bound to have a favourable impact on interest rates. That has already happened. Therefore I congratulate my right hon. Friend further on not increasing mortgate interest relief, though he must have been very tempted to do so. I am sure that he must have been advised by very high sources to push it up. I am glad that he resisted that pressure.

Nobody can say that there is insufficient demand in the economy already. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) was right to draw attention to the forecast that the deficit on visible trade this year will be £8 billion. Some economists think that it will probably be higher. To balance the balance of trade deficit one has to take account of a much more permanent factor — the surplus on invisible trade, which is now a permanent feature of the landscape. As recently as 1985, it was £1·5 billion a year. It is now about £3·5 billion. Anybody who looks at the Red Book will see how rapidly invisible earnings are increasing. I think that they are here to stay. Apart from our very substantial invisible earnings, including overseas investments and the continuing stream of investment income, our financial services earnings have increased rapidly in the last few years. It does not help constantly to berate the City of London for its very substantial contribution to our invisible earnings.

The increase in company profits has been most marked during the last few years. Last year, company profits rose by 18 per cent., and this year they are expected to increase by 17 per cent. That has led to a substantial rise in the yield of corporation tax. It is only through the growth of corporate profits that there will be a substantial increase in investment and, ultimately, an increase in jobs. The reduction of corporation tax has had a wholly benign effect. Contrary to what was said earlier, the impact of tax reductions has a marked affect at the margin, by persuading people to work and by providing incentives to people to work.

From this strong base of profits and earnings comes a new stability and an independence that is based on home ownership, share ownership and now pension ownership. That is not before time. Moreover, this movement conforms entirely with the natural trend of social development. Anybody who has looked at "Social Trends" will have noticed that many more women are now at work—a permanent feature that is likely to increase; that many more people are now employed in the service industries; that manufacturing industry is producing more but is employing fewer people. The "Social Trends" survey asked people how they rated themselves. In terms of social class, 24 per cent. of those questioned thought that they were in the middle class, compared with 17 per cent. in the case of their parents. I do not know what that bodes for the natural constituency of the Labour party. That is a matter for the Labour party, but it has to operate on a declining trade union membership, on a declining manufacturing sector and on upward mobility of labour, all of which movements militate against the Labour party.

However, this development poses a question and a responsibility for the Government. Are we sure that we are moving in line with existing social trends? More and more deprived people, many of whom are unemployed, have been left to live in the urban priority areas as the more successful move out to middle and south-east England. In the last 10 years, the population of inner Birmingham has declined by 20 per cent., while the population of inner Manchester has declined by 25 per cent. and that of inner Derby by 20 per cent.

It is neither possible nor right to leave these problems to the local authorities. The Government's initiative in establishing a partnership between Government and private development, such as the docklands development, is wholly beneficial. I congratulate the Government on the action that they have taken. However, a great deal more needs to be done, so rapid have been the industrial changes that have taken place in the past few years.

It is essential to develop the private rented sector. It is intolerable that such divisions of prosperity between one part of the country and another should mean that it is impossible for people to move from one part of the country to another because they cannot find somewhere to live. Nevertheless, the basic question remains: is our present tax structure moving in line with the social trends and advances that we can all see?

An extraordinary change in personal ownership has been brought about by the sale of council houses and by mortgage interest tax relief. There has been an extraordinary increase in the assets that are owned by the pension funds on behalf of future pensioners. However, the cost of these reliefs, despite what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done by reducing rates, is that taxation is levied from far too narrow a base. Therefore the rates are far higher than they should be. In other countries taxation is much lower. For example, the tax paid by a United States millionaire is only marginally higher than the reduced rate that has now been set in this Budget. In Australia, Mr. Hawke has proposed that top income tax rates should be reduced from 60 to 40 per cent. — and that is a Labour Government. All over the continent of Europe tax reductions are taking place that make our own tax rates look very much too high.

My right hon. Friend has proposed that contributions made outside employers' pension schemes should qualify for tax relief. We are moving inexorably towards greater individual discretion over pensions. We are moving away from the paternalistic practice that in the past placed such heavy penalties on people when they moved from one job to another.

In pensions as in mortgage tax relief, where house prices have rocketed, are we not underestimating the natural desire that we all possess, of providing for ourselves and for our families? Even now, with 27 per cent. as the lowest rate, is not that rate an almost insuperable obstacle to those out of work who wish to take a job? Should not that lowest rate at which taxation starts have a greater priority?

I ask the House to reflect upon the impact of high taxation upon a pensioner who has contributed all his life to an occupational pension. It can be a severe shock to find that his earnings and savings are to be taxed at the high rates that now obtain and have done for a long time. It is reasonable to ask how effective the top rate of 60 per cent, is anyway. Tax reliefs are available to taxpayers in that bracket, through enterprise zone investment, the business expansion scheme, the pension fund reliefs, the growing of trees and some classes of gilt-edged securities. Is it not now the case that it is optional how much tax a high taxpayer pays? Is it not much better to recognise the reality for what it is, draw the logical conclusion from it, drop all mortgage tax relief and tax all pension fund contributions and income in exchange for a radical, substantial and permanent reduction in income tax?

I have in mind a figure of about £10,000 million phased in over three to five years, with plenty of notice and publication, a substantial increase in allowances or child benefit, with income tax starting at 15 per cent. and the highest rate of about 30 to 40 per cent. Just such a tax reform — admittedly with more tax reliefs available — came about in the United States as a result of the President's own initiative. It was taken up later by Senator Packwood. The movement throughout Europe and in other countries is towards major tax reform. Incidentally, I should add that the tax reform in the United States was revenue-neutral. It did not demand a reduction in the yield.

There is much prejudice against change in our tax rates. There is the formidable opposition of vested interests—there are strong interests against it. But I believe that it would be of enormous appeal to the country and entirely in line with existing and natural development. It would bring much more work into taxation. It would abolish the poverty trap, and stimulate enterprise and individual responsibility. For too long successive Governments have regarded themselves as nannies, not just protecting the weak but stopping those who can look after themselves crossing the street.

It seems to me that we never go far wrong if we trust the people, and it is time that we did so, and stopped being a burden upon them and steering them into ways that we think are good for them. They can very well manage for themselves—those who are able to—and provided that we may have a strong, flexible safety net always for those who cannot, it is time that we allowed those who can manage their own affairs to do so in the way that suits them best.

Mr. Sean Hughes (Knowsley, South): I should like to concentrate on the most glaring omission from the Budget and speeches by Conservative Members—the problem of unemployment and the Government's obvious lack of will power to do anything about it.

There has been a great deal of talk in recent months about two nations. When I listen to the speeches by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Chief Secretary and Conservative Members, I begin to think that we inhabit two different planets. Listening to the Chancellor's speech yesterday and that of the Chief Secretary today reminded me of a story in the new biography of Anthony Eden by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) in which he refers to the eccentric behaviour of his subject's father, Sir William Eden. Apparently he had it in his mind that every time he organised a hunt, it rained. One day when it was duly pouring down, the horses and hounds were outside and the would-be hunters were inside. Sir William came into the hall and tapped the barometer, which said, "Set Fair". So he tapped it again and still it said, "Set Fair". So he picked the barometer off the wall, opened the front door and hurled it out of the house, and said, "See for your bloody self."

There are times when those of us who have to listen to Conservative Members dredging their vocabulary for superlatives with which to congratulate themselves, feel like saying something similar to them, not least when the Chancellor intoned yesterday:

"This is a Budget built on success, and a Budget for success." — [Official Report, 17 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 828.]

We should not expect any more because in each and every Budget since 1979 the Chancellor and his predecessor have made precisely that point. Let me recap. In the June 1979 Budget the Chancellor's predecessor said that the Budget would "win a higher standard of living—for their country and for their families".—[Official Report, 12 June 1979; Vol. 968, c. 263.]

In March 1980 the then Chancellor said that the Government strategy was

"the best foundation for higher growth, fuller employment and a return to rising living standards".—[Official Report, 26 March 1980; Vol. 981, c. 1451.]

In March 1981 the then Chancellor said that the Budget would "help redress the balance of the economy in favour of business and industry." — [Official Report, 10 March 1981; Vol. 1000, c. 783.]

In 1982 we heard about

"a better prospect of employment opportunities".—[Official Report, 9 March 1982, Vol. 19, c. 757.]

In 1983 we had

"a Budget for enterprise". — [Official Report, 15 March 1983; Vol. 39, c. 157.]

In 1984 the Chancellor said that there was an economic recovery

"whose underlying strength is now beyond dispute." — [Official Report, 13 March 1984; Vol. 56, c. 286.]

The Chancellor intoned that again in 1985, and last year he said that the Budget was

"a safeguard for the present and a springboard for the future."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 184.]

Yet throughout that period there has been a steady inexorable rise in unemployment. On Monday this week the leader in The Guardian commented:

"Mrs. Thatcher needs to butter up less than 40 per cent. of the voters (not much more than 30 per cent. of the electorate) to ensure survival. The poor are always with us, but no longer needed at election time."

For the poor, we can now read poorer regions, and poorer parts of the more prosperous regions. If ever further proof was needed that the Government have written off whole regions, it is in the Budget. There is no sense of urgency, no special provision and no priority for the regions that have been blighted by unemployment.

The Government cannot escape their responsibility. The present Prime Minister has had a single party majority in the House for longer than any Prime Minister since Lord Liverpool 160 years ago. It has been within her power to do something — anything — if she and her Cabinet wanted to.

For eight years the people of my constituency and elsewhere have been told that there was light at the end of the tunnel if only they could make the sacrifice now. Last night the Chancellor spoke of eight years of hard-fought gains. The trouble is that those who have had to do the hard fighting are not the people who apparently are to get the gains.

Let us look at the unemployment figures in my borough. Adult unemployment last September stood at 25 per cent. In September 1984 it was 26·7 per cent. That 1·7 per cent. change represents 1,300 people. But Knowsley is not a fluctuating market. There has been no identifiable influx of new business or industry. The 1·7 per cent. change is due partly to migration out of the borough altogether and partly to the now notorious fiddling of the unemployment statistics.

Even more damning are the statistics for youth unemployment, registered at the careers office in my borough. Let me make one comparison. In 1982 1,371 youngsters were unemployed, 2,390 were on temporary schemes and there were 14 job vacancies. In February this year the figures were almost 1,000 unemployed, more than 2,000 on temporary schemes and 12 vacancies advertised in careers offices. When I checked this morning on the latest figure, the careers officer rang around the careers offices in my borough and I was told that there was a grand total of three job vacancies in a metropolitan borough on offer to youngsters. However, the Chancellor and his right hon. and hon. Friends would refer to the figures of those on temporary schemes as proof that the Government's policies are working.

I attended a conference a year or so ago about those temporary schemes. I will not generalise or dismiss them all. However, I thought that they were summed up admirably by the apparently sane individual who informed us that they had noted 25 identifiable skills on the "pick and mix" sweet counter at Woolworth. If the Government think that youngsters are going to be taken in by such schemes, they seriously underestimate the intelligence and the potential for anger of our young people.

I have one basic question to ask. When will the unemployed in my constituency of Knowsley, South, see the benefit of eight years of Conservative Government? I am not in favour of higher direct taxation as something good in itself. However, I wish that Conservative Members would spare us the nonsense that cuts in direct taxation will increase employment prospects in areas such as mine.

Since 1979, the Government have cut the standard rate of income tax from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent. to 29 per cent. to 27 per cent. There has been a fall in the rate of inflation and in base interest rates. When shall we have a comparable real fall in unemployment? Of course Conservative Members may say that I should take other factors into consideration. As far as I can see, the basis of Government logic is that low direct taxation will provide the incentives for people to invest. However, they are patently not investing in my borough. Who will invest? If the private sector with an ever decreasing tax burden will not invest, perhaps the Government will accept their responsibility. However, the Government do not believe in their role. It is difficult therefore to follow their logic. No wonder the Leader of the House did not want to be classed as a Tory intellectual.

The Chancellor has demonstrated his concern for the morale of the well-off, the morale of the highly-paid in our society. He and his Government have patently failed to show any such concern for the morale of the low paid or the unemployed. Whatever kind of short-term electoral advantage they may see in this Budget, I believe that such divisive policies will earn for them the odium of history.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I begin by referring to something in the Budget which has not previously been referred to either by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor or by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. In fact, it is to be found buried in the annexe to chapter 4 of the Red Book, item No. 53:

"The gross margins earned by tour operators on sales of tours within the European Community will be brought within the scope of VAT with effect from 1 April 1988."

That will be very welcome in my constituency of Bournemouth and will be welcomed by hotel operators throughout the United Kingdom. For many years they have been making representations to me and other hon. Members interested in tourism to the effect that the competition that they face from certain overseas destinations which were not subject to VAT on package deals — for example, to Benidorm — was unreasonable. This measure will go some way towards redressing the balance.

However, before people get too enthusiastic about the measure, it will mean that package deals marketed within the United Kingdom and to the United Kingdom will also be subject to VAT within the European Community. It will not be completely one-way traffic. Nevertheless, on behalf of my constituents and other hotel operators, I welcome the measure.

I also welcome the changes and reforms that my right hon. Friend has made in corporation tax and the business expansion scheme. I was happy to see that they received a welcome from the Leader of the Opposition yesterday. The most important point about the reforms is the degree to which they lead towards encouraging further investment in a number of ways — for example, in training. No longer will there be a tax penalty for the provision of training by an employer whose employee will shortly be leaving him. Nor will there be a penalty on the employee.

There is also a very welcome improvement in the position for oil companies and that will be particularly welcomed in Scotland. It will also be welcomed in my constituency and in Dorset, which is becoming a major oil producer. We regard the advent of the oil industry as something of a mixed blessing. However, we are prepared to do our bit for the benefit of the nation as a whole.

Another area which I think will be particularly welcome for the provision of employment is the relief given to small businesses through the changes in VAT. Cash accounting has long been dear to the hearts of those who operate small businesses. They have felt for too long that they have been the victims of late payers and usually the late payers are larger companies. They have also been victims of the non-payers. At long last they will have some relief from their difficulties, and that will be extremely welcome. The reforms made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor with regard to a number of tax loopholes that are particularly relevant to international transactions and banks will also be welcomed and the revenue that they produce will be by no means insignificant.

One of my right hon. Friend's most important achievements concerns personal pensions. We all know that pension rights are dear to the entire population. However, they have been denied to many in the past because either people could not achieve those rights or they were tied to a particular scheme which might not have suited them. The changes that have been made will free them from those constraints and go a considerable way towards encouraging the mobility of labour. For those reasons, I welcome those changes along with the changes in inheritance tax which will be of great benefit to small businesses in particular.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made a number of changes in the taxes on spending, in particular in VAT. Many hon. Members have welcomed the changes that have taken place with regard to welfare organisations and the provision of drugs for research and hospices. However, one particular aspect disappoints me. It would appear that the medical reliefs will not extend to those who provide veterinary services as charities. I am particularly concerned about the People's Dispensary for Sick Animals which does great work throughout the country and brings much relief to sick animals and animals in pain.

It would seem that, unless the word "medical" is to be interpreted to include the term "veterinary", such charities will not be included. I am sure that my right hon. Friend would not wish to create a situation in which a drug administered to an animal for research purposes was exempt from tax but a drug administered to an animal for the purpose of relieving pain or saving life was taxed. That does not seem a morally tenable position and I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to remedy it.

I have mentioned the benefits that will accrue to tourism. The decision not to raise excise duty will also be of considerable benefit to that industry and will be widely welcomed. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that.

The Opposition have made much of the tax cuts being primarily intended to benefit the better-off, but they may care to ponder why the only group in British society who will not benefit from indexation of thresholds will be those paying higher rates of tax. As those thresholds have not been increased, higher rate taxpayers uniquely have been singled out for punitive treatment. Not enough has been made of that in the debate so far, but it is an important illustration of my right hon. Friend's thinking on the subject.

In my constituency there are more citizens over the age of 80 and even 85 than almost anywhere else in the country. The additional relief to people over the age of 80 will therefore be more welcome there than in many other places, although I know that it will be widely welcomed throughout the country. Advances in modern medicine mean that people live much longer than they did hitherto, so those benefits may be more widely felt than one might expect. The House will know that I have personally campaigned for the blind for a long time, so it was a particular pleasure for me to learn of the very substantial increase in the blind person's allowance.

The Opposition have made much of the fact that unemployment is unacceptably high. We all agree that it is unacceptably high and that we must do all that we can to reduce it. I am sure that that is common ground. The Opposition, however, sometimes exaggerate the situation by overlooking the facts relating to people who are in employment. It may be helpful if I provide some figures.

In 1974, the number of people in employment was 24,971,000. By 1979, the figure had risen modestly to just over 25 million. In 1986, the figure was 24,712,000, hardly any different at all from the 1974 figure and only 684,000 below the figure for 1979—and that after one of the worst recessions that the Western world had known. It is a great credit to the Government that in the past few years they have been able to create an unprecedented number of additional jobs. The increase since 1983 has been 940,000, and it is growing all the time. The difference lies in the enormous increase in the working population. Between 1976 and 1986 the working population of this country increased by about 2 million, so the number of jobs would have had to be increased by 200,000 per year merely to stand still.

It is also worth considering our record on inflation. The statistics are published by the Central Statistical Office and are available in the Library. Between February 1974 and May 1979, under the Labour Government, the average rate of inflation was 15·4 per cent., reaching a peak of South American proportions at more than 26 per cent. in 1975. When the Conservatives came to power, inflation fell to an average of 11·3 per cent. between May 1979 and June 1983; between June 1983 and January 1987 it was only 4·7 per cent.; and by January this year it had fallen to 3·9 per cent. Moreover, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said, we expect it to be only 4 per cent. at the end of this year. That is an extraordinary achievement in a very short time despite very difficult conditions, slumps in oil prices and general uncertainty in world markets. Insufficient credit is given to the Government for that achievement.

The Opposition also seek to pretend that people are no better off than they were under the Labour Government. Average male earnings in 1979 were £101·40 per week. In 1986, they had more than doubled to £207·50. The Opposition also claim that we are not doing well in terms of GDP and output, but analysis of the facts does not bear that out. Taking the figures at 1980 factor costs to eliminate the effect of inflation, GDP in 1978 was 99·7. By the end of 1986 it had increased to 113—an increase of 14 per cent. in real terms, not a diminution as the Opposition allege. Industrial output increased by 2·5 per cent. in 1986 and the OECD forecast — not the Government forecast—is that it will be 2·75 per cent. in the current year. That is the highest in the Western world, as my right hon. Friend has said, and has been so throughout the 1980s.

The Opposition may claim that that improvement has been at the expense of capital investment in industry, which they allege has diminished. Again, the facts do not bear out their claim. At constant 1980 prices, capital investment totalled £42·7 billion in 1978. By 1985, the last year for which we have figures, it was £46·3 billion—again, a substantial real increase over the period. The Opposition say that there is no investment in industry, but that is not true. Investment in plant and machinery alone — surely the most important elements in industrial investment—has shown a dramatic increase from £13·9 billion in 1978 to £17·4 billion in 1985, again at constant 1980 prices. That is a very significant increase.

The Opposition said—they are changing their tune now—that it was wrong to abolish exchange control, that it would cause a flight from the pound, which would then plummet. In reality, for the three years following abolition, the pound was at all-time record highs—hon. Members will recall the time when we were getting more than $2·40 to the pound—so another Opposition myth has been blown away by reality. The Opposition also said that there would be no investment in Britain, but the effect on foreign investment in Britain is clear from the official statistics. In 1978, overseas investment in this country was £1·823 billion. By 1985, it had increased to £10·435 billion, an increase in overseas investment of 527 per cent., and it shows the confidence that overseas investors feel in this country, even if the Labour party feels no such confidence.

Exports were up 6 per cent. in the last quarter. In 1979, they were £40·6 billion. By 1986, the exports that Opposition Members said today did not exist, or had disappeared, had increased to £72·6 billion. The invisible balance during that period also rose from £2·7 billion to £8·5 billion, a substantial and worthwhile increase.

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Gentleman has a litany of statistics, and it would take us too much time to go through them one by one, but let us take the last two that he gave. The hon. Gentleman should admit that the United Kingdom share of world exports in manufactured goods fell from 9 per cent. in 1979 to 7·1 per cent. in 1985, the last year for which full statistics are available. In nine months out of 12 last year there was not a surplus but a growing deficit on invisible earnings that continued during the last eight months of last year.

We could go through every one of the statistics that the hon. Gentleman has chosen, but I note that in most cases he was careful to pick 1980 as the base year, as it gave a more favourable view of the Government's performance. If he had been honest enough to take 1979, when the Conservative Government first took office, as the base year, the picture would be very different.

Mr. Butterfill: As usual, the hon. Lady has been very selective in her choice. The base year of 1980 was chosen not by me but by that well-known pro-Tory-biased organisation the House of Commons Library. The statistics that I quoted were from a research paper prepared by members of the House of Commons Library economic research staff. They chose the year 1980; I did not do so. Presumably they chose it because they thought that it was the most representative year, and not one that would pander to the biases of either the Conservative party or the hon. Lady.

The hon. Lady has confined her remarks to the relative levels of exports of manufactured goods. We may see a relative decline in manufactured goods; indeed, I should be rather worried if we did not. The developing countries are constantly developing their own capacity to manufacture certain goods that we have traditionally manufactured.

It is incumbent on us, therefore, to move into the sphere of higher added value, higher technology and the sale of knowhow that is wonderfully exemplified by a company in my constituency called Davy McKee. It used to be the United Kingdom's largest producer of aluminium, rolled steel and steel tubing. It recognised, however, that those products were being developed by Third-world countries for themselves. All over the world countries were investing in their own capacity to produce aluminium sheet and steel tubes. Davy McKee realised, perhaps before many other companies, that if it continued to depend entirely on manufacturing here and exporting to those countries it would be out of business pretty quickly. It therefore chose to sell its know-how.

Davy McKee has built up one of the most successful companies in the world — in fact, it is the world's leading company—advising on the establishment of such manufacturing enterprises, setting them up, doing a complete turnkey package deal with the countries concerned, and then staffing them and providing training in the initial period. It has won orders from Korea, from the People's Republic of China and in the United States. That is an example of the sale of know-how. It did not appear in the hon. Lady's statistics for pure manufactured goods, but it appears on the British balance of payments. It is an ongoing enterprise with a great future, unlike the industries that the hon. Lady would like to prop up. Those industries are dying, and there is very little that we can do about it. That is why it is important that we do not concentrate parrot-fashion, as the Labour party always chooses to do, on the statistics for exports of manufactured goods. We must look at the overall trade patterns, because that is what counts at the end of the day.

The hon. Lady said that we were not doing very well with exports. I refer her again to the statistics, allowing for inflation at the constant 1980 figures that the Library chose to adopt as a fair comparison. In 1979, the figure was 99·1; in 1980 it was 100; and in 1986 it topped 122·9. That is a real increase in exports of 24 per cent. during the lifetime of this Government, something that the Opposition fail to recognise in their obsession with the claim that our industrial, manufacturing and export bases are disappearing all the time.

Let us look at the record on interest rates. London base rates are a fair example. In 1979, interest rates under the last Labour Government were 13·68 per cent. By last year they had fallen to 10·9 per cent., and today they are 10 per cent. and falling. They are expected to go into single figures within weeks, if not days. Does any of us imagine that that would have happened under a Labour, or even an alliance, Government? Of course not. We all know that we should have seen a return to the "spend, spend, spend" policy—spending other people's money—and the hyper-inflation that we have always known derives from those extravagant spending policies. Goodness knows, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) will provide a few more of those before we are finished.

We now have a prudent Government who recognise that we have to live within our means, and that we can afford what we would all like to have only if we can earn it. That is why the figures for the public sector borrowing requirement are so important. We have been able to reduce the absolute level of the PSBR, which has come down from £9·25 billion in 1978-79 to last year's figure of £5·75 billion, and this year to only £4 billion, a level at which it is expected to remain.

What is more important is the borrowing requirement as a percentage of our gross domestic product. In the final year of the Labour Government it was 5·4 per cent. of GDP, last year it was 1·6 per cent., and this year it is only 1 per cent. That shows the degree to which we are nationally overdrawn in relation to what we earn, which must be understood by the people of this country. They will know that at the end of the day no one can spend more than he earns. That is the Government's message—that we are now living within our means.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): What a load of rubbish.

Mr. Butterfill: Of course, the hon. Gentleman is entitled to his opinion. The Labour party has never believed in living within its means, but the Government believe in the simple principles of good housekeeping which everyone outside the House understands.

We know that there is economic illiteracy among Opposition Members and that they are dismayed at the success of the Government's policies. That is why we had such a pathetic performance from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) earlier. He was rather below par and could not resist including cheap jibes about dead sheep. Such cheap jibes deserve comments about being savaged by Miss Piggy. However, Miss Piggy is probably a little more eloquent than the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, and a good deal more economically literate.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): I shall comment in due course on some of the points made by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill). However, I should like to comment especially on the speech made by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury this afternoon. I am sorry that he is not in his place. He is guilty of tedious repetition. He went on like a parrot about the cost of the programmes that might be introduced by a future Labour Government.

He talked about the wonderful hat trick that the Government have won. He talked about the £4·7 billion increase in public expenditure on housing, health and schools; the £3 billion to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement; and the £2·6 billion cut in taxes. That £4·7 billion increase in public expenditure was a U-turn in which the Government engaged last autumn. In any case, there is a £23 billion backlog of local authority housing repairs and a £27·5 billion backlog of private sector housing repairs. In addition to those mammoth figures, the Audit Commission estimates a £500 million backlog of school repairs. In that context, the Government's boast about public expenditure increases is peanuts compared to the problems that we see all over the country.

Having boasted about that expenditure, the Chief Secretary tried to scare the living daylights out of people by remarking on what might happen if there was a Labour Government. He said that there would be a huge increase in taxes and a massive increase in inflation. The only thing that he missed out was the threat made by Winston Churchill in 1945 that if there was a Labour Government there would be a Gestapo, a secret police, and democracy would go out of the window. I warn the Government that they should look at what happened to Winston Churchill. He said those things in 1945 about colleagues who had worked with him in the coalition Government to defeat Hitler and all that he stood for in that world war. Churchill got his rewards for making that sort of absurd exaggeration about a Labour Government and I suspect that this Government will get theirs also.

When the Chancellor appeared on television last night, he was as smooth as a second-rate, second-hand car salesman. He sought to prove and convince the British people that there was success all around them as a direct consequence of the consistent policies that the Government have pursued since 1979. His performance last night, like his performance yesterday in the House when he presented the Budget, was a massive con trick and a cruel deception of our people, bolstered by carefully selective statistics. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) referred to some of those earlier. On one occasion the Chancellor omitted all reference to what happened between 1979 and 1983. He started his statistics in 1983 to mask the brutal realities of our economic position, at least until the election is over.

What are the realities to the people outside? They know, and we all know, that we have greater unemployment than we have ever had in the entire history of this nation, including during the 1930s. That is the biggest social scandal in living memory. There has been massive and continuous unemployment since 1979, when the Government came into office with complete power to do exactly as they liked. We have over 2 million more people on the dole. That means an enormous waste of human resources, an enormous loss of dignity to those who are on the dole, and social and family tensions.

It was interesting and ironic that almost immediately after the Chancellor had made those boasts last night, there was a programme about an unemployed family in Peterlee, which is a new town in Durham. It is a pity that that series is shown so late at night. It showed a decent, respectable family that is torn apart by the policies that are pursued by the Government. Their only contribution towards a solution for that problem is a multitude of fiddles of the official statistics and various training schemes which do little more than tinker with the basic, underlying problem. The total cost to the nation of this social problem is about £20 billion a year.

In that programme about Peterlee last night, the family suggested that, as a result of unemployment, employers are taking advantage by offering low wages. The family had been offered a job in Trimdon, some miles away, to which they had to pay their own fares. By the time that they had done so, they would have received less than the social security benefit. Under the Government's proposals, if a claimant does not take such a job, he will lose benefit. Therefore, we are seeing a gross exploitation of that situation by unscrupulous employers, who know full well that that family does not have any realistic choice but to take those jobs on starvation wages.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West quoted a number of figures and I shall do the same. In 1980, which was the year he took so I shall take it too, we sold abroad £5·5 billion-worth of goods more than we imported. We depend more than somewhat on our trade with other countries. In other words, we had a balance of payments surplus. In 1983, again for the first time in our entire history, that had been turned into a deficit. By 1985, our share of world manufacturing exports had plummeted from 9·1 per cent. to 7·9 per cent., as my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) has reminded the hon. Gentleman. That represents a fall of one eighth in our manufactured goods. About 2 million jobs have been lost in our manufacturing industry since 1979. Under no circumstances can that rake's progress be defined as success.

[Mr. Willie W. Hamilton]

The so-called progress has been intensified by selling what the former Lord Stockton described as the family silver — British Gas, British Telecom and Cable and Wireless, with others to follow. The Government garnered about £8,000 million from the sale of those national assets. Every Opposition Member was a shareholder in those industries and we all shared the profits of a highly efficient gas industry. But now the industries are in the hands of relatively few shareholders, if those shareholders have not already sold their shares to make a quick buck or two. They were interested, not in British Gas or British Telecom, but in making a quick profit for themselves.

In addition, the Government had a windfall in the VAT bonanza arising directly from the consumer credit boom which the Government instigated. When the Chancellor discovered that he had about £6 billion to dispose of in his Budget he had to decide how to disburse it, how to pacify the City and his Back Benchers and how to ensure that the Prime Minister would win a third successive election victory. I give him full credit for his shrewd calculation, but the way in which he presented his Budget was uninspiring. He seems to have pacified financial institutions in the City with his £3 billion reduction in the PSBR. He seemed to bribe the electorate, but not too blatantly — he had to maintain a little credibility for himself. He has reduced income tax and other taxes at a cost of between £2 billion and £3 billion. The total cost is about £6 billion.

If we in the Labour party had had that £6 billion, it would have given us almost exactly the cost of our programme to create nearly 1 million new jobs in two years. That is the choice. No objective observer would dare or care to pretend that the way the Chancellor has decided to spend that £6 billion will create anything more than perhaps 100,000 jobs, and that is probably an over-estimate. I challenge the Chief Secretary or any hon. Member on the Treasury Bench to deny those figures. Our programme has been properly costed by independent observers and we are certain that we can provide 1 million new jobs in two years with £6 billion. Those jobs would be created not least in the infrastructure. I gave figures for the type of exercise that we would engage in on housing, building, education and the infrastructure generally, which includes roads, transport, hospitals and so on.

In the past few days the Prime Minister has boasted in her interview with The London Evening Standard about her great record on education, but let us examine some of the evidence on that. Almost every day every hon. Member receives representations from all sections of the educational community, from nursery schools, through primary schools to secondary schools and especially from universities, complaining about the lack of resources and investment in our future. After all, education is investment in human resources and in our future ability to hold our own in a competitive world. Virtually all the evidence points to the disastrous circumstances at present facing our educational system from the bottom to the top. The report by Her Majesty's inspectors entitled "Effects of Local Authority Expenditure Policies on Education Provision in England—1984" was published on 23 May 1985 and states:

"In 1984/85, 11 (out of 96) LEAs"—

I stress that it was only 11 of the 96 authorities in England and Wales—

"were considered satisfactory or better in relation to all the major aspects of their provision for schools.

It seems unlikely that present levels (of provision) will be sufficient to enable schools to respond successfully to the national and local calls for improvements in pupils' achievements and in the curriculum."

I am the prospective parliamentary candidate for South Hams in Devon and I am receiving a constant stream of letters from people in that constituency because they are not satisfied with the service they are receiving from their present Member of Parliament. Yesterday I had a letter from the chairman of the Parents Action Group in south Brent about its primary school. I was told that the school was designed 110 years ago; that the children and staff must put on their overcoats to go to the outside toilets, and that not long ago a large piece of plaster fell from a classroom ceiling and that if the children had been there at the time, someone might easily have been killed.

The letter talks about rotten window frames and mould growing on the walls. It describes how there is not a single place big enough to hold an assembly of all the children and how there is no space big enough to provide physical education for just one class. That is the Chancellor's hallmark of success. That is not an isolated example, but could be multiplied a thousand times throughout the country. Moreover, the same applies to our hospitals and housing. Every hon. Member knows that that is true.

My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), who is present, is a building trade worker. We know that 500,000 building trade workers are unemployed and that we have a massive backlog of building work waiting to be done on new houses and on repairing the old. The Government have said that they will spend £4·7 billion extra on housing, education, and all the rest put together. But the figures show that we ought to spend hundreds of millions of pounds on each of these services.

I suppose that it was the ultimate expression of the success of this Government when, just a week or two ago, they announced that prescription charges were to be put up another 20p, so that they are now 11 times higher than they were when the Labour Government went out. That is a measure of their success; that is a measure of their priorities. We believe that the supreme priority of any civilised Government in this country today must be to get those 3 or 4 million people back to work to create the wealth on which these services so much depend. We believe that we are the people to do it, that we have the policies on jobs and on the creation of wealth by the people who are now cooling their heels at great cost to the taxpayer and to their dignity and feeling of independence. We are very happy to be fighting this election on that issue primarily although not exclusively.

I have represented an area in Fife for a large number of years and it has never been in a worse state than it is in at the moment. I doubt whether, of the 70-odd parliamentary seats in Scotland today, the Tories will get more than a dozen; in fact, I doubt whether they will get a dozen, because Scotland knows where its true interests lie. I hope that parts of England will increasingly begin to realise this. We sometimes talk, rather mistakenly, I think, about the north-south division. It is not as clear as that. The peripheral areas of the country, by which I mean Scotland, the north-east, the north-west, the south-west and Wales, are the deprived areas, because there is as much poverty and deprivation of one kind or another in Cornwall and Devon and that part of England as there is in the north-east and Scotland. There is deprivation in housing and education, deprivation in terms of job opportunities, and so on.

As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the former Secretary of State for Defence, says in his new book, unless the Government are prepared to intervene more actively in the solution of those problems, they will get worse rather than better.

The challenge is there and we in the Labour party are prepared to meet it.

7.42 pm

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I shall not try to compete with the big guns we have heard this afternoon because, obviously, more and more statistics will just bewilder those attentive to this debate. I shall approach this subject as a constituency Member.

I am amazed that some Opposition Members cannot see that certain proposals in this Budget will create jobs. Jobs, after all, are what we have been told are needed. Thinking of it particularly from the point of view of my area, the concession to the North sea oil companies, whereby they can offset 10 per cent. of the costs of developing new fields against petrol revenue tax and can get tax relief for research into oil extraction, is a very interesting proposal. I say this because, although it is North sea oil that is mentioned, there is south sea oil as well. Off the Isle of Wight, BP and others have been exploring for some years. It is a very costly operation and I believe that they have found some gas and have capped some of the wells.

Some companies — Enterprise Oil, Britoil, Wood Mackenzie and others — might now think that the exploration of the coast around Southampton could go ahead. I feel certain that the sinking of wells on the mainland has been very profitable. I know that it is a very much more expensive operation to extract from south of the Isle of Wight, with all the problems of the severe weather there, and this could create some job opportunity.

We have heard one or two not very generous remarks from the Opposition about the fact that the Treasury has used some of the funds that have been raised by privatisation. One can only judge privatisation by the companies that one knows in one's own area. My personal gratitude to the Government for privatising Associated British Ports is overwhelming, because it has made a great success of the port of Southampton. The labour force has become co-operative again. From a year of no work at all in 1981 we are suddenly seeing many ships in the port. The container port is thriving under ABP and the leisure side of the port is being developed. If my colleagues in the House come to Southampton during a weekend to go over ocean village, which is a wonderful marina, plus shopping parade, restaurants and so on, they will see that privatisation does not destroy jobs, as is the Opposition's common formula, but can create many jobs.

Privatisation, of course, has been instrumental in enabling the Treasury to do more than usual. The Government are expecting in 1987-88 another £5 billion from privatisation, and I for one am grateful that this new impetus is being given to some of the institutions that were moribund and overmanned and had lost direction and the commercial cutting edge that is so necessary.

When I was looking at the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) today, I wondered whether his suit was made in Hong Kong, whether he drives a British car — I am sure he does — whether his video is English or Dutch and whether he has supported the workers of the United Kingdom in the way that they should be supported. We have dropped so easily into the habit now of buying foreign. One of the great fears expressed by the Opposition is that the 2p reduction in the standard rate will be extra money in the pockets of those who receive it and that they will automatically buy foreign goods, thus creating a balance-of-payments problem which they say could be very severe by the end of the year.

There is nothing wrong with every Labour Member, every alliance Member, and, of course, all Conservatives saying that one should buy British wherever and whenever possible. That is a practice that should be extended. I try to follow it myself, but one is bound to fail because sometimes the industries that should be there are no longer there, or have not taken the commercial opportunities to compete in the television, video, motor car and other industries.

Who is to blame us? The country has gone through an evolution. It cannot be said that it is terrible that a certain Government made 3 million unemployed; we must realise why there are 3 million unemployed. In my area, in the north-east and in the north-west, shipbuilding, ship repairing, heavy engineering and other such trades were changing overnight, perhaps because world markets were not available. Some of those companies turned to high technology, robotics or whatever. Employees were laid off and many plants were closed. If we are to support British manufacturing, we should tell people to buy British whenever possible.

In Southampton we have very little industry but many small businesses. We do not have massive steelworks, coal mines or such industries. Because we have so many small business men, when I go back to the constituency this weekend I shall be grateful for the Budget. It has been iniquitous that a person who has not yet received payment should have to pay VAT on it to the Government. I am grateful to the Chancellor that companies with a turnover of less than £250,000 will not be answerable for bad debts on VAT and that they will not be asked to pay VAT until they have received payment from their customers.

I welcome the proposal that VAT accounting should be done only once a year. Many small business men have complained to me about the enormous paperwork and which they want to cut down. If they can make their VAT returns once a year, it will be much simpler. Therefore, there is a great deal in the Budget for the small business man.

Like other hon. Members, I have been lobbied about the blind person's allowance. I am grateful that the allowance for the single blind will be raised by £180 to £540 per annum and for couples by £360 to £1,080. No one can carp at that.

We are all trying to be environmentally pure these days, so we welcome the Government's reduction of 5p a gallon on unleaded petrol. However, people should be warned not to buy unleaded petrol unless their cars have been adapted for it. Suppliers will have great difficulty keeping up with demand. No doubt the Treasury will have alerted them and it will give all possible aid to oil companies to provide unleaded petrol.

I have heard attacks on the proposal on inheritance tax. I cannot imagine why any hon. Member would wish to attack a concession which raises the inheritance tax threshold from £71,000 to £90,000. That will be a relief to the people who will inherit the money. Today £90,000 is not a great sum. If a house is involved, as well as the furniture and one or two other items, one is up to £90,000 almost immediately. Of course, if a person has no possessions it does not matter to him whether inheritance tax starts at £71,000 or £90,000. On behalf of my constituents, I thank the Chancellor for the fact that they can inherit another £19,000 without having to pay tax.

Some people seem to think that, because there are 3 million unemployed, there are 3 million ready and eager to work. However, many of them are untrained or need retraining because they have been trained in old skills. I am pleased that tax relief will be given for training. That is one answer to the problem. Any tax relief given to assist training must be good for the country and for employment.

We must welcome the Budget. When my local newspaper telephoned to ask me for my immediate impression, being as honest as all Conservative Members and many other hon. Members are, I said that I was happy. The Treasury team has not gone deliberately out of its way to give succour to people in order to buy votes. The Treasury has put forward a balanced Budget. It will get the borrowing rate down, which will be good for businesses which have to approach bank managers for money. The less we borrow, the more prosperous we will be in the long run. The message for all of us is that we must go for growth. I think that the Treasury team has that fully in mind.

I have perhaps one little carp. No doubt the Minister of State will be able to deal with it. I am among the Members who signed early-day motion 762. We are worried about the effect of VAT on free ports. We were told that a massive VAT review was taking place. Of course, we have heard a lot about it in the last two days. In his reply, or perhaps in a letter, my hon. Friend may be able to reveal whether the VAT review has made it possible for people trading within a free port not to have to go through the nonsense of preparing VAT forms or paying each other certain amounts to keep within the law.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) will know that the free port at Liverpool is not doing well. I believe that development at Belfast has stopped completely. Prestwick is not going ahead because of this problem. Cardiff is starting with a lot of help, but unless the fiscal side is right it will not make progress. Birmingham, which is supported by Prudential insurance money, is going ahead. It is difficult to explain to people that a free port does not mean precisely what it says. No doubt the Treasury team is working on that.

We should not rush into another Budget in the autumn, although there is provision for that. Perhaps an autumn Budget would be one way of giving more assistance to areas that have been spoken about in the debate. Unless the Treasury team knows differently, I cannot see how we can delay a general election too long. It might be possible to go to the country after an autumn Budget, but I do not think we could wait much longer. If we go in June, the full benefits of this Budget will not be apparent. When we are canvassing we will have to make sure that the people on the doorsteps know what is in the Budget and realise how helpful it will be in bringing down interest rates which will in turn bring down mortgage rates. That will save pounds and pounds for the 63 per cent. of the people who are home owners.

The people are sensible. If we get the message right, they will realise that we are trying not to buy their votes but to get the country on course and booming for the next decade. Then the Treasury team will be proud of yesterday's Budget.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I can see seven hon. Members trying to catch my eye. Unless speeches are shorter, some of them will be disappointed.

8 pm

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): If ever there was a case of the morning after the night before, it is today, both here and around the country. Although the champagne bubbles may still be rising in the City and among the country's ruling class — even among the companies run by some Conservative Members — we must contrast them with the flat beer of ordinary, decent working people in my constituency.

Travelling home last night and coming to work this morning on the buses, I talked to bus drivers, conductors and ordinary, decent people about the implications of the Budget. Their analysis is that the Budget has left them cold. They know that it is an election gimmick and that the Government are attempting to throw dust in the eyes of ordinary working people to confuse them with largesse and make them believe that the country has resolved all its problems.

The reality has been exposed by the euphoria in the bosses' press this morning, which showed clearly that the bosses and the press are extolling the virtues of the Chancellor and the Treasury. However, there is little or nothing in the Budget for working people.

The people whom I represent pose the question, "What will the Budget do for the people of Liverpool?" What will it do for pensioners, for students in higher education who are desperate for decent grants to educate themselves for the future? What will it do for the hospital services, the disabled and the homeless? The answer is, "Little or nothing."

In Broadgreen, 8,550 people are unemployed. The January figure for Liverpool as a whole was 55,683—all decent people who are willing and able to work and who have been deprived of that right. On offer for our people is the Government's much-vaunted restart scheme, which is their major initiative for tackling unemployment—yet the entire programme contains not a single element of job creation. A pilot test of nine British towns shows that out of 28,175 people interviewed, only 295 were placed in proper employment—a total of 1 per cent.

Nationally, the figure is even lower; it is down to 0·8 per cent. Worst of all is the position on Merseyside. The halfway figures showed that out of 38,771 people interviewed, only 238 were placed in jobs—a tiny 0·6 per cent., or six in every thousand.

On average, the Government have spent on Merseyside £170,000 on bogus schemes to take people out of the dole queues, to massage the figures and to leave those people high and dry without benefit as a result of the crisis in the system.

What will the budget do about the hospital closures in my area? Figures from the Department of Health and Social Security show that between 1979 and 1985 the Mersey regional health authority suffered a 16 per cent. cut in the number of hospital beds, a loss of 3,815. Further analysis of the figures showed that the Mersey regional health authority had lost 20 per cent. of its obstetric and gynaecological beds, 17 per cent. of its general and surgery beds and 16 per cent. of its general medical beds.

Those figures, horrific as they are for those desperate for treatment, give the lie to the Government's claims that the National Health Service is safe with them. No wonder that people are dying while waiting for treatment, when fewer beds than ever before are available. That is clear proof from the horse's' mouth that hospital provision has been deteriorating ever since the Tories came to power, and it contradicts the Government's pre-election propaganda campaign.

Statistics about beds are meaningless at the sharp end. What will the Government do about those whom I represent? On Sunday night I spoke to a man in his sixties who I thought had been ignoring me for 12 months. People might say that he should have been ignoring me, but he had not been.

That man has been virtually blind with cataracts for the past 12 months. Recently, he went to the hospital to implore the doctors for treatment. They told him that if he came back in the middle or at the end of 1988 they would deal with his problem. In desperation, his family considered going private—so, for a fee of £50 for a five-minute interview with a specialist, he was told that he could be done on the following day. That specialist was probably trained by the National Health Service. He said that my friend could come back the following week, but that it would cost him—£1,500 for one eye, and £3,000 for both eyes. In addition, he would be charged £20 a day or £120 a week for in-patient care.

What shall we tell people in Liverpool and other places who are deprived of hospital treatment: that yesterday's Budget will enhance their life styles? We should not just wring our hands about the problems facing working people. We should explain to them not only why the situation has developed but, more importantly, how to resolve their problems — the problems of ordinary, decent people, not those of Conservative Members.

The Government engineered this Budget payola in three ways. Oil revenues have partially revived recently, with prices temporarily rising from $15 to $18 a barrel. There has been a boom in consumer spending, with people buying imports, as has been mentioned in the debate. That has been financed by credit, by loans and, in some instances, by bogus mortgages. VAT receipts have rocketed by 10 per cent. during the past year and company profits have continued to rise, mainly in the service industries and the finance sector. That has enabled the Government to raise extra revenue from the profits tax, which is up by 5 per cent.

Workers' incomes have risen by an average of 6 per cent. during the past year, but the Chancellor's receipts have increased by an extra 10·5 per cent., more than compensating for the 4 per cent. increase in spending that the Government gave out by way of more bribes last November. The Chancellor, having made the taxpayer pay £4 billion more than expected, thinks that he will kid the nation into believing that the Government, despite its disgraceful record in the areas that I have catalogued, is generously handing the money back in the form of tax cuts. The reality is that the Chancellor is trying to bribe us with our own money.

Before the Budget, hardly anyone supported the idea that the Chancellor should cut taxes. The CBI and the Right-wing London Business School economists said that it would be better to spend the entire revenue on subsidies to industry, improved transport facilities, sewers and communications, to help production and create jobs. Even the City, the dominant finance ring of capitalism, was not keen on tax cuts. It was worried that a boom in consumption would drive up inflation and threaten sterling's exchange rate. It is not surprising to find the CBI paying its due respects to the Chancellor today, because he has succeeded in improving conditions for the better off.

Only two days ago we found that Lucas Aerospace was pulling out of the CBI because that organisation has been solely conditioned to service industry in Britain; Lucas Aerospace is in manufacturing because it astutely realises that only through manufacturing industry can we have any wealth creation and a hopeful future for our people.

Only the Prime Minister and the loony Right of the Tory party are in favour of cuts in taxation because they see it as an election winner. They believe that further cuts in the burden of taxation on the high income groups can boost the economy and create unemployment, but the reality is that over the past seven years the tax handouts to the rich and the business interests have been invested not in industry but abroad.

Further tax cuts will largely benefit the rich and we shall see that in the months ahead. Obviously, however, tax cuts will also help the poor, and I am in some difficulty with my Front Bench over the policies that my right hon. Friends are pursuing. They talk about putting the tax back on to the taxpayer but people on low pay who are benefiting now from tax cuts would have to be looked after. My Front Bench would immediately withdraw the extra benefits that those people have received through tax cuts, but the people in Broadgreen do not want to know too much about that. Clearly, taxes are already too high for average working people and any cut is welcome.

Obviously the Tories hope to fool the people into believing that this Budget heralds a turn around in Britain's economic fortunes. Temporarily, the Government may be successful in their endeavours, but we have to tell working people that if they read Hansard for the report of debates that we had in the House on 18 November 1986 and as recently as 20 January this year they will see that hon. Members in all parts of the House presented a picture of decay and of collapse in the economy quite frightening in its implications for the capitalists and their political representatives. In the course of Commons debates, all the ammunition has been provided to show that British capitalism is in a state of terminal decay. In the debates the Prime Minister's supporters were allied to the City and to capital.

Unlike previous Tory Governments, this Government represents a section of the capitalist system that is based on finance — the banks, the insurance companies, services and the City of London. The long-term crisis in British capitalism has been enormously aggravated by the Government's measures. About 20 per cent. of manufacturing industry has disappeared since 1979. British manufacturing trade has moved from a £4·5 billion surplus in 1981 to a Government estimated deficit of £7·5 billion this year. Lloyds bank predicts that by 1990 Britain will have a balance of trade deficit in manufactured goods of over £13 billion. That is the reality of the crisis. The Government can patch it with candy floss by opening laundries and hotels—but unless Britain has a sound economic base as a trading nation it will fall further and further behind its competitors.

During the time that all this has been happening, there has been a massive drop in Britain's share of world manufactured trade. Almost six years into a boom—if we listen to the Government—manufacturing output is now 4 per cent. lower than it was in 1979. Who is trying to kid whom in these exchanges in the House? Conservative Members barracked my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and said that he was under estimating Britain's performance. He quietened the House when he said:

"To be fair and honest, I must admit that four other countries have a worse record than ours for manufactured output since 1979. Those countries are Fiji, Argentina, Senegal and Barbados." — [Official Report, 20 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 770.]

That is the league that we are in, the country that was once the workshop of the world. Conservative Members tell us that we should be proud of our service industries. A service industry needs a manufacturing base to service and we do not have that base. Investment back into industry is an important feature of capitalism, but even Conservative Members do not understand that. They fail to learn the lessons that investment back into industry of the surplus extracted from the labour of the working class is the engine of capitalism.

Even when the leasing of machinery to industry is taken into account, there has been a drop of 18 per cent. in manufacturing investment since 1979. The collapse is reflected in almost every industry from motor cars to shipping and to machine tools. It is not just the smoke-stack industries of coal and steel which have faced collapse. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), speaking about the information technology industry, said:

"A substantial part of our deficit in the balance of trade in manufactured goods comes from so-called sunrise industries. The figures for recent years show a pathetic record. In 1979 the deficit in office and data processing trade was £227 million. Last year it had risen to £670 million. In electronics engineering, the deficit in 1979 was £164 million and in 1985 it was over £1 billion".

My right hon. and learned Friend then quoted the Ashworth report, saying:

"'A sunrise industry is being eclipsed before it has even arisen . . . we are failing to the point where we cannot maintain key technologies . . . on present trends we will not have an independent broad based IT industry by the end of the decade.'"—[Official Report, 18 November 1986; Vol. 105, c. 460-61.]

The Government face the collapse of our industrial base with equanimity. Reflecting the pressure of finance capital, they naively expect that so-called service industries will arise to replace the destruction of the manufacturing base. In the long run this spells disaster for British capitalism and, more specifically from my point of view, for the working class. In common with a big section of the capitalist class the Prime Minister has forgotten that the production of real wealth comes from manufacturing and that services ultimately rely on manufacturing industry. For an economy to become absolutely dependent on service industries, candy-floss industries, is like taking in other people's washing, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said. The House of Lords inquiry into overseas trade clearly showed what service industries are all about.

I am always pleased to hear Karl Marx mentioned in any discussion of economics. His teachings are sadly lacking in British politics and have a lot to offer, certainly to my party, on the way forward during this crisis of capitalism which is there for all to see. Not long ago the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Bulmer) said:

"Marx described the drive to monopoly as the Achilles' heel of capitalism and we have seen a huge growth in takeovers. In 1983 they were worth £2·3 billion, in 1985 the figure was £7 billion and for the first six months of 1986 it is £8·4 billion".

The hon. Member dolefully declared:

"It is hardly healthy to see many large companies preferring to trade in other companies rather than developing their research programmes and producing new products". [Offical Report, 18 November 1986; Vol. 105, c. 492.]

Not only British capitalism but world capitalism is heading for another recession. A small news item in the Daily Telegraph today says:

"America's foreign trade deficit soared to an unprecedented 140·57 billion dollars last year, confirming its status as the world's largest debtor nation".

In the face of that world crisis and world recession, British capitalism is now the sickest of the sick capitalist nations and will face a worse situation than its competitors. That is the situation that will confront the Government who win the next general election. It took the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) to say recently:

"There is, therefore, a great deal of consolation for the Opposition and the alliance in the fact that they are going to lose the next election. There will be a nasty crisis in the next Parliament and the opposition parties can count themselves lucky that not they but my right hon. Friends"—

the Tory Cabinet—

"will be dealing with it."—[Official Report, 18 November 1987; Vol. 105, c. 500.]

We need to draw the necessary conclusions from an analysis of the deep-seated crisis within the capitalist system. Capitalism is incapable of taking the productive forces forward. I did not join the Labour party to manage capitalism. I did not come to Parliament to represent working people and to come to terms with managing capitalism. Only the Socialist transformation of society and a nationalised economy with a democratic Socialist plan of production can avoid the nightmare of massively increased unemployment and a sharp reduction in the living standards of working class people.

Unless the Government's policies are rejected in the next general election by the millions of working people looking to the future, especially on behalf of youth, we can look forward to a period of degeneration the likes of which we have never seen. We need a Labour Government striving towards Socialism. I am convinced that the electorate will respond in kind.

8.21 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): The hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) said early in his remarks that there was not a single element of job creation in the Budget. That is a travesty of the facts. I can only imagine that he either did not hear or has not read what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said. Nevertheless, I agree with him that there is scope for more to be done to reduce unemployment. For my right hon. Friend to announce in the autumn statement an increase in public expenditure of £4·75 billion and then in his following Budget to be able to knock 2p off income tax while at the same time reducing the PSBR by £3 billion below the previous year's budgetary figure is not, on the face of it, all that bad. Some people have referred to the Budget as a pedestrian Budget. It may not have had the excitement of the Champion hurdle, but if we can at least take small steps in the right direction and keep our feet, we are making progress. Not everyone can make that claim, as we all recall, having experienced the last Labour Government. It needs the considerable imagination of the Opposition to pretend that this is an electioneering Budget.

I am not sure what an electioneering Budget in present circumstances is, since the British people are sending out signals — if the polls are to be believed — implying a preference for public expenditure over tax cuts. That makes the design of a traditional so-called "election" Budget very difficult, so I am glad that my right hon. Friend has not tried to make such a Budget. Instead, given the money which he had in hand, I suspect that the balance between increasing public expenditure and taxation cuts was not far wrong. Despite the opinion polls' view that people are somewhat averse to tax cuts, I suspect that, in reality, few will object to paying 2p less in income tax. On top of that, I welcome the raising of tax thresholds. I was delighted to hear of the increased age allowance for those over 80 and the increase in the allowance for the blind.

None the less, I must express a shade of disappointment that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was not able to cut the rate of national insurance contributions on low earnings for both employers and employees. To have done that would have increased take-home pay and created employment. Equally, to have cut contributions on higher earnings would have added to industry's competitiveness. Part-time work could have been further encouraged by a higher earnings disregard coupled with a low earnings benefit to top up incomes to at least the unemployment or supplementary benefit levels.

Although it may be a little perverse to look a gift horse in the mouth, I consider that these ideas on contributions and benefits have a higher priority than income tax cuts. But I am unreservedly delighted by the help that the Government are giving small businesses. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has referred to the postponement of payment of VAT until bills have been paid. This will be a great boon, just as will be the lightening of the heavy hand of bureaucracy in regard to certain other aspects of VAT. I am convinced that the increase in the ceiling of retirement relief for capital gains tax and in the rate of business relief for inheritance tax will be of great benefit to the future of small businesses and will lessen the worries of small business men.

I have a small but not unimportant regret that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was not able to respond to the representations and requests of the National Farmers Union, the CBI and the Agricultural Engineers Association which urged that unincorporated businesses should benefit from 100 per cent. capital allowances on the first £10,000 of investment in plant and machinery. I am sure that, if my right hon. the Chancellor had been able to do that, it would have been of great benefit not only to farmers, whose concerns are of particular relevance in my constituency, but to all those who supply them with capital goods. Such action would have provided another helpful boost to the rural economy, which is not in the best of shape, as we all know. However, small and large businesses will benefit equally from the further cut in interest rates.

Manufacturing industry is always important, but it is even more so in the future as our main source of wealth creation as well as the means by which, more and more, once again we shall have to pay our way in the world. The balance of payments current account deficit hangs around like a black cloud foretelling, if not disaster, at least the threat of difficulties as oil revenues are reduced. Invisibles will continue to improve — of that I have no doubt — partly because of our overseas investment, but also because of the City of London. Thank heavens for the City, even if there should be no cheers for a very small number of its inmates. Without a stronger manufacturing base, the threat of difficulty in the balance of payments will turn into real difficulty.

The state of British industry can be summed up broadly as being better than for a very long time, but there is not enough of it. That is self-evident on two counts at least. First, we should look at the huge wastelands in many of our old industrial cities. Against that background, it is not surprising to learn that our industrial base has been reduced by between 5 and 6 per cent. since 1979. Secondly, we should take note of the fact that manufacturing output is still less than it was during the three-day week in 1974. In January 1974, the index of output for manufacturing industry was 106·9. In January 1987—these figures were issued yesterday—it was 103·9. What is more, the figure for January 1987 is well below the overall figure for 1979, which was 109·5. This situation cannot be right and urgent action is needed to stimulate still further the re-growth and redevelopment of manufacturing industry.

Of course, the solution lies partly in the hands of industry which must continue to improve its efficiency and competitiveness; but this matter is far too important to leave to industry alone. Government have a very important part to play. I would like to see the establishment of more development agencies or development corporations, but in the short term the Government must give industry a further boost.

Why not start with still more infrastructure schemes? We know how much more is needed in the way of new housing and house repairs, let alone roads and other programmes. Why do we not do more to match the remarkable programmes for hospitals or prisons, for example, with still more for housing? And let us not forget the local authority capital balances amounting to somewhere in the region of £6 billion, lying idle, frozen and sulky. I know, of course, that there is justifiable opposition within the Government to the thought of huge new council housing estates being developed, but why not allow the relief of some of these balances as long as they are used for joint schemes, for example, with housing associations or building societies, or with the private sector for a variety of types of housing? With a little imagination it could all be quite possible. It could boost the building industry and indirectly a lot of other industries besides. It could reduce unemployment and meet the housing needs of many more people.

If that action required an addition to the public sector borrowing requirement of £1 billion or so, I am not convinced that it would have dire consequences for interest rates. As what I am suggesting amounts mostly to capital expenditure, I suspect that the market would not react unfavourably. In any case the Chancellor has stated his support for a PSBR equal to 1 per cent. of gross domestic product. However, if The Times today is to be believed — I am the first to admit that it is not always to be believed — under the heading "PSBR plunges to £100 million" it states:

"The cumulative PSBR for the first 11 months of the financial year was just £100 million, compared with £2·7 billion at the same stage a year ago and £7·8 billion in the corresponding period of 1984-85."

Of course, the twelfth and last month of the current financial year could present a very different picture but hardly so different as to make up the annual figure to £4 billion.

I suspect — and very properly the Chancellor said yesterday — that he would have wished to be prudent and careful about his assessment of the outturn of the PSBR for the current year; but on the basis of the evidence in The Times it seems quite likely that it will be a good deal less than he suggested. Given also the Chancellor's optimism about the course of the economy for next year, on the basis of this year's experience, the PSBR for 1987-88 could quite possibly be minimal.

It may well be the ultimate objective to balance the books, and that would be entirely proper. But if we did, I hope that it would be at a time when unemployment was infinitely lower than today. Thus it seems to me well within the scope of responsible Government to give manufacturing industry, and therefore employment, still greater encouragement.

I have reserved my personal three cheers for the Government for the end of my speech. If for no other reason—there may be many others—the Chancellor will go down in history with one sizeable group of people as the man who abolished on-course betting duty. He estimates that his munificence to racegoers, racecourses and, as a result, one way or another, most people in the racing industry, will cost about £20 million. I hope sincerely that his generosity will be rewarded by an equivalent increase in revenue from off-course betting duty. Indeed it is well within the bounds of possibility that that will happen. If it does, as chairman of the parliamentary racing committee I might feel justified in coming along and asking for some further bounty. But in the meantime, I would like to express to the Chancellor the thanks of the racing world.

This Budget passes another furlong marker in the marathon race towards economic success. I must admit that I would like to see the race run a little faster, since, however much better we are doing in this country, many of our competitors are doing at least as well and some better still. Even so, we are improving and so is our stamina. For that the Chancellor of the Exchequer can take considerable credit.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): I can agree with some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) — in fact, there was a tinge of realism coming through, at least when he was talking about the infrastructure and the development of our wealth-creating base, particularly in manufacturing. It was welcome because there has been little reference by Tory Members to the wealth-creating base.

I listened very carefully to the Chancellor's statement yesterday, particularly for its effect on my own constituents, who unfortunately, in an inner-city area like Sheffield, Central, have borne the brunt of the Government's economic policy and have been victims of a similar industrial policy. Rather than giving hope for the future in both the short and the long term, the statement reinforced our social divisions and our divided nation, and underlined once again the mentality of the rat race.

Unemployment in my area is, on average, more than 30 per cent. and in pockets of the constituency about 50 per cent. The constituency has now been awarded first prize for having the highest number of under-25s unemployed in the United Kingdom. So disillusionment, despair and despondency abound in the constituency. If the Government create the conditions for the rat race, for greed and selfishness, there is a human reaction. The crime rate figures announced on Monday are a by-product of such a society. The Chancellor should move out of the ivory towers of the Treasury and see the devastation that his policies have caused in many of our inner cities.

The very good and thorough report commissioned by the Church of England "Faith in the City," ought to have been been taken on board by the Chancellor and the Government because it laid down an agenda for revitalising many of our communities. Unfortunately, once again, when they have a golden opportunity to do something about it, the Government have gone in the opposite direction. It was very unfortunate that the chairman of the Conservative party rubbished the report prior to its publication by calling it a Marxist document.

The Budget may well have been received with open arms in the City, but what is new about that? Every Budget introduced by this Chancellor has been accepted by the City. I can assure the Chancellor, however, that it has not been accepted by industrialists, who are highly critical of the way in which the City has treated manufacturing industry, particularly in the north. They cannot understand how the Government can gloat about modern capitalism where one takes the wealth of the nation and gets people to invest in paper money when there are real needs for investment in the manufacturing base, which is where the finance should have gone.

In Sheffield we have been developing an employment plan for the future. It was the subject of some ridicule by the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) when he was moving his ten-minute Bill this afternoon. It seems that it is now a crime for local authorities to consider seriously how they can develop employment plans, not just within the local authority itself but in partnership with industry, commerce and the retail trades. Conservative Members seem to see that as a crime and a subject for ridicule.

Our plan in Sheffield is to create 25,000 jobs in a two-year period. That would include 7,200 with the local authority, 3,700 with the public sector and 5,500 on training schemes. The private sector would have 5,000 in manufacturing, which would be a spin-off from that investment and there would be 3,000 in the service sector.

The cost of unemployment in Sheffield is now running at more than £300 million per year. That money is taken from the taxpayer and given to keep people idle. In Sheffield 47,000 people are registered as unemployed, but there are 8,000 on community programmes and youth training schemes, 3,000 women who are not registered and 3,000 men over 60 who do not register. Therefore, the unemployment figures are considerably worse than they would appear.

In developing the plan for Sheffield we have taken cognisance of the decline of the manufacturing base. That has been horrific since 1971 when nearly half the city's working population of 281,000 were employed in manufacturing. Ten years later that 139,000 had declined to 90,000 and we are now left with only 58,000, out of the 225,000 employed in Sheffield, who are employed in manufacturing, and there are about 200 job losses per month within the manufacturing base.

We have looked realistically at how we can work out, with a Government who are prepared to co-operate with local government how the money can be expended not only on employment but to develop infrastructure, provide better services and obtain a more compassionate society.

The 7,500 jobs directly under the local authority's control would cost about £100 million in the first year because £50 million would be on revenue and £40 million on capital. In the second year, which would be mainly revenue, it would cost about £52 million to put those 7,500 people back to work. The spin-off and the multiplying factor from that in the private sector, as I have already explained, would not just employ people but create wealth in itself.

We have worked out the employment cost and implications. Probably more important than that, a city such as Sheffield is trying to develop its infrastructure so that it can take us into the 21st century. That could well have been assisted by the Budget yesterday but, in fact, the Chancellor has turned away from it.

For example, combined heat and power is a development for which we have just signed the contract. Unfortunately, we had to go to a Scandinavian company for it. This will not only create 250 jobs but there will be 25 local firms involved in manufacturing for part of the project. It will provide lower heat costs not just for residents but for industry and it will use our energy resources much more economically. That is an example of an area of energy infrastructure that we had hoped the Chancellor would take cognisance of and encourage in terms of its application for energy resources as well as its employment implications.

On the matter of transport infrastructure, we hope that we will be able to develop an inland customs clearance, including the new Channel tunnel if and when it comes on stream, and try to regenerate the industrial infrastructure by attracting investment so that people who are producing in those areas can get the goods to the continent much more quickly. Unfortunately, Labour Members have had to extract from the Government in Committee the fact that they should start considering the development of inland customs clearance. Although the Government have not taken the responsibility themselves, at least they have charged that to British Rail and hopefully there will be some movement in that direction.

The electrification of the midland main line is an important feature for the north of England. We want communications with the capital as quickly as possible. Today the Minister of State, Department of Transport announced that British Rail Engineering Ltd. is to lay off 1,600 workers. Improved infrastructure would have a marked impact on BREL, GEC and many other major manufacturers in the United Kingdom. The development of an airport is also part of the development of the transport infrastructure.

Moving from the centre of Sheffield down the valley, called the lower Don valley, we are developing, again in co-operation with the private sector, the polytechnic and university, a science park and an infrastructure where small and medium-sized businesses can take off. We want something like £120 million over the next five years to develop that sort of infrastructure. That area will attract investment. We will be able to move into new technologies and apply those new technologies to the manufacturing base that still exists and give that some assistance so that hopefully it becomes more competitive.

That project alone could produce some 10,000 jobs over the next 10 years. If the Chancellor had been able to deal with the infrastructure even in the manner that has been called for by his hon. Friends, we would have seen a marked difference in unemployment and, in the longer term, it would have attracted investment. Many of the projects I have outlined, which can be multiplied across the United Kingdom, could have been assisted and developed much more quickly if the Chancellor had taken that opportunity.

Conservative Members talk about a working relationship with local government and private finance. A few weeks ago, Sheffield city council was nearly prevented by the Government from developing 2,000 houses for which it had arranged finance from the private and public sectors. We had obtained agreement that two thirds of those 2,000 houses would be at rents commensurate with the local authority rents. The Government attempted to stop that going through because of their vindictiveness and at 5 o'clock on a Thursday afternoon they made the announcement that if the deal was not signed by midnight on that night the 2,000 houses would be stopped. They also stopped other joint ventures of that nature going ahead. That could not only have meant 2,000 homes but could have meant many building jobs and we believe that it would have gone on to further developments.

One other part of the Budget which has been referred to by Conservative Members on a number of occasions concerns small and medium-sized businesses. I was at the European Investment Bank a few weeks ago and I asked why small and medium-sized businesses in the United Kingdom did not take advantage of the EIB's loan arrangements and the new Community instruments. I was told,

"It is very simple, Mr. Caborn."

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury issued a press release in 1984. The right hon. Gentleman stopped the changes to the exchange rate risk guarantee scheme when he was at the Department of Trade and Industry. The press release of 18 December 1984 states:

"Suitable transitional arrangements will be worked out with new Community instruments agent."

That was after he stopped the exchange rate risk guarantee scheme.

We are discussing small businesses — £20,000 to £50,000 arrangements. I asked how many companies were affected by it in 1984. There were 129 allocations, and we in the United Kingdom received £17·5 million for them. In 1985, there were 163 allocations, worth £37 million. I thought I would ask the Chancellor about the situation. In 1986, from the high of about £30 million to £40 million, a facility has been made available by the Community through the European Investment Bank and the Community instrument. In 1986, only six loans were made by the EIB. There was none through the new Community instrument. We got a grand total of £1·9 million. That is because of the right hon. Gentleman's action when he was at the Department of Trade and Industry.

What worries me even more is that the new Community instrument mark 4 is coming on line. This matter was discussed in Committee. A document entitled "Command 1986 (723)" states:

"The Government also notes in connection with the proposals relating to loan facilities for medium sized enterprises, at the December meeting the Council of Economic and Finance Ministers reached a common position of the new Community instrument mark 4. As proposed by the Commission, there will be new financial arrangements of 1,500 million ecu, which is £1,100 million."

Today I got the answer. First, the Department of Trade and Industry has cut that amount by half, and I have yet to check it out. More than that, £1,100 million has been made available, and it looks as though little will come to the United Kingdom. The best that we can get from a parliamentary answer is that it is not yet possible to estimate what proportion will come to the United Kingdom.

That shows clearly that the Government are not prepared to support, in an amenable way, small to medium enterprises. Indeed, they are not prepared to support local authorities, such as mine in Sheffield, of which I am proud. It is trying not only to assist the people of Sheffield but to revitalise the manufacturing base which, at the end of the day, creates wealth. Unfortunately, the Chancellor has missed a golden opportunity to revitalise and help the people of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Graham Bright (Luton, South): I hope that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) will not mind if I do not comment on his speech. I shall hammer on as fast as I can, as time is short.

I welcome and support the Budget. It offers an opportunity to sustain the economic recovery through steady growth and low inflation. That is important. The rise in our output and productivity in investment and exports bears comparison with that of any of our competitors. Indeed, we have seen a significant increase in the number of new jobs. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) quite clearly demonstrated that. The reduction in public borrowing is right in the present circumstances. Its effect has been and will be further to reduce interest rates. That is vital if the costs of industry and commerce are to be reduced. I know from experience in my business how much high interest rates deter investment. A fall in interest rates is particularly important for small firms. It will help them to invest and generate employment.

A lot is said about investment and the need to invest, but there is a difference between large and small firms. The more that capital is invested into a large firm, the more that investment goes into high technology and advanced manufacturing processes, which often means not an increase in the number of jobs but a loss of jobs. Small companies, which often have products and services that are designed for local and specialist markets, are labour-intensive. It is through encouraging them that the major proportion of new jobs will be created. Certainly, the track record of small businesses has been important in creating nearly 1 million new jobs.

One of the great bugbears of small firms is the burden of bureaucracy. Submitting accounts for VAT, especially when customers have not paid or may be about to go bankrupt, has been, to say the least, an absolute nightmare for many small companies. It is a major step forward for them to be allowed to pay VAT only when their bills have been paid. That relief from bad debts is long overdue and will be much appreciated by small companies. The introduction of optional annual accounting for businesses will also be welcomed. There will be far less hassle for small firms and a tremendous saving in administration, to say nothing of the saving of accountants' fees. Accounts can now be prepared just once a year. It will give an opportunity for properly prepared accounts to be submitted to customs and excise authorities and ensure that VAT is paid correctly. There will not be the to-ing and fro-ing that went on in the past.

As my hon. Friends will know, the reduction in the small firms' rate of corporation tax will be widely appreciated. In fact, any reduction in taxation will help their profitability and, I hope, their ability to reinvest. I should like to have seen—I know that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will recognise this old cry—the Government look at the possibility of a graduated scale for small companies, or at least some threshold similar to that relating to income tax, before small companies start to pay corporation tax. That would be much appreciated and would encourage tiny firms to invest further.

There is still the problem that I have mentioned before of the small firm trying to beat the taxman by rushing out at the end of the financial year and buying unnecessary things such as a new giant desk or a new car, when such money should be reinvested. I should like to see an opportunity for small companies to roll over corporation tax. They lack the ability of large companies to transfer money from company to company.

I make a constituency point that has nothing to do with small businesses. It concerns the motor car industry. We hoped that some of the 10 per cent. special car tax would be taken off motor cars. That would have helped Vauxhall to sell more cars. At present, when the mark is high, we would not have been able to say that we were sucking in many more cars from Europe. It would have given an opportunity for British Leyland, Vauxhall and Ford to manufacture cars here.

If they are to prosper, small firms know that they must depend on their own efforts. The support of the workforce is often the critical factor. For that reason, I am particularly pleased by the Budget's provisions for profit-related pay. My own company already operates a profit-sharing scheme. Many firms operate such schemes, and they have proved to be very successful. The profit-sharing scheme is a catalyst for improving productivity and pay. I am convinced that the extended proposals that were announced yesterday will prove to be effective in stimulating and rewarding employees.

The simplified pension schemes that are to become available to small firms are equally important. Without a flexible labour market, without occupational and geographical mobility, small firms are inevitably constricted in the benefits that they can offer to employees. The pension proposals will help to ease that problem.

However, small firms are not just organisations with a life span of a single generation. They are often—perhaps even typically—family enterprises that are destined to be handed on to children and grandchildren. It has never made sense to penalise such small businesses and to compel their sale by imposing heavy taxes on those to whom they are transferred.

Therefore I welcome the rise in the threshold for inheritance tax to £90,000 and the more generous treatment that is to be afforded to shares held in unquoted companies. That will help to relieve the burden on small companies, and the prospects for those companies being passed on intact to the next generation will be markedly improved.

There is no doubt that small businesses will benefit from the Budget. I have no doubt, either, that the economy as a whole will benefit from it. Careful measures that promote growth without stoking up inflation are what Britain needs. Dramatic and unfulfillable promises reflect no credit on those who make them. They offer no real, long-term solutions.

The Government have chosen the careful, prudent course. It was the only defensible route for them to take. I commend my right hon. Friends for their decision and I shall support them.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I believe that the Budget is very warmly welcomed in the country, including in York, particularly for the help it gives to small businesses, as my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) has just said, in encouraging the spirit of enterprise and recognising the needs of the elderly.

In particular, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the introduction of tax relief on profit-related pay. The tax exemption — up to 20 per cent. of total pay, or £3,000, whichever is lower — should be a boost to those who wish to see their firms prosper through greater efficiency. In effect, the proposed tax relief could mean that up to 4p comes off the basic rate of income tax. That, coupled with yesterday's announcement of a 2p reduction in the standard rate of tax, will take people even further out of tax.

Profit-related pay is a natural progression of the Conservative case to ensure that those who put most into a company secure the fruits of their labours. As an example, one of the first management buy-outs, National Freight, recently reported that the value of each share had risen to a staggering £41. The development of profit-related pay should remove the pressure on the round of automatic annual pay rises. That should be seen against the background of the strongest economy since the second world war. Personal tax cuts, coupled with lower mortgages, will give individuals a higher real disposable income.

The starting rate of income tax in the United Kingdom is still too high and it is well above the rates in competitor states. No wonder that there is a spirit of enterprise in the United States of America, with a starting rate of 11 per cent., in France, with a starting rate of 19 per cent., and in West Germany with a starting rate of 22 per cent. Therefore the Chancellor's move to continue the reduction in the basic rate by 2p is warmly welcomed. A rate of 27p is well down on the 33p that was inherited from the Labour party.

The sound management of the economy under a Conservative Government has allowed the state to take a lower proportion of people's earnings and savings. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) constantly goes on record as saying that Britain is heading for a sterling crisis—almost as though he is willing one. I am glad to see that the markets think differently and that they disregard the increasing irrelevance of Socialist policies.

As for individuals, I praise the understanding that has been shown for two groups who are particularly vulnerable, the elderly and the blind. Those who are over 80, many of whom will have used their savings, will appreciate the new age allowance, amounting to £3,070 for single people and £4,845 for married couples. The other group, the blind, will welcome the rise in their allowance to £540, which is three times above the level that applied when this Government took office.

There were, however, certain omissions from the Chancellor's statement. I shall briefly refer to them, and if my right hon. friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is unable to respond to them in his wind-up speech, I hope that he will write to me in due course.

First, there is surely a case in equity for reducing relief on mortgages to the standard rate. Furthermore, as the Conservatives are the natural party of the family, we should ensure that relief cannot be doubled by two unwedded individuals applying for one mortgage when a married couple are effectively penalised.

Secondly, as a further move to help the lower paid, the Government should build on the welcome but modest changes in the 1985 Budget by extending the 5 per cent. employee national insurance deduction rate. Currently it applies to weekly earnings up to £60. Such a move would encourage many more to seek work and find it beneficial. Otherwise the "Why work?" syndrome will continue. I hope that our ultimate objective is to merge PAYE and national insurance systems of deduction, which will simplify administration, particularly for small firms.

Thirdly, on the heritage of the nation, the Treasury could introduce tax credits when capital taxes are discharged with art treasures. For example, in 1977, Lord Coke tried to meet a tax liability of around £1 million by offering the Leonardo da Vinci "Codex Leicester" valued at £1·5 million. He asked for the balance to take the form of credit against future family taxes. That suggestion was rejected. The Leonardo went abroad and was lost to the nation.

Last year the Beatty family could have met its tax obligation by surrendering a Van Gogh painting entitled "Sunflowers". That summer image could now grace the national gallery of Scotland, but instead it has been sent to auction. It is much more likely that it will leave the United Kingdom to reside in Japan or the Getty museum in the United States. Surely the Treasury has nothing to lose with tax credits, and the nation gains.

I am delighted that the Chancellor has joined us, because this is a personal aspect. He said that he intended to make no excise changes in alcoholic drinks. Surely a sector was omitted. I believe that my right hon. Friend slaked his thirst yesterday with a cooler—a combination of wine and a soft drink. I imagine that it was ready-made and not pre-mixed and packaged in a can or bottle. If it had been, it would have attracted a high rate of tax—as penal as wine not exceeding 15 per cent. by volume.

If one takes seriously the problems associated with alcohol, the Government should encourage consumption of lower strength beverages. I suggest that a new rate of duty covering the 2 per cent. to 7 per cent. alcoholic range, is introduced to cover that sector, which has emerged as a separate group, and which is so delightful for our Front Bench.

In making those specific suggestions, I in no way wish to detract from the Government's success in investing in this country's infrastructure or in encouraging others to do likewise. The people of Britain and of York in particular see that solid investment, whether it is capital expenditure on roads, with improvements to the A1 and the building of the York outer ring road; on health care, which is up £42 million in the Yorkshire region for next year, which is 5·8 per cent. up over the current year; on railways, which have received £3,000 million of investment since the Conservatives took office, including £600 million in new rolling stock in the past three years; on education, with the best pupil-teacher ratio ever; and on job creation, with 1 million new jobs created since the general election — a faster rate of increase than all the EEC countries put together.

Like many oil producers, the United Kingdom has deliberately been pursuing a policy of competitive exchange depreciation. The Prime Minister deserves credit for this. Last year the pound's trade-weighted value fell by more than 10 per cent. and sterling reduced by over 20 per cent. against the countries of most industrial companies. We are the only major country the export volume of which is rising. Japan and the United States are flat, while West Germany and France's exports are falling. That is the background to the Budget.

The United Kingdom cannot afford a candy-floss economy, as the Socialists plan. Just imagine the effect of Labour's £34 billion pledges, which would mean raising the basic rate of tax, as we have heard tonight, from 27p right up to 56p in every pound, or to a VAT rate of just under 50 per cent. That would be a yoke that would stifle enterprise. Only the Conservatives can ensure that Britain stays great. The Budget builds on past success and looks forward constructively to the future.

9.9 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Conservative Members have described the Budget as cautious or prudent. However, it seems to me, after looking at what the Chancellor has done with the resources available, that it is a nervous Budget. He has set aside £3 billion to reduce the expected PSBR from £7 billion to £4 billion. The markets and the press expected a £1 billion or possibly a £2 billion reduction in PSBR. Why is there such a large provision? From the Bank of England's reactions to the markets over the past few days, it is clear that it is not convinced that everything is right with the British economy or with the exchange rate. The Bank of England was therefore reluctant to lower interest rates in advance of the Budget. First there was 0·5 per cent. cut, which was reluctantly admitted, and now today only another 0·5 per cent. cut. That was the amount expected before the Budget was announced with its unusually low PSBR. That 1 per cent. cut in interest rates over the past few days still leaves our real interest rates higher than all our major industrial competitors.

The Chancellor's actions reflect his fears. What are those fears? [Interruption.] I can hear the Chancellor muttering away about the 1983 election and once again perpetuating the myth that somehow or other the Government are not responsible for the years between 1979 and 1983. He must face up to the fact that the Government are responsible for eight years of damage to the British economy. It is no good the Chancellor muttering in a patronising fashion. We all know the truth about what has happened in the past eight years.

What are the fears about? Are they about hot money flowing in and out? Are they about exchange rate instability or are they about the growth of bank lending? The figures for February will not be announced until tomorrow. Is it true that there is a sudden surge in bank lending that has delayed any further interest rate cut?

The Red Book, which in some ways is extraordinarily honest this time, given the Government's record in these matters, states:

> "Private sector borrowing has been rising and is now over 10 per cent. of GDP. It has clearly contributed more than public borrowing to upward pressure on real interest rates. These trends are likely to persist".

Expressed as it is in bland language, it nevertheless states the truth. The Government are determined that consumer spending shall continue to grow and that it will be fuelled by consumer credit until the election takes place. Then, of course, if we are unfortunate enough to have to face another Tory Government, consumer credit will be curbed. That has fuelled the high interest rates from which we are now suffering and it has led to the anomaly that last year manufacturing investment actually fell while consumer spending continued to rise. That means that once again British manufacturers, through lack of investment, are unable to fulfil the demands of the continuing high rate of consumer spending.

Cutting PSBR in that way is the only option open to the Chancellor. He referred to the Governor of the Bank of England's Loughborough speech of last autumn in his Budget speech yesterday. However, the Chancellor did not admit that the Governor had quite plainly told him that the broad money target was no longer feasible and that the Chancellor had better make up his mind on that issue quickly so that the target could be abandoned and with it the last vestiges of monetarism. The Chancellor must now rely solely on PSBR, and with that the City demanded its pound of flesh and the Chancellor gave it two pounds.

That prevented him, in his attempt to reduce the PSBR for the next financial year, from carrying out tax cuts which, judging from engineered leaks, he presumably wanted to make. He wanted to cut higher tax rates and to go down to a 25p standard rate straight away rather than promising us that rate yet again. He wanted to raise the mortgage tax relief ceiling. He has not been able to do any of that. Apparently he has not been able to do what he wanted. He has not been able to do anything of real benefit for the economy and he has not been able to do anything for the unemployed.

The size of the public sector borrowing requirement and the cost of the 2p cut in the standard rate of income tax show what resources were available to the Chancellor. Those resources could have been used to create real jobs, but the Chancellor chose to use them in such a way as to prevent the creation of full-time jobs. In his Budget speech there was scarcely a measure aimed at bringing down unemployment and creating jobs. There was no sense of any real concern about the unemployed. The Chancellor continues to believe that tax cuts will stimulate the economy and create jobs — a view that has been thoroughly rubbished by the Opposition in today's debate.

The Chancellor is, however, extremely sensitive about the fact that his Budget does nothing to create real jobs. In his interview on the "Today" programme this morning, the Chancellor made it clear to Brian Redhead that to be concerned about real jobs apparently means being a member of the Labour party. He is quite right, as the Labour party is concerned to create real jobs. The Chancellor and his party have no concern about that at all. They prefer to fiddle the figures and pretend that part-time jobs and the double-jobbing of the past couple of years represent a decrease in unemployment. The Chancellor refuses to consider the figures for the number of people in employment, which still have not reached the levels of 1979. That is the point at issue.

The Budget is a fearful Budget because the Chancellor is afraid of developments in the markets and the deteriorating balance of payments. According to the Red Book, the balance of payments deficit will be £2·5 billion up on the £1 billion estimate given in the autumn statement and the £3 billion surplus in 1985, turned into a deficit of £1 billion in 1986, with a deficit of £8 billion in visible trade. The Red Book suggests that the deficit may disappear in the next year, but that depends entirely on the improbable view that the import of goods and services will fall from the expected 7 per cent. this year to 3 per cent. in 1988, and there is absolutely no good reason to believe that. The balance of payments figure is deteriorating because our output is lower than it was in 1979, our investment is 20 per cent. down on 1979, and although exports of manufactured goods have risen by 15 per cent. the level of imports has risen by 48 per cent. since 1979.

The Government show no concern whatever about the growing deficit in manufactured goods. They pretend that the deficit can be hidden by a surplus in oil — a diminishing asset — or by a surplus in invisibles. They ignore the fact that last year there was a cumulative deficit in invisibles. In each of the eight months from May 1986 there was a recorded deficit in invisible earnings, as well as a deficit in March of that year. We can no longer assume that the growing deficit in manufacturing goods will be covered by a surplus in invisibles or in oil. The only way to tackle the problem of the balance of payments deficit is a proper long-term strategy for jobs and for manufacturing industry. There is a growing demand for consumer goods, but those goods must be provided by British industry. It is a question of goods being competitive not only in price but in quality. That too, will demand investment in manufacturing industry.

What the Chancellor has dismissed as utterly unimportant, three successful manufacturers insist is vital in the interviews they gave to the Financial Times yesterday. Mr. Haskins, the chairman of Northern Foods, believes that it is the growing "investment gap between Britain and other developed countries that counts."

He stated:

"'The level of investment is too low. Industry is revaluing old assets through takeovers rather than pumping money into new assets.'"

It is only when better investment in manufacturing industry takes place that British industry will be able to supply consumer demand with the sort of goods it wants at the quality and price it wants. That is the commitment that the Labour party has, but which the Government manifestly do not have, when they have shown——

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): One of the hon. Lady's colleagues visited a car factory in a foreign car.

Dr. McDonald: Belonging to a Conservative Member perhaps? It would certainly not belong to me or any of my hon. Friends, who take care to buy British cars. We are patriotic, whereas the Government are determined to allow the export of investment capital abroad to create jobs there rather than here.

Mr. Carlisle: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dr. McDonald: No, I shall not give way; it is not worth it.

This Budget has offered nothing for jobs, investment and certainly nothing for the low-paid. The Prime Minister has continued to talk about poverty ever since she quoted, in the most sickening way possible, the prayer of St. Francis of Asissi on the doorstep of No. 10 when she was first elected in 1979. Ever since then, when she has talked about the people in the bottom half, who pay too high a proportion of their income in tax, or when she has talked about nurses, she has let it stop at talk. Nothing has been done to reduce the burden of taxation on the low-paid. At every turn we can see that that is the case.

Even with the choices before him in this Budget, the Chancellor chose to take 2p off the standard rate of income tax instead, for example, of using those resources to increase personal allowances, beyond indexation, by 10 per cent., which would have taken a million of the lowest paid out of taxation. Of course, that was the option that the Chancellor set aside because he was determined to concentrate on taxation. Instead, he knocked that money off the standard rate, knowing full well that that means that it will bring a tax cut, when taken together with indexation, of £8·60p a week for someone on twice average earnings. For someone on five times average earnings, it will mean £9·27 a week compared with a reduction of £3·92p a week for someone on average earnings.

During the past eight years the top 5 per cent. have not only had the highest pay increases—in real terms, of 22 per cent.—but they have also increased their share of post-tax income, which has increased from 12 to 15 per cent., if we take tax and national insurance contributions together. Under this Government despite the apparent tax cuts, the proportion of tax paid by those on the lowest pay has increased, and the proportion of tax and national insurance paid by those with the highest incomes has decreased. The entire tax system has been carefully manipulated—we see that year after year in the Finance Bill—to give benefits to the rich at the expense of the poor. That has been the sole purpose of the tax changes.

I noticed that in presenting his Budget the Chancellor commented that a man on average earnings would benefit by about £3 a week from the tax changes. That comment made me wonder how the majority of the electorate, women, would benefit from the Budget. On examination, I found that women will come off worse. Women on half average earnings and even those on average earnings have all suffered an increase in the burden of tax and national insurance once again since 1979. Few women benefit under this Budget.

Women in full-time work earning less than £123 a week constitute nearly 3 million workers and women in part-time work earning less than £3·25 per hour number just over 3 million. Altogether, 6 million of a work force of 9 million women, whether in full-time or part-time work, benefit little from the 2p off the standard rate of income tax. It is interesting that in what is supposed to be an election year the Chancellor chooses to ignore the majority of the electorate. He will find that he pays the price for that sooner or later, whenever the Prime Minister summons up the nerve to go to the electorate. [Laughter.]

Mr. Peter Lilley (St. Albans): The hon. Lady is laughing.

Dr. McDonald: I am laughing at the prospect of women giving the thumbs down to the Government who are led by our first women Prime Minister, who has deliberately reduced benefits to women, altered conditions of employment to their disadvantage, allowed, through the abolition of the wages councils and fair wages resolutions, women's wages to fall and allowed this Budget, in which 6 million women at work will benefit far less than men. That is what I am laughing at.

There was much talk about the notion of independent taxation for married women, but no plans for that have been mentioned in the Budget. For many married women child benefit is extremely important as they take the prime responsibility for bringing up children, yet the Chancellor has given them all of 15p a week extra per child. I have no idea what he imagines they are supposed to with that. It would not even buy a packet of Smarties and it would certainly not buy anything useful, such as food or clothing.

I then looked at the age allowance and assistance given to pensioners in general and women in particular. Women between the ages of 60 and 64 must still wait for the age allowance, despite receiving the old-age pension at the age of 60, so nothing has been done to help that particular group of women. Despite the changes in taxation over the past eight years, single pensioners continue to pay £1·28 a week more in tax than they did under the Labour Government. Naturally, we welcome any concession for any disadvantaged group, but the over-80s are still paying more tax. Under the Labour Government, single people over 80 paid 68p a week and married couples £1·45. With all those resources at his disposal, the Chancellor could find room to give only 80p a week more to single pensioners. Many women in that category will have expected more from the Government.

So when we look at this Budget we find that there is nothing there for most women and for most women at work. Over half the electorate have been ignored. Over half the electorate have seen for the past eight years their conditions of work and the possibility of caring for their children or for elderly relatives in the community being made much more difficult for them by the cuts in community care and health services. They have watched the standard of education of their children being destroyed. [Interruption.] I not only believe that but have seen it happening in my constituency. When I attend an advice surgery, go to the shopping centre or meet pensioners in their clubs, this is exactly what I find, that they find it a much harder struggle and that it has become increasingly hard under this Government. But of course, Government Members would have no idea what it is like to struggle to bring up children and look after elderly relatives and cope with declining services.

We find that it is all part of the record of this Government—giving with one hand and taking with the other. For, just as the tax cuts come through after 17 May, people will begin to receive their rates bills, which, owing to the cuts in central Government grants from 59 per cent. in 1979 to 44 per cent. in 1986-87, have gone up, adding another 4p in the terms of income tax between the years 1979 and 1984. The rates burden has gone up in real terms over the past eight years in spite of the promise that the Prime Minister made to abolish them. Instead of abolishing rates, she ensured that they were a heavier burden on households by cutting the central Government grants.

So I know what I will find in my constituency when the Budget begins to take effect. People will say, as indeed they have said to me already, two things: "They give it to us with one hand and take it away from us with another." If the Tories get back in it will be, "We know that we shall be paying for this Budget again because we shall have what we had before—value added tax being virtually doubled to pay the price of the Government's misdemeanours." That is what my constituents say to me. That is the result of the kind of Budget that the Chancellor has introduced. That is why the Opposition reject entirely the approach of this Government, not only to our economy, but to the needs of the kind of people that we represent.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): There have been a number of points with regard to the Budget on which both Opposition and Government Members have been able to agree. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was able to welcome at least some of the measures for small businesses and the measure to help the blind—the blind allowance —which was also referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright). On that, at least, there has been agreement, but, alas, on precious little else.

The most striking feature of the debate has been the inconsistent and confused reaction to the Budget of the Opposition parties. They have constantly shifted their ground. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook referred to the Budget as a non-event. I think that most of the people of this country would wish that we could have more such non-events. It is not every day that we get interest rates down within 24 hours of the Budget and 2p off the basic rate of tax. If those are non-events, I am sure that the British people would like to have very many more of them.

It is striking also that the right hon. Gentleman, in giving his assessment of the Budget, made no reference to what was the verdict of the Confederation of British Industry or of the markets, both of which unambiguously and clearly indicated that they thought it was an excellent Budget. The right hon. Gentleman prefers his own judgment to that of the markets and that is why, because he has that confidence in his own misjudment, if the right hon. Gentleman ever was in power he would enjoy no confidence whatsoever from the financial markets.

The right hon. Gentleman also referred to some of my hon. Friends perhaps being disappointed at the content of the Budget and having expected that my right hon. Friend might have gone even further. I do not know whether that was what some of my hon. Friends thought but certainly the reaction of Opposition Members when they heard the Budget was immense relief that my right hon. Friend had been so prudent. In the days before the Budget we noticed the mounting anxiety of Opposition Members. They were afraid that there would be even bigger tax cuts. There was a lot of talk in advance, especially from the alliance, about electioneering Budgets and bribes. When the Budget was out of the way that did not stop the alliance saying that we should have had a bit more and an even more generous Budget.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) managed to get on television. First he said that the Budget was one of election bribes; yet, a few minutes later, he said that the Chancellor had been over-prudent. How the hon. Gentleman manages to reconcile those two positions I do not know. When he proposes more spending he thinks that it is not a bribe, but when the Chancellor simply allows people to keep more of their own money, somehow it is a bribe.

Furthermore, I notice that both Opposition parties are united in telling us that tax cuts are unpopular. How we are meant to bribe the electorate with something so unpopular I am not clear.

We also had the benefit of the first speech by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) since he became chancellor of the university of Oxford. The right hon. Gentleman told me that he could not be here for the end of the debate. I am sorry that I have not had an opportunity to congratulate him on his election. No doubt he has had other matters on his mind apart from the Budget, but if he were present I would point out to him that today's speech was one of the least convincing that I have ever heard from him.

First, the right hon. Gentleman attacked the Government over the trend in the current account and then admitted that his own calculations indicated that an alliance Budget would create an even bigger deficit. He gave no explanation of the cornerstone of alliance policy — a tax-based incomes policy — which is surely an enormous administrative, bureaucratic, unworkable nightmare. If alliance Members think it so important, they owe the country an explanation of how it will work.

Some of us have harboured more than a passing suspicion that the alliance is more than content to be all things to all men. Certainly that was more than confirmed by the right hon. Gentleman's speech when he came to the subject of income tax. He was challenged to give the alliance view on what the income tax rate should be. He said that he would come to it. He did come to it but he passed on without answering it. He rather twisted in the wind when he was asked to explain how the alliance could vote against the tax cuts but could not say whether it was committed to reversing them. Again he left the impression that he was content to be all things to all voters all the time.

At least the Labour party has come clean on this and has made it clear that it is firmly committed to reversing the tax cuts not just in this Budget but in previous Budgets as well. If the right hon. Member for Hillhead and his colleagues, who pride themselves on their courage, really had courage, they would have come clean today and would have spoken frankly to the electorate. [Interruption.] That was a most interesting sedentary interjection. I shall repeat it for the benefit of the Hansard reporters. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) said they did not come clean because it would amount to electoral suicide.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I was referring, of course, to the characteristic of suicide associated with the Labour party.

Mr. Lamont: That is an ingenious second intervention but tomorrow's Hansard will make perfectly clear what the hon. Gentleman's first intervention referred to. It referred to committing electoral suicide by coming clean on policies for taxation.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook criticised the Budget because it did not increase spending in priority areas, because it had given a higher priority to tax cuts than to increasing public expenditure. As he said at the beginning of his speech, there is a sharp divide between the two main parties in the House. The right hon. Gentleman might at least have acknowledged that the Budget has to be looked at alongside the autumn statement, which did increase public expenditure in the priority areas of housing, education and health.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about all the money for tax cuts, but the extra public expenditure amounts to more money than has been found for the tax cuts in the Budget. Because of that, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is well justified in saying that it is a great achievement of the Government that we have managed to increase spending and cut taxes at the same time.

The right hon. Gentleman was quick to say how he would spend the extra money that my right hon. Friend has had available to him this year. The right hon. Gentleman has much the same attitude to these extra revenues as he has to oil revenues. The Opposition simply cannot wait to get their hands on the oil revenues which they think the Government ought to spend on subsidies to industry. If there is one thing that Britain has cause to be grateful for, it is that oil revenues have been handled by this Government and not by the Opposition.

In his speech the right hon. Gentleman did not pause to ask why Government policies have been so successful in generating additional revenue. He just accepted the revenue without for one minute asking how we had managed to cut the rate of corporation tax and yet generate additional revenue. In his speech he tried to give the impression that the extra buoyancy of revenue was due to indirect taxes. The largest part of the increase in revenue comes from the corporate sector, from corporation tax. It is as a direct result of the Government's economic policies that we have this buoyancy in revenue. The extra revenue in corporation tax has been based on the increased profitability and the increased productivity of British industry. That is where it comes from. The right hon. Gentleman says that he would spend it and knows how to spend it, but he will not get the chance because if he ever tried to implement his policies that revenue would not be there.

My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) spoke about wider share ownership and privatisation. The Government policies of encouraging wider share ownership have been extremely successful. My hon. Friend may know that we also have new evidence about just how successful we have been in extending share ownership.

I know that the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is interested in the survey commissioned by the Treasury and the stock exchange to which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred in his speech. That survey is now available in the Library and it shows that share ownership has trebled since 1979. About 8·5 million people, almost 20 per cent. of the adult population, now own shares. The increase in share ownership has been widely spread across social groups, with the most marked increases being among the less well off.

The spread of share ownership in the United Kingdom is fast approaching that in the United States, where perhaps 25 per cent. of adults now own shares. Of the 5·5 million new shareholders, the great majority have bought shares as the direct result of Government policies, notably the outstandingly successful privatisation programme and the incentives provided for employee share schemes.

When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred to the spread of share ownership, the House noticed how the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) reacted by shouting out, "So what?" That is a sad commentary. the hon. Gentleman is a symbol of the Labour party, which is utterly unaware of the changes taking place through share ownership, through profit sharing and through people buying shares in privatisation issues. These are enormous, far-reaching changes to which the Labour party is utterly indifferent and which it plays no part in furthering.

Privatisation has been a key element in the Government's policy. Indeed, the last year, with the privatisation of British Gas and the flotation of the Trustee Savings bank, has seen the creation of as many new shareholders as there were existing shareholders when the Government took office in 1979.

We shall continue to build on this success, especially through further Government share sales. We have already announced our intention to privatise Rolls-Royce in the spring, followed by the British Airports Authority in the summer. In addition, the Government's policy is to sell their minority shareholdings in companies as and when circumstances permit. Among these holdings — the Opposition might be interested in this—are about 578·5 million shares in BP, nearly 32 per cent. of the total. As part of this policy, I am now able to announce that, subject to market conditions, the Government will sell this remaining shareholding in BP during the 1987-88 financial year.

Our measures to promote employee share ownership have met with similar success. It is here that the benefits of share ownership are clearest. It is where people can identify with the company with which they work. There has been a spectacular growth as a result of the measures which we have taken. There are now more than 1,200 all-employee share schemes, against 30 in 1979.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred to a number of changes in the business expansion scheme.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lamont: I wanted to comment on the business expansion scheme and shipping because my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced a number of changes and I have one minor announcement to make. Last year we extended the business expansion scheme to ship chartering, and there have been signs of interest in it. However, there are still some doubts about what a ship chartering company has to do to satisfy the BES requirement that its trade must be carried out wholly or mainly in the United Kingdom. We are considering how the existing statement of practice can be revised to resolve these doubts and the Inland Revenue is consulting the General Council of British Shipping about this. We hope to reach agreement soon and to publish a revised statement of practice.

Last year, on Budget day, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor published a Green Paper on the "Reform of Personal Taxation". The Government invited comments from organisations, representative bodies and members of the public on the ideas discussed in the Green Paper. The response to the Green Paper has been disappointingly thin. Although the majority of those who responded to the Government's invitation expressed themselves in favour of transferable allowances, the Government do not yet feel that there is sufficient support to take a decision now to go ahead with so far-reaching a reform. Nevertheless, the Government consider it important both that the tax system should give women a fair deal and that the tax penalties in marriage should be removed, so we will be considering the matter further and will be exploring whether there is any satisfactory halfway house to the approach in the Green Paper.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook criticised the Government for giving so much of their tax cuts through reductions in the basic rate, but we have deliberately structured this year's tax changes so that the benefits are aimed at the vast majority of ordinary taxpayers. If we had decided to leave this year's tax regime in place for 1987-88, taxpayers with incomes below average earnings would have contributed 29 per cent. of the total income tax yield, but, as a result of our proposals, this group will receive some 37 per cent. of the total income tax reductions in the Budget. By contrast, those on more than twice average earnings would be paying some 32 per cent. of the income tax yield if we had left the 1986-87 regime in place, but will be receiving only some 21 per cent. of the total income tax reductions.

The further reduction of 2p in the basic rate means that in total the basic rate is now six points lower than when we took office. Hon. Members on the Opposition Benches have expressed scepticism about the incentive effect of 2p off the basic rate, but this needs to be seen in the context of a succession of Budgets and of the fact that we have managed to get the rate down from the 33p in the pound that it was when we first came to office. In addition, everyone in every income group, no matter what their level of earnings, now pays less in income tax and national insurance contributions combined than would have been the case if we had kept the previous Labour Government's tax regime in place and simply adjusted it for inflation. That is an absurdly flattering comparison for the Opposition because the truth is that they never would have adjusted the allowances for inflation. They completely failed when in government to do so. But what we are saying is that even if they had done that the tax regime today for every single income group is lower than it would have been if we had simply carried on adjusting their income tax regime for inflation.

Mr. Buchan: Will the Minister tell me the taxation element for those below taxation levels as a result of 15 per cent. value added tax? What is the proportion that they pay?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman will have realised that my comments were about those who pay tax. I will come to his point, but in no way was what I said contradicted by the hon. Gentleman's intervention. For every income tax group we have reduced the tax burden that would have been borne if we had simply kept the Labour regime as it was and adjusted for inflation.

As for the hon. Gentleman's comments about indirect taxes, which Opposition Members sometimes like to add on to direct taxes in order to argue that the tax burden has been increased, the key point is that real take-home pay, calculated after taking into account indirect taxes, has risen since 1978-79 at all levels of earnings.

Dr. McDonald rose——

Mr. Lamont: I will give way in a minute.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary made it very clear today that not just people on average earnings but people on below-average earnings have benefited from a much faster rate of increase in take-home pay than they ever had when the Labour party was in power.

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Gentleman's use of average figures is entirely misleading. The top end of wage earners have had a real increase of 22 per cent. over the years between 1979 and 1986. However, at the bottom end the increase has been a mere 2 per cent. The use of average earnings gives an entirely misleading impression, because it does not show that many people on below average earnings have seen very little increase in real earnings since the Government took office.

Mr. Lamont: I am sorry that I gave way to the hon. Lady because she in no way met or refuted the point I was making, which is that people on average earnings, in their take-home pay after tax and after taking account of indirect taxation, have done much better under this Government than they did under the Labour Administration.

My hon. Friends the Members for Horsham, for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and for Luton, South referred to the provisions for occupational pensions in the Budget. I am sure that they are absolutely right that the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor about personal pensions will be extremely important in making available occupations pensions to those 10 million people who are not in schemes at present. It will also be an invaluable aid to job mobility which is so important.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) referred to and welcomed the measures to help the oil industry in the Budget, of which there were two: the cross-field allowance and the relief for research related to oil extraction activities. The House will know that we have already brought forward the repayment of some £300 million of advance petroleum revenue tax so that we have, in a number of ways, attempted to ease the burden of adjustment that has fallen on the oil companies.

Opposition Members have said that this is a Budget that does nothing for unemployment. They talk about the Budget and employment as if a Budget for the economy and a Budget for employment were separate things. If the Budget is good for the economy, it is good for employment. It has been the verdict of the markets and the CBI that it will be good for business and for industry. That means that it will ensure that the favorable trend for employment that we have seen in the past few months will continue.

Opposition Members have sought to argue that my right hon. Friend has provided a picture of the British economy that is over-optimistic and over-rosy. I was interested to read an article in The Guardian by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) who advised his party to wake up to the fact that the outlook for the British economy is now much better than it has been before. He said:

"the actual prospect is rosier; an opportunity for growth rather than a prelude to the disaster for which we have so assiduously prepared . . . So, far from slipping into a balance of payments disaster, Britain is probably riding a J-curve. Exports are rising; imports, currently, are not".

The article states:

"Labour should stop crying wolf."

I think that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby is right. Opposition Members do themselves no good pretending that the economy is stagnating when it is not and pretending that output is not increasing when it has increased way above the levels the Labour party achieved when it was in office

Opposition Members talk about manufacturing. That is important but it is only one component of total output in our economy. Less than a quarter of the labour force are employed in manufacturing. Labour Members like to live in a world in which they think that shipbuilding is more important than financial services or other services. They do not recognise the new industries and services that are beginning to be created and which are appearing. That is why it is perfectly true, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said, that whereas in the 1960s and 1970s Britain was bottom of the growth league, today we are at the top. Everything that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in his Budget speech indicates that that process will continue. We have a solid base for success. The economy of the country is strong in a way that it has not been for years.

Debate adjourned.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Liverpool (Financial Situation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now Adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

9.59 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I thank the House for the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment the problems of the city of Liverpool. It is not my intention to rake over the entrails or to try to rewrite an Agatha Christie whodunnit. There is no real point in using this debate to apportion blame for the serious problems that Liverpool faces. All I wish to do in the context of the judgment made in the other place last week concerning the disqualification of 47 Liverpool councillors is to offer the view, which, I think, is shared by other hon. Members, that many of the councillors were highly motivated people, some of whom I had the privilege to serve alongside for eight years when, 15 years ago, I was elected to Liverpool city council. The motives of people such as John Hamilton are certainly beyond question. If there is anything that the Government are able to do to prevent the personal bankruptcy of such individuals, I sincerely hope that they will do it. No further useful purpose will be served by vindictive actions being taken against the councillors.

The other point that I wish to make at the outset of my remarks—which also echoes comments that have been made by the Bishop and the Archbishop of Liverpool and the Moderator of the Free Churches—is that this is not a moment for recriminations or for people to indulge in yet more confrontation. It is a time when partnership is required to try to redress the serious and deepseated problems of Liverpool. In a statement at the weekend, these remarkable churchmen said:

"Electors should keep in mind the need to choose Councillors who, whilst persevering in their long-term party political aspirations, may be willing in the difficult years ahead to cooperate across party barriers for the good of the City as a whole. Only with a majority of such Councillors can the City achieve sufficient stability to secure the confident partnership and collaboration of central government."

I am certain that the partnership and collaboration that they talked about should be the theme and the key of the comments heard in the Chamber tonight.

The significance of the debate is not that it will solve problems but that it will demonstrate that a partnership and a willingness to co-operate exist. Certainly that willingness exists on the Opposition Benches. I know that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), with whom I have talked before the debate, will make many comments with which I can certainly associate myself, and in turn, I hope that he will be able to endorse my comments. Together, we can find common ground whereby we can pursue objectives that will be for the good of the people of the city of Liverpool. I am sure also that if the Government are prepared to listen with an open mind and to show a more flexible and pragmatic approach, it will be possible to find co-operation across the Floor of the House as well as on Opposition Benches.

Politics is a risk-taking business. The hon. Member for Blackburn and I will no doubt be criticised for seeking to co-operate. There are always people who will say that there can be no room in politics for trying to find common ground. Yet, given the scale of the problems in the city of Liverpool, nothing other than co-operation will find solutions to the problems of our city. People will expect an appropriate response from the Government. The situation is serious.

In the next fiscal year, there is a gap of about £50 million between the expected revenue that the city will receive by way of rates and the expenditure that has already been budgeted. The corporate debt of the city, which goes back over many years, has now reached an accumulated total of around £800 million—a staggering figure. This year, the debt charges, before subsidies are taken into account, will cost £97 million to service. Of course, they will go up further next year when the £60 million that was borrowed in the past 12 months from Swiss and Japanese bankers comes to maturity. Therefore, the debt, in relation to the population of the city of Liverpool, is considerable.

The decline in population has been phenomenal. About a third of the city's population has left Liverpool in the last 20 years. That has compounded the problem in many respects. Every time that people leave, the city loses rates and the rate support grant that goes with rates. Every time people leave, the city communities are fractured and families are split up. They leave a legacy of empty properties. There are more than 8,000 empty municipally owned properties in the city of Liverpool.

There are other factors, too. There is an increasingly elderly population. One in four are over retirement age, the fastest growing group being the over-80s. One in five are unemployed. That, too, has compounded the problem, because fewer people are in a position to contribute to the running of the city. The problem of collecting revenue has been exacerbated as companies have gone out of business and as shops have been closed. In the last 12 months £1·4 million was lost in uncollected rates because of liquidations and bankruptcies. Of the 36 metropolitan districts, the city of Liverpool has the third highest business rate, partly because there has been no rating revaluation since 1972.

These are serious problems. Paradoxically, they are further compounded by useful Government initiatives that were taken several years ago. For instance, the inner city partnership schemes, such as nurseries, which are now being funded by the city council, were set up with Government funds. Worthwhile initiatives are being placed in jeopardy because there are insufficient funds to keep them in existence.

What can be done? First, I should like the district auditor to come to Liverpool in a different capacity. I believe that many councillors would like him to conduct an efficiency audit survey. If he were to examine line by line the services of the city and if he were to consider whether value for money could be improved, or whether savings might be made, or whether more resources are genuinely required, I am sure that it would be welcomed. I hope that the Government would take seriously the independent findings of the district auditor and that they would respond positively to any suggestions that he might make.

Secondly, perhaps the Government would consider the rescheduling of loans so that debt charges could be pushed forward to later years. That would help, too. Similarly the Government should look at the way in which the rate support grant formula works, especially in areas where there has been massive depopulation. If there were a bigger response by the Housing Corporation to housing co-operatives and housing associations, useful resources could be provided for the city without the rate support grant having to be increased, which the Government might find politically difficult.

The Government could take other measures to respond positively to the city's needs. We are constantly being told that there should be a partnership between the private and the public sectors. Private enterprise has come forward with the Mersey barrage initiative. Up to £220 million of private investment has been offered. That would create jobs, which in turn would create electricity and new deep sea water facilities in the mouth of the Mersey. If such a project were to go ahead what a symbol of hope that would be to the people of Merseyside. However, Government commitment is needed. There has been some help to date, especially from the Under-Secretary of State for Energy, the hon. Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt). I hope that the Government will pursue that commitment, in partnership with the local authority and with all the political parties, so that that dream may become a reality.

Similarly, the free port has been a great success. Of the six free ports that were established by the Government, the Liverpool free port has been the biggest success, but it could be an even greater success and could create more jobs, especially in manufacturing, if the VAT restrictions were to be removed. Perhaps the Government would consider that point, too.

As for Liverpool airport, the five authorities have been unable to provide for it in the next fiscal year. That means that the airport will face closure, with the loss of jobs and the loss of prestige in the area, unless there is a positive Government response.

These are not easy issues to resolve, but invective and abuse will get us nowhere. We must turn around the city's image. Glasgow did it very successfully, especially with the help of the Scottish Development Agency, but partly through genuine political partnership. A key player in that partnership must be central Government. In the city of Liverpool 500,000 people will be looking to the Government and to all hon. Members for a positive response.

Like other opposition Members, I have great confidence in the future of Liverpool. That confidence can now best be served by forgetting the past, laying aside past bitterness and working together for a future that is based on justice and fairness.

10.10 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): The House will be grateful to the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) for seeking the debate, as well as to yourself, Mr. Speaker, for choosing it. I am also grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me time to speak in it. I am glad that I am joined in the Chamber by my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) and for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields).

The hon. Member for Mossley Hill, in an eloquent speech, referred to the statement by Bishop David Sheppard, Archbishop Derek Worlock and the Moderator of the Free Churches, John Williamson, which was issued at the weekend. In that statement, which dealt with the future of the city, the three leading Churchmen recorded that the cash penalties imposed on the 47 rebels by the Law Lords were "without parallel" in the Government system. The three Churchmen also paid tribute to the fact that among the 47 disqualified from office for at least five years were some "very fine public servants." That is so.

Liverpool faces some most serious economic and social conditions not of the city's making. There has been the decline in traditional manufacturing. There has been the change in the nature of shipping, from loose cargoes to containers. There has been our entry to the Common market. On whatever side of the argument one stands on that, it has had the effect of shifting trade from the west to the east coast. It has led to the closure of associated factories such as Tate and Lyle. If one goes up the dock road from Liverpool to Bootle, one sees that what was once a thriving industrial dockland area is now derelict, with only three factories working. The unemployment rate is among the highest in the country. Tackling the problems of Liverpool must be at the top of the agenda of any political party. Certainly it is at the top of ours, and I know that it is at the top of the Liberal party's agenda, too.

We must look to the future, not to the past. For all its problems, Liverpool is still a vibrant community. Half a million people live there. They are not to be written off. Liverpool is the fifth largest city in the United Kingdom. There are many successful firms and enterprises in the city. Nothing annoys or depresses people more than the idea that the area has only problems and has no future to offer. As it has shown over past years, Liverpool has done a great deal to help itself and will do a great deal to help itself in future, but just as Liverpool helped to create billions of pounds of wealth in the past for the rest of the country, now is the time when it needs some help from the wealth that it created in the past to restore it and deal with its problems.

I hope very much that, when the Minister replies, he will deal with the debate in the spirit in which it has been introduced. I hope that we shall not have a catalogue of what happened in the past or of recrimination. I hope that the Minister will show understanding. The rate support grant system has penalised Liverpool more than other places because of the base line that was set in 1981 and the way in which the system of grant-related expenditure assessments does not take proper account of the unemployment in Liverpool or the problem of depopulation, to which the hon. Member for Mossley Hill referred.

We do not talk up the financial problems — £800 million of debt is a very large sum. So is the size of my mortgage, if I ever think about it. But those debts do not have to be repaid immediately. Let me put the problem into perspective. The national debt is £170,000 million, and the Liverpool population's share of it is £1,500 million. Those are large sums, but it does nobody any service, least of all Liverpool, if we suggest, wrongly, that the city is near financial collapse or bankruptcy. The city faces financial problems, and it needs Government help to deal with them.

Liverpool has always played its politics hard and no doubt that will be the case in future, not least in the local elections that are shortly to take place in which voters will have to make choices between the parties. It is right that there should now be the maximum co-operation between the parties in seeking solutions to Liverpool's pressing problems. In the past decade, Liverpool has seen the politics born of desperation. For the next decade, we want to see the politics born of hope. In creating that hope, the Government have an important role to play.

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on securing this debate. It is timely in view of the change in political control of the council since this time last week.

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

The importance of the debate is reflected in the fact that there are many right hon. and hon. Members present now who would not normally be present for such a debate. I am glad that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) made an intervention. I can understand why he wants to look to the future and not to the past and why he pleaded with me not to indulge in recriminations.

I will try to set out the Government's view about the problems faced by Liverpool and say what the Government can do to help and what we have tried to do in the past but encountered total intransigence on the part of the elected members of the council. It is relevant to take into account the political context in which many of these problems have been created. We should also take into account what may or may not happen in a few weeks, because the local elections in May will be a crucial test for the future of Liverpool. It is a pity that the hon. Member for Blackburn did not address his remarks to where the Labour party stands vis-a-vis the Militant influence in Liverpool.

The Government acknowledge that considerable problems face any elected representatives in administering the city of Liverpool. The city is characterised by significant economic and social deprivation. That is why it is a partnership authority for the purpose of the urban programme and it deservedly has the second highest grant-related expenditure assessment of all metropolitan district councils—over £530 per head.

However, the council is spending considerably more on services than it needs to spend. The latest year for which figures are available show that Liverpool was spending 35 per cent. more per head than the metropolitan district average. I do not think that the people of the city believe that their services are 35 per cent. better than the average. I am told that most residents regard, for example, the refuse collection service as a joke and that it is not unusual to wait six weeks between collections, despite the fact that the council employs the same number of men and dust carts for a population of 500,000 now as were employed when the population was more than 700,000.

There are areas in which an in-coming administration is able to take reasonably quick action. For example, since 1983 council house rents in Liverpool have been frozen. If in the period since then the council had increased them in line with the Government's guidelines, the council would have had an extra £8·7 million in income in the current year. The total rent income forgone since 1983 is £22·8 million.

In December 1986 the city council employed more than 31,000 staff—63 per 1,000 of the population. That is the fourth highest figure for all metropolitan district councils. The average is 53·4 per 1,000.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): If the local authority had increased the rents by the amount that the Government wished, how much would that have cost the DHSS in benefits to the huge number of the population of Liverpool who have their rents paid by Government funding through the DHSS?

Mr. Chope: The hon. Gentleman makes my point, showing what folly it is for a council to think that it is attesting its political prowess by keeping rents down when many people pay nothing towards their rents, which are met from central taxation. By forgoing those rent increases, the city council has deprived itself of a great deal of income that it might otherwise have had.

I will outline the Government's approach to the situation now. We are ready to meet city council representatives. Indeed, we were willing to meet the Labour-controlled council. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), when he was Secretary of State for the Environment, met a deputation from Liverpool in January last year. In August, the council wrote to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), the present Secretary of State, to ask for a further meeting. In his reply of early September, my right hon. Friend not unreasonably invited the council to provide an agenda for discussion, but such was the state of administrative chaos that characterised the running of Liverpool city council that it took five months for an agenda to be prepared. The agenda reached my right hon. Friend in mid-February, by which time the city council was on the point of making a rate for 1987-88.

As hon. Members know, the city rate is to go up no less than 14 per cent. Thanks to the Government's far-sighted control of the precepts of the joint authorities for police, fire and transport, the increase at ratepayer level is 5 per cent., but that did not prevent the erstwhile leaders of the city council from presenting it as a modest 5 per cent. increase for which they were responsible. Nevertheless, the Government are prepared to meet city council representatives. Sir Trevor Jones, now leader of the council, wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 12 March seeking a meeting. My right hon. Friend replied on 16 March and a meeting has been arranged for 24 March. The city council should not expect exceptional treatment, but there may well be scope for increasing Liverpool's share of urban programme resources as a result of having a more co-operative council.

As the hon. Member for Blackburn made clear, Liverpool is not alone in having a large accumulated debt. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear in a written answer on 19 February that the Government do not stand behind local authority debt. Local councillors are elected to a responsible office and most of them do not expect the Government to be available to stand behind them or to bail them out. Liverpool's debt is also by no means exceptional. Its loan debt of £680 million compares with Manchester's £817 million and Sheffield's £575 million and is dwarfed by Birmingham's £1·3 billion. Indeed, when the Liberals left office in 1983 Liverpool's loan debt was £557 million.

I remind the House that the Government put considerable public resources into Liverpool and other inner city areas every year. Central Government assistance to Merseyside is running at well over £1 billion per year — the equivalent of 3p on income tax for the entire taxpaying population of this kingdom. Metropolitan areas as a whole stand to receive £240 million more rate support grant next year and London authorities £100 million more than in the current year. Those authorities with the greatest inner urban area problems stand to receive 24 per cent. of England's block grant next year, compared with a steady 20 per cent. per year between 1981-82 and 1985-86. Liverpool city council stands to receive some £129 million rate support grant next year—an increase of more than £6 million on its current year's entitlement.

The House should note that in 1986-87 Liverpool received in rate support grant, housing subsidy, housing benefits, specific grants and capital grants £550 per head of population compared with £320 in Newcastle, £365 in Sheffield and £223 in Leeds. Let no one say that the Government have ignored the problems of Liverpool—or are Opposition Members saying that we should take money from other areas and give it to Liverpool when there has been so much waste of resources hitherto? The figures illustrate clearly the Government's acknowledgment of the problems of inner urban areas and our commitment to sensible levels of support to help cope with their difficulties.

There is a tendency to present Liverpool as in every way an exceptional case, and it certainly has social and economic problems. The Government recognise that the city council faces a substantial financial problem, but the problem was created in large measure by the preceding Labour administration. I hope that the new administration in Liverpool will take urgent steps to relieve the situation. There is massive scope for greater efficiency and more cost-effective administration of services.

Mr. Alton: The hon. Gentleman will recall that I suggested that if the district auditor were to conduct an efficiency audit survey highlighting areas in which savings could be made we would be prepared to abide by his findings. I also suggested that we might find areas in which more resources were required. Will the Government give the same commitment that they would be prepared to abide by the findings of the district auditor if such a survey were conducted?

Mr. Chope: The district audit service is independent of Government. It is an excellent idea that the hon. Gentleman has had to invite the district audit service to look at the services in Liverpool and find out where savings can be made. He will know that when the city council is under the control of the Liberal party or, as I hope, after May under the control of the Conservative party, if it takes the view that it needs special assistance, all it has to do is to make a submission to the Government and we will consider it.

I am sure that the Liberal councillors who now form a majority on the council are ready and anxious to demonstrate their ability and responsibility to tackle the city's problems. The Government are ready to discuss the position with them. However, I am not persuaded that there will be any public benefit in pumping yet more taxpayers' money into Liverpool as a matter of principle. The city council's problems will be resolved only by sensible local government facing up to the real world.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Will the hon. Gentleman undertake to look seriously at the report from the church and business leaders about the changes in Government finance in the city of Liverpool? Will he look sympathically at the distortions that have unwittingly occurred over a long period?

Mr. Chope: The leaders concerned have already met the Secretary of State. I have read a copy of the report which, as yet, has not been published. It contains some points that we are carefully considering.

I do not think that I can leave this debate without commenting on the future, because the leaders of the Labour party have desperately tried to side-line Liverpool, no doubt because it is embarrassing to the Labour party when its mask is removed and its true nature exposed.

One understands from the press that there is every prospect that the Labour party will again field Militant candidates in the May elections. Much as Opposition Members may say that one should not get involved in that aspect of the debate this evening, I think that this issue is absolutely fundamental. If Liverpool finds itself with Militant Labour councillors again after the May elections, its problems will go from bad to worse.

What will the hon. Member for Blackburn do about that? Will he condemn the Militant influence in Liverpool and make sure that anybody who belongs to Militant and who is selected will be deselected, and that ordinary members of the Labour party will be able to stand in their stead? Or will he try to hide behind the veil and say that the problems in Liverpool are an isolated occurrence? I can tell him that the Militant influence is far and widespread across the country. Indeed, we are told that Liverpool's present problems resulted from a mere 15 Militant councillors; the rest were non-Militants. It is sad that people who were non-Militants should have been carried away like that. Press reports suggest that the Militants are boasting of fielding 30 candidates under the Labour banner at the next local elections—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) is intervening from a sedentary position, but it is important that we remind ourselves of early-day motion 738 which shows the extent to which several Labour Members take the view that the previous Labour administration in that council was absolutely marvellous. Indeed, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) has said as much—that it was the best council that Liverpool ever had.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen) indicated assent.

Mr. Chope: The hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) agrees with that comment. When will the national Labour leadership distance itself from that behaviour? Until it does, and until it ensures that the people who stand for the Labour party are not standing in Militant colours, we shall not be sure that Liverpool's problems will be resolved.

I am all in favour of constructive dialogue towards the problems of Liverpool. However, we should not lose sight of why Liverpool is in the mess that it is, and we should not allow the Labour party to hide behind the situation and to suggest that it is not like that in other places. People in Liverpool said that that could not happen there. However, they found out that it could. Citizens in other Labour-controlled cities will have to take that into account. I hope that that message will get across to the electorate in Liverpool and that they will have a much more responsible council after the elections in May.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Farm Forestry

1. Mr. Bellingham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is now in a position to announce his detailed plans on farm forestry.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): A consultation document on the farm woodland scheme was included in the "Farming and Rural Enterprise" package which we published last week. Copies are available in the Vote Office.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply and also for the work that he put into the document. However, does he agree that it is imperative that the minimum broadleaved content is maintained? Is he aware that appalling damage has been done to the environment in some parts of the country as a result of the irresponsible planting of conifers in valleys and glens and on hillsides?

Mr. Jopling: I am very interested in my hon. Friend's comments as that is exactly one of the things that will be subject to consultation. Through a combination of higher incentives, encouragement and advice we hope, where possible, to orientate the scheme towards broadleaved planting.

Mr. John: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the alternative land use in the rural economy scheme for farm woodland represents the total package of his scheme? Will he further confirm what he is quoted as saying, namely, that that package is intended for higher up the hills rather than the lowlands?

Mr. Jopling: Yes, the extension of the target for traditional forestry will basically be a matter for the Forestry Commission. We expect the new scheme for farm woodlands, which has been broadly welcomed, to operate in the non-cereal producing areas. It may well be that some areas that produce cereals will be offered for this scheme, and there is nothing to stop that happening. However, we would expect most of the land to come from non-cereal producing areas.

Mr. Chapman: Will my right hon. Friend sympathetically consider and, I hope, confirm that the Government's farm forestry policy should not only include the planting of broadleaved hardwoods as woods and copses, but should involve the replanting of many of our lost hedgerows, which are the seedbeds of much of our rural tree stock?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will recall that I was the Minister who stopped the grants to pull up hedgerows. Our latest information demonstrates that the grubbing up of hedgerows has been reduced to a low level. My hon. Friend will be aware that, in certain areas, we are giving assistance for the reintroduction of hedgerows and walls.

Hill Farmers (Incomes)

2. Mr. Wallace asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate of the prospects for hill farmers' incomes in 1987.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): The 11 per cent. increase in the hill livestock compensatory allowances last year will continue to benefit hill farmers this year to help to maintain the stability of their incomes.

Mr. Wallace: Has the Minister had an opportunity to read the speech last week by the president of the National Farmers Union of Scotland? He described the income trends for producers in hill and upland areas as "appalling and derisory". What is the Minister's response to that? When will producers in the upland areas have the change of fortune that the Government have been so swift to promise, but so slow to deliver?

Mr. Gummer: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has noticed that in 1986-87 the net farm income per farm in less-favoured area cattle and sheep farms was equal to the index for dairy farms and better than all other sectors. That hardly tallies with what he has said.

Sir Peter Mills: Does my right hon. Friend realise that hill farm incomes will continue to drop in the future unless something is done about the green pound? The tremendous importation of meat from Germany and Ireland has meant that the return to the farmers from British beef is at its lowest ebb for a long time. Something must be done about the green pound.

Mr. Gummer: I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that that matter affects the whole of the beef industry. The green pound affects the whole of agriculture, not merely the LFAs. I was addressing myself specifically to that point. My hon. Friend is, however, quite right in saying that British agriculture is in difficulty because of the effect of the green rates. We shall be discussing that in the first two days of the price fixing. The British Government have very much in mind the concern of the whole industry to see that there is fair competition with the rest of Europe. I think my hon. Friend will agree that the recent movements of sterling have helped to some extent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What about the incomes of hill farm producers of lamb, particularly those in the Lake District? Will the Minister give an undertaking that no hill farm producer of lamb whose farm has been subject to contamination as a result of the Chernobyl incident will lose money, and that he is insulated against any losses that arise from that incident?

Mr. Gummer: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will at least admit that, unlike any other country in Europe, we have done a great deal to compensate people in the hills after that incident. It is curious that there is never a single word of gratitude from the hon. Gentleman for the enormous amount that has been done by the Government to help people in this unfortunate circumstance. After three stages of help to the farmers concerned, we are now discussing the matter yet again with the NFU to see what else we can do to help. There is no question but that the Government's record is extremely good in that area.

Mr. Home Robertson: Notwithstanding all that the Minister has been saying, does he not accept that the December agreement will aggravate the serious situation that faces a number of upland beef producers in Britain? In particular, can he not recognise the harmful effect of unfair competition from imports from the Republic of Ireland? Will he take any initiative either to support the British beef sector or to curtail the discriminatory advantages that are currently enjoyed by producers in the Irish Republic?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must accept that I have said clearly that there are problems because of the difference in green rates. I am not disguising that. But I remind the hon. Gentleman, when he brings out his catalogue in that way, that the effect of those measures on the beef producer in Britain was considerably less than in any other country in the European Community, including the Republic of Ireland, where the fall in the carcase price was considerably greater than in this country.

Food Aid

3. Mr. Spencer asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest amounts of food products authorised for release under the European Economic Community food aid scheme.

Mr. Jopling: The most recent figures of authorised releases from intervention stores represent almost 50 million packs of butter and almost 8 million portions of beef. Charitable organisations are purchasing milk and butter from commercial sources, and claims for about 110,000 pints of milk and 840 tonnes of cheese have so far been received by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce.

Mr. Spencer: Will my right hon. Friend condemn the carping criticism from some quarters that the charities have not been distributing the food quickly enough? Does he not feel that that is an insult to the splendid effort of thousands of voluntary workers, who have distributed so much food to so many most needy pensioners?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. The House should congratulate the charitable organisations that have co-operated in the scheme, for which there was a tentative estimate for the European Community as a whole of £35 million at the outset of the scheme. In the outcome, we expect that the scheme will cost about £35 million — the same amount — in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chris Smith: Will the Minister explain why that particular method of distribution was chosen? Many pensioner groups, organisations and charities in my constituency have not been able to get any of the food. Many pensioners in my constituency have not had the chance of getting any of the assistance. Why has that chaos attended upon the introduction of the scheme?

Mr. Jopling: To use the word "chaos" is absolutely absurd, as the answer to the previous question clearly shows. The charities have co-operated extremely well together. If the hon. Gentleman has in mind certain charities that would be interested in joining the scheme, I hope that he will direct them to some of those charities — of which there are a good many — that have been taking the lead.

Mr. Key: Notwithstanding the welcome that has been given to the scheme, will my right hon. Friend do his very best to ensure that never again is such an intolerable burden of distribution placed on the voluntary agencies, which have received a stream and torrent of abuse from angry pensioners and their relatives? That is quite unfair.

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will recall that it was the decision of the Commission in Brussels that the distribution of the food should be made by charitable organisations. That decision was not in our hands.

Mr. Madden: What financial help are the Government giving to the charitable organisations that have faced an enormous burden in distributing butter and beef? Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that no charitable organisation's day-to-day activities will be put in jeopardy, either now or in future, as a result of expenditure that it has incurred through the distribution? Will he give a clear undertaking that in any future distribution clear and precise information will be issued through the local media so that all needy people are given a reasonable opportunity of knowing what is available, where it is available and when it will be available?

Mr. Jopling: Very many of the charitable organisations have said that they regard this work as a great opportunity because they are so closely in touch with people who could best benefit from the food. We told the charities from the outset that the costs of final distribution to recipients were for the charities and that no Community or national funding was available.

Mr. Stokes: Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is absolutely right to use the voluntary agencies to distribute the food? However, is he further aware that it is hard for hon. Members to discover exactly what is happening in their constituencies? May we have some help about that?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will, I think, be aware of the main charitable organisations that have been taking the lead in these matters. However, I shall be very glad to let him have the addresses of some of the charities in his part of the west midlands, although I suspect that he may know some of them very well already.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my right hon. Friend aware that two particular problems have emerged in my area? First, the distributing charities have great difficulty in being able to cook or provide cooked meat, so that very few pensioners are getting the meat. Secondly, as long as it is unlawful to mark the pension book, there is no way of ensuring that the same people are not going from charity to charity to get more and more of the free distribution.

Mr. Jopling: My hon. and learned Friend should recall that such difficulties were really inherent in the Commission's decision that the charitable organisations should be responsible for distribution. I think that on the whole the charities have done incredibly well in performing the service at very short notice.

Mr. Randall: What is the estimated total cost to the voluntary and charitable organisations of supporting the food aid scheme? Is it not a disgrace that organisations such as the Salvation Army and Age Concern have to use their own scarce resources when FEOGA and the Commission have so much money to play with? I understand that local authorities are also involved in this work. How many authorities are involved, and why?

Mr. Jopling: Far from having money to play with, the Community is likely to overrun its budget by 3½ billion ecu next year. We explained to the charities at the outset that the final distribution costs would be for them. They went into the scheme with great enthusiasm, but they knew exactly what the rules were when they started.

Land Use

4. Mr. Dorrell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is now in a position to announce his detailed proposals on alternative land usage.

Mr. Jopling: As already announced, the Government have published a set of documents entitled "Farming and Rural Enterprise" which include details of my proposals on alterantive land use. Copies are available from the Vote Office.

Mr. Dorrell: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the document is extremely welcome? Does he agree that it is important to realise that agriculture is not necessarily synonomous with food production and that there are many alternative crops and uses for agricultural areas which could make a major contribution to the rural economy? Does he further agree that the policies of his Department, as well as planning policies, must be sufficiently flexible to allow those opportunities to be exploited?

Mr. Jopling: We are extremely conscious of that. That is why part of the package deals with capital grants for farm diversificaton. We are also extremely interested to see whether non-food uses can be found for agricultural produce. Certainly I believe that in the next few years there will be considerable growth in the use of sugar for various industrial processes.

Mr. Skinner: Is not the truth of the matter that the Government statement about further use of land was the result of a battle within the Tory party between the city spivs and the farmers currently occupying the land, a battle which the city spivs and speculators won and the farmers lost?

Mr. Jopling: As so often, the hon. Gentleman is not really up to date. He never tires of telling us about his friends the city spivs buying up land. As the statistics show that in recent years farm land prices have fallen, anyone speculating in agricultural land may have had his fingers burnt.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. Friend accept that his imaginitive new policies have been very well received, especially by the National Farmers Union in Scotland, which realises their value in relation to upland land? Will he also proceed as much as possible along the lines of environmentally sensitive areas, which offer great hope in areas of scenic beauty? Is he aware that if EEC money can be put into those areas it will be very welcome?

Mr. Jopling: We announced in the document that we would be doubling the funds. I cannot say how many new areas we shall be designating, but we have already designated nine across the United Kingdom. I am grateful for the welcome that my hon. Friend and, indeed, hon. Members in all parts of the House have expressed for the environmentally sensitive areas.

Mr. John: Given the importance of the document, will the House have an opportunity to debate it, or have the press conferences exhausted the Minister's appetite for the subject?

Secondly, if the Secretary for State for the Environment says that planning permission on agricultural land will be as difficult as ever to obtain, why do the guidelines need to be changed?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that the business of the House is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, but I am happy to pass on what the hon. Gentleman has said. As it is Thursday, there will be a business statement later.

Beef

5. Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received regarding the prospects for beef producers in 1987.

Mr. Gummer: I have received a number of representations from farmers and industry organisations about the prospects for United Kingdom beef producers in 1987, particularly in the light of the inter-relation between the dairy and beef sectors.

Mr. Maclennan: Is the Minister aware that his Department's complacency about the industry's predicament is a cause of great dismay to farmers? Is he aware also that the gap between the total return and the target price for beef in this marketing year is about £69 million? What does he intend to do about the green pound devaluation? How much does he propose to seek above what is proposed by the Commission?

Secondly, what is the Minister's intention with regard to the suckler cow premium? Does he intend to pay the maximum amount allowable and also to seek a substantial increase in the forthcoming price review?

Mr. Gummer: How can the hon. Gentleman talk about complacency in the first part of his question when, in the second, he refers to two changes that the Government have brought about for that sector? First, we ensured that there was the opportunity of increasing the suckler cow premium and, secondly, we achieved a devaluation of the green pound in the wake of the green punt devaluation. This shows that the attitude that the hon. Gentleman claims for the Government is false.

Thirdly, the hon. Gentleman might have reminded himself that the Government ensured in the negotiations that the British beef industry emerged from them with a better deal than that of any other country in Europe. The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. But he does not know the facts or the figures and he constantly complains.

Mr. Harris: I welcome what my right hon. Friend has said and agree with much of it. Does he accept that currently beef production is probably the most vulnerable sector of agriculture? Will he go to Brussels and bring about a real further reduction in the value of the green pound to correct the situation of recent months?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right. The beef sector has a number of problems. Not least there is concern about the effect that the culled cows will have on the market during the changes in the dairy quota regime over the next two years. We shall be negotiating to get the best deal we can for Britain, and this will be a major matter for our concern. I am sure that my hon. Friend would not expect me in advance of negotiations to tell those with whom I am negotiating what my bottom line is. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Macleannan) thinks that I should, but he has never negotiated successfully in his life.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Minister agree that the beef settlement in the December agreement was a complete disaster for British beef producers and that the only way to put that right is a double-figure devaluation of the green pound, and nothing less? Will he give us that assurance, please?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman has not examined the figures. The effect on France, Germany, the Netherlands and Ireland is considerably worse than on this country. The hon. Gentleman cannot say that the settlement was disastrous, because we came out with the best deal of any country in the European Community. Of course, we shall continue to fight for the interests of British farmers and to be successful.

Mr. Lord: Is my right hon. Friend aware that my hon. Friends and I appreciate how difficult the problems are? Does he agree that the problems of beef producers are not confined to the north and the west? For example, many beef producers in East Anglia are in difficulties, and even the most efficient producers there are losing money. I urge my right hon. Friend to do his best in the negotiations to remember all our beef farmers, as I am sure he will. They are going through extremely difficult times and without a little help I fear that some of them will go under.

Mr. Gummer: I accept my hon. Friend's point and I hope that he will remind beef producers in the east of England of what the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) said recently, when he called for a moratorium on technological advance in agriculture in the Western world. That would hit our efficient beef producers extremely hard.

Mr. Maclennan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the wholly unsatisfactory nature of that reply, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Agriculture Industry

6. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what extra resources he intends to make available for socio-economic advice to the agriculture industry.

Mr. Jopling: The resources devoted to this activity are currently under consideration.

Mr. Kirkwood: I thank the Minister for that wonderful and illuminating reply, from which no one is any the wiser. May I ask him to acknowledge that there is a crucial role to be played by diversification within the agricultural sector? Will he also acknowledge that the 12 per cent. cut that we have seen recently in research and advice and the introduction of fees at £28 per hour plus VAT are substantial disincentives to diversification? Is it not time that he completed the consideration and devoted sensible resources to that important area of agriculture?

Mr. Jopling: We are extremely alert to the business of diversification. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman asks that question, because it betrays the fact that he cannot have read what was in our recent policy document and in the ALURE document with regard to diversification, which has been warmly received. I would point out to him that general advice for farm business diversification will continue to be provided free of charge. It is detailed work on substantial projects such as, or instance, the preparation of building plans, that will in future attract charges.

Mr. Latham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that if I were looking for a list of priorities for helping farmers I would not start with socio-economic advice? Will he take it from me that the best help that we can give to farmers is to do something about the green pound as quickly as possible?

Mr. Jopling: We do not start with socio-economic advice. We start with a figure something in excess of £2 billion a year with which we support the agriculture industry. In these changing times, we have also made available other resources to deal with socio-structural matters, which I believe has been widely welcomed by the farming industry.

Mr. Randall: Is the Minister aware that if there is to be a major re-orientation of farm businesses, much more money will be needed than that recently announced by the Minister? Does he agree that this small-minded approach will make the Government even more unpopular with the farming community?

Mr. Jopling: This is a familiar response. When an Opposition are faced with a Government who have done something useful, they come along and all that they can think of to say is that it is not enough.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what advice — not socio-economic — and perhaps what resources can be made available to those parts of the country where dairy farmers will be forced out of existence because of the two lots of quotas that have been introduced——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about socio-economic advice.

Mr. Winterton: I always accept your advice, Mr. Speaker. I shall rephrase my question. What socio-economic advice is being given by my right hon. Friend to those areas of the country where dairy farmers are being driven out of business because of the two lots of quotas that have been introduced to ensure that the land of Britain does not go back to the jungle and that the land, which has been used in the past for the production of food, can continue to be usefully put to the advantage of British people?

Mr. Jopling: I am sure my hon. Friend has read the document that we produced last week. He will see that we have suggested a whole range of alternative land usages. With regard to his first point about the dairy industry, I ask him to go back to the speech that I made in the House a short time ago when we had what was a contentious debate about milk charges. He will perhaps be good enough to look at the figures I used at that time, which demonstrated that since quotas were introduced dairy incomes have been increased and, in the last year for which I quoted figures, they were at the highest level they have been in the 1980s.

Food Labelling

7. Mrs. Shields asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to improve information made available to the public about the contents of prepared foods.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): The food labelling regulations already require a substantial amount of information about foods to be provided.

Mrs. Shields: Will the Minister ensure that in the labelling of prepared foods attention will be paid to the quantities of items such as preservatives, salt, fat, sugar and so on? Will that labelling include, if and when applicable, notice of irradiation?

Mr. Thompson: Irradiation is illegal in Britain and until that is resolved I cannot answer that part of the hon. Lady's question. Present regulations require a great deal of information. They require a clear and precise name, a full list of ingredients and an indication of how long the product can be kept. Added sugar and salt already appear on ingredient lists and total sugars and salt can be and are included in nutritional statements.

Mr. Gregory: Does my hon. Friend agree that the most important factor is the mother in the household, who can give good advice about balanced food? Does he further agree that we should not get into a namby-pamby state about pre-packaged foods?

Mr. Thompson: The mother in the household is entitled to a full range of information so that she can make a sensible and balanced choice. I expect to make a statement shortly about our guidelines on voluntary nutritional labelling. This follows wide-ranging consultations which have already taken place.

Horticulture Industry

8. Mr. Moynihan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the performance of the vegetable sector of the horticulture industry in 1986.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Growers of protected vegetables had a significantly better year than in 1985, but 1986 was a difficult year for outdoor vegetable growers.

Mr. Moynihan: Is my hon. Friend aware that notwithstanding the fact that 20,000 tonnes of cauliflowers have been withdrawn from the market under intervention, cauliflowers are in short supply in Lewisham? When advising my constituents about a balanced diet, will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government's priority is not leaks but cauliflowers?

Mr. Thompson: There are no leaks in the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The supply of cauliflowers depends upon the season, and this is not the cauliflower season. Therefore, there is a shortage.

Mr. Randall: Is the Minister aware that horticulture is already self-sufficient in quite a number of crops? Is he also aware that if only 1 per cent. of cereal land was used for field vegetables it would give a 30 per cent. increase in production? Clearly, this would destroy the market and would destroy jobs. Will he assure the House that no subsidies will be given to arable and dairy farmers to move into this sector?

Mr. Thompson: There are no subsidies. When we reach the stage of making payments for changing crops, it would be completely wrong to move people from one area into another which, as the hon. Gentleman says, is already in surplus.

Dairy Industry (Quotas)

9. Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what impact the temporary suspension of quota with compensation scheme will have on the income of the average United Kingdom dairy producer with (a) 40 cows and (b) 80 cows.

Mr. Gummer: The impact of the temporary suspension of milk quota on the income of the individual dairy producer is difficult to assess since much will depend on how each reacts to this suspension. The level of compensation to be paid, 6·5p per litre, compares favourably with the average profitability of dairy production of between 3p and 4p per litre.

Mr. Wardle: Is my right hon. Friend aware that small producers in the Sussex Weald, many of whom have borrowed from the banks to improve their farms, have an abiding problem over the financial uncertainty created by the quota reductions and, it has to be said, by the additional dairy inspection charges that they now face? Will he consider topping up the temporary suspension payment for smaller herds from 6·5p to 8·2p per litre as, I believe, the European regulations permit?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend might remember that when we did the original allocation of quotas we made sure that they were skewed towards the small producer. Of course, the reduction is on the larger amount, and it was consciously done in that way, even though we could not have a smaller reduction of temporary quota for smaller farms because that would be contrary to the regulations agreed by the European Community. I am conscious of the effect of this on the smaller producer, but I think my hon. Friend will agree that the generous compensation is a great help, although there are still difficulties.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Minister satisfied that this system is being applied fairly in all parts of the United Kingdom, and that it is not being distorted by national aids of one kind or another to small dairy farmers in, for instance, Germany? If the Minister receives any evidence that such practices are going on, will he take any steps to protect small dairy producers in Britain?

Mr. Gummer: One of our major aims is to make sure that this is fair throughout the Community. I remind the hon. Gentleman that Germany has to bring back 4 per cent. more than anybody else because of the over-issuing of quota which Germany did at the time. Its producers will have a particularly difficult two years.

Food Aid

11. Dr. Twinn asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the scheme to give free European Community food to the needy.

Mr. Gummer: We have received a number of letters from charitable organisations, hon. Members, Members of the European Parliament and members of the public. There have been many expressions of thanks for the efforts of the charities in arranging the distribution.

Dr. Twinn: Does my right hon. Friend share my surprise that the hard work undertaken by the charities and by many thousands of voluntary workers should have been the subject of some carping criticism in the press and elsewhere, rather than receiving the admiration due to them for the way in which they rose to the challenge of distributing so much food so well?

Mr. Gummer: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is why I wrote to thank the heads of all the main charities involved, and I received some very encouraging replies as a result. They have done an enormous amount of work, and I believe that we should support them for so doing. To have distributed such a vast amount of butter and beef is very remarkable.

Mr. Spearing: Will the Minister say whether the Government asked the Commission to make it possible for local authorities to be involved in the distribution? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House and the country why he laid down no guidelines for the voluntary agencies in each area so that there could be consistency and therefore public confidence?

Mr. Gummer: Guidelines were laid down clearly with the representatives of the charities. I laid them down on the afternoon on which we launched the scheme. Those guidelines were loose enough for the local circumstances to be taken into account. Surely the hon. Gentleman would agree that in dealing with such matters generosity, concern and individual compassion are more important than consistency. That is why we supported the concept of the job being done by charities. We felt that they were much better fitted for it than anyone else.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My right hon. Friend will know, because my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and I wrote to him about it, that in the borough of Havering no charities have distributed any food because they have found it impossible to discover how to obtain it. I hope that my right hon. Friend will reply shortly to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch and will investigate additional ways in which charities can be encouraged to take the quota that they should be able to obtain.

Mr. Gummer: Our initial inquiries suggest that part of the story has not been told. That has not been the experience in the country as a whole. We hope that if there has been a special problem in Hornchurch it can be overcome.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Minister aware that in areas where charities are undertaking the task they have not only had to pay out a great deal of money, but have found it difficult to explain to people why supplies are different from one area to another and why they have incurred such great expense in packing and storing food? It has been an impossible scheme, and I hope that the Minister is ashamed of it.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Lady would also find it difficult to explain why the packing was expensive, because no expense was incurred. The entire cost of packing the butter was met by FEOGA funds. The hon. Lady clearly does not know the facts, but has come here yet again to carp about what the charities are doing.

Horse Market (Southall)

12. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to visit the Southall horse market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have no plans at present to visit the market. My veterinary staff attend it, and are able to monitor and encourage compliance with the voluntary code of practice on horse markets.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend change his mind and make an unannounced visit to the Southall horse market, where he will see that standards are often far from satisfactory? Will he also consider extending the 1964 regulations on animal markets to horses and ponies, so that they can be given the same protection at sales and markets as other animals? Why should horses and ponies be second-class citizens in the animal world?

Mr. Thompson: I know how hard my hon. Friend works on behalf of both constituents and horses. Of course, I shall not announce now that I shall be making an unannounced visit to his constituency. However, we are considering the need for legislation to put horse markets in line with the Farm Animal Welfare Council report recommendations.

EC (Two-tier Pricing)

13. Sir Michael Shaw asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further representations he has received on the implications of adopting a policy in the EEC of two-tier pricing.

Mr. Gummer: We continue to receive such representations, which generally concern the very adverse impact such a system would have on British farmers and the special advantage that it would give to other countries in the Community.

Sir Michael Shaw: Is my right hon. Friend aware that any such system must militate against the interests of the efficient farmers in north Yorkshire?

Mr. Gummer: That is right. I hope that my hon. Friend will mention the new alliance scheme along this line, announced by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) last week, which suggests that Britain and France should bear the entire burden of the cut in the cost of the regime. We would have to pay for a large quantity of the cost, helped a little by Greece and Denmark, while everybody else would get off scot-free.

Oils and Fats

14. Mr. Gregory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the effect of the EC Commission's proposals on oils and fats on the United Kingdom confectionery trade.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Biscuit, Cake, Chocolate and Confectionery Alliance has estimated that the proposed oils and fats tax could increase its members' costs by up to some £50 million annually. The Government are firmly opposed to this proposal.

Mr. Gregory: I welcome my hon. Friend's comments. Will he assure the House that he will continue strenuously to attack any proposal by the EEC Commission in respect of oils and fats which will have a detrimental effect on the UK confectionery industry, whose exports are the second most important in the food and drink sector, particularly in York? The proposals would mean that Craven's would have to spend £40,000, Terry's £1 million and Rowntree Mackintosh over £2 million.

Mr. Thompson: My hon. Friend can tell his constituency and the industry in general that we are firmly opposed to the oils and fats tax.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

Mr. Lloyd: In this week of tax handouts, will the Prime Minister turn her attention to the position of the Science and Engineering Research Council, which has cancelled new scientific research in British universities? Given the Government's responsibility for the shortfall in funding, will she look at the comments of Professor Strange of Kent university, who said:

"The decision seems an extraordinary thing to coincide with a tax giveaway Budget."

He warned that Britain will "lose scientists". Will the Prime Minister do something about this or, once again, will the nation's future be sacrificed for an electoral present?

The Prime Minister: Government spending on research and development is substantial and bears comparison with that of all advanced countries, as I have said before. United Kingdom Government-funded civilian research and development as a proportion of national output exceeds the level in Japan and the United States. Of course, there are many more people who would like more research on a particular project in which they are interested. How that money is allocated is decided not by Government but by the board which advised my right hon. Friend, the board of the research councils. Our overall record is a very good one.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does the Budget not reduce the tax burden of the average family by £3 a week? Is it not clear that the Labour party is pledged to claw back that £3? In reality, is it not a fact that to pay for their huge spending plans a Labour Government would have to raise taxes far higher?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. It is an extremely good Budget, extremely well balanced and highly responsible. It rightly gave a reduction in the standard rate of income tax, which will be of great use to the nearly 18 million people whose earnings are below average male earnings. The Labour party cannot trust people to spend their earnings in their own way.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister aware that the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), has been reported as saying that despite the record levels of crime there will be no increase in police manpower until there is concrete evidence of an improvement in police performance? As recruitment by results would be a foolish way to determine efficient manning levels in the police force, will the Prime Minister repudiate that view and direct the Home Office instead to establish what extra police and administrative manning levels are required to combat the 50 per cent. rise in crime under her premiership?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman has a short memory. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has announced increases in establishment for police forces, not only in London, but in other places all over the country. Those forces have not necessarily reached establishment figures yet, because they have to select people who are sufficiently advanced and sufficiently good to be properly trained to be policemen. So the basis of the right hon. Gentleman's question is incorrect.

Mr. Kinnock: Can the Prime Minister now tell us, since she refused to do so before, whether she agrees with Sir Kenneth Newman that one of the major causes of the serious rise in crime in recent years has been unemployment?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman must have run out of questions to ask. The identical question was asked on Tuesday when he was here. Let me give him the answer that I gave then.

"It is a sad fact that the peak age of offenders is 15 years. That is below the school-leaving age".

So that can have little to do with unemployment. I also said:

"Academic research has suggested that there is no significant association between increases in recorded crime and increases in unemployment."

My third point was:

"Unemployment involved a much bigger proportion of the working population in the 1930s" — [Official Report, 17 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 812.]

than it does now.

If the right hon. Gentleman's assumption had been correct there would have been a much higher rate of crime in the 1930s, but, in fact, the rate was lower.

Mr. Kinnock: If the Prime Minister thinks that unemployment affects only the unemployed, she understands even less about unemployment than I thought. Is she aware that there is colliding evidence from academic researchers? There is also the view of practising police officers and common sense. Will she now tell us whether she agrees with Sir Kenneth Newman and other working policemen?

The Prime Minister: I have made my view clear. I will add one further factor. If the right hon. Gentleman were correct, countries which have very low rates of unemployment should have much lower rates of crime, but that is not the case.

Mr. Lord: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the principal problem facing many of our inner cities is quite simply that they are controlled by extremist Socialist councils? Is it not the case that no amount of help from central Government will solve their problems as long as they are in the grip of people who have neither the will nor the ability to honour their obligations to the people they represent?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. A large number of Labour local authorities go out of their way to undermine the police and finance criticism of the police at public expense. I would also point out that under this Government there are now 15,700 more people working with the police — 10,000 more police officers and 5,700 more civilians—than in 1979.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Prime Minister aware that in the space of the 15 minutes during which she is answering questions today a total of 110 crimes will be committed in this country, and that it is simply no good her standing up week after week and saying, "Don't blame me, I'm only the Prime Minister"? The people of Britain are dissatisfied with her and she knows it.

The Prime Minister: What a pity that Opposition Members did not vote to refer lenient sentences to the Court of Appeal. What a pity that they did not vote to increase maximum sentences. They have abolutely no standing at all when it comes to criticising the record of this Government.

Q2. Mr. Gregory asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gregory: Will my right hon. Friend accept the grateful thanks of the nation and of the constituents of York, in particular, for the success of her Budget? Furthermore, will she comment on the latest expenditure plans as envisaged by the Labour party, the cost of which will amount to some £34,000 million and which would result in a penal basic rate of tax of 56p in the pound or value added tax of 49 per cent.?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. The programme of the Labour party would land us with high borrowing, high taxation and bankruptcy in very short order. Our policies have, in fact, directed extra spending to particular targets such as education and the social services. They have cut down borrowing to what my right hon. Friend regards as a reasonable amount, 1 per cent. of GDP. They are policies which have also kept inflation down, which are producing more jobs and which are causing a substantial fall in unemployment. They are excellent policies for this country.

Q4. Dame Jill Knight asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Dame Jill Knight: Will my right hon. Friend consider initiating proposals at the United Nations for the revision of the Vienna convention as it affects diplomatic status, so that those who claim diplomatic immunity may face prosecution when they break the laws of our land? Is she aware that there is strong resentment about the fact that these people avoid charges that others must rightly face?

The Prime Minister: I know the concerns that lie behind my hon. Friend's question, but I am advised that if we were to do so such a proposal would not win support from other Governments. The Government and the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs both concluded in 1985 that abuse of diplomatic immunity should be dealt with by stricter application of the existing provisions of the Vienna convention and not by amending it. We also have to remember that sometimes our diplomats serve in countries which have a very different legal system from ours. That must be taken into account.

Dr. Owen: As two former Home Secretaries believe that the fresh allegations about the deliberate campaign to destabilise the elected Government need investigation, as one of those former Home Secretaries has already made it clear that the investigation which took place in 1977 focused on electronic surveillance of No. 10, and in view of the Cabinet Secretary's possible role at the time, would it not be appropriate now for the Prime Minister to consult the former Prime Minister and consider jointly whether there should be an inquiry?

The Prime Minister: As I have indicated, the then Prime Minister's statement in 1977 shows that he had made detailed inquiries into the allegations, in the plural, then current and had reached clear conclusions. The noble Lord, Lord Wilson of Rievaulx associated himself at the time with that statement.

Q6. Mr. McCrindle asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McCrindle: Will my right hon. Friend reaffirm that, much as we would all like to see cruise missiles reduced or even eliminated from the United Kingdom, there remains a special British interest to ensure that that does not happen in such a way as to affect adversely our security? Will she further note that the so-called concessions on cruise extended this week by the Labour party are merely a smokescreen? Does my right hon. Friend remain of the belief, as I do, that the Labour party remains wholly committed to unilateral nuclear disarmament?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that, as the NATO communiqué pointed out, when we are negotiating on intermediate nuclear weapons there must also be taken into account the large number of shorter-range weapons which the Soviet Union has, and the proponderance of them. That has been the subject of communiqués produced by NATO. I also agree with my hon. Friend that it would seem that the Leader of the Opposition simply could not bear going to the United States to defend his indefensible defence policy. Therefore, he has said that for the time being he would leave in cruise missiles. I understand that assumes that there will be a successful negotiation satisfactory to this country. But if there were not he would still take out cruise missiles and have a unilateral defence policy.

Q7. Mr. Soley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Soley: If the Prime Minister is genuinely concerned to increase respect for law and order, will she take this opportunity to comment on the activities of her hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) and his many supporters in the Conservative party — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Soley: Is it not a fact——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The whole House knows that the hon. Member must not seek to reflect upon the conduct of any other Member of the House, except by way of motion.

Mr. Soley: Is it not a fact that it is the Government's double standards on law and order that make this Conservative Government unique, in not only presiding over the most dramatic rise in crime, but in presiding over a fall in the number of crimes cleared up, something that has been repeated only by a previous Conservative Government, between 1971 and 1974? Is that not the reason why the Government are in such a mess on law and order?

The Prime Minister: The position on crime would have been infinitely worse had it not been for the positive policies of this Government to increase the numbers of police and the armed forces, to increase their pay and equipment and the number of civilian assistants, to have an active crime prevention policy, with a large number of neighbourhood watch schemes, and to support the police and the courts in their efforts to reduce the amount of crime.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 23 MARCH—Conclusion of the debate on the Budget Statement.

TUESDAY 24 MARCH—Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 25 MARCH—Motions on the Rate Support Grant Report (England) 1987-88 (HC No. 253), the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 1) 1986-87 (HC No. 258), the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1985-86 (HC No. 259).

Afterwards motions on the Welsh Rate Support Grant Report 1987-88 (HC No. 221) and the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report 1986-87 (HC No. 222).

THURSDAY 26 MARCH — Remaining stages of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Bill followed by remaining stages of the Broadcasting Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 27 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 30 MARCH—Second Reading of the Pilotage Bill [Lords] followed by Second Reading of the Landlord and Tenant (No. 2) Bill.

The House will wish to know that, subject to the progress of business, it will be proposed that the House should rise for the Easter Adjournment on Friday 10 April until Wednesday 22 April.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Does he recall that last week I asked for an urgent debate on the funding of scientific research and the accelerating brain drain? Has he now read this morning's report that inadequate funding by the Government has forced the Science and Engineering Research Council to cancel support for new scientific research in Britain's industries? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the Government's policy shows a definite lack of prudence? Will he provide time for a full debate on this issue as a matter of urgency, so that hon. Members on both sides of the House can put the case for a speedy change of Government policy before Britain loses even more of its research scientists and engineers?

The loss of a further 1,400 jobs at British Rail Engineering Ltd. works in Derby, Crewe and York is a further example of the Government's complete disregard for the future of a vital research, manufacturing and engineering base. Can the Leader of the House ensure that we have a debate on that topic, which is vital to the areas hit by those job losses and to rail users who have to use obsolete rolling stock?

Has the Leader of the House seen reports that the Government are reluctant to buy new Lynx helicopters from Westland and thereby to assist in bridging the company's orders gap between now and the purchase of the EH101 troop carrier in the early 1990s? Will he ensure that an early statement of the Government's intentions is made by the Secretary of State for Defence to clarify the position and, I hope, to relieve the great anxieties of 2,000 Westland workers who are otherwise threatened with lay-off?

May I repeat my previous request to the Leader of the House to provide Government time for a debate on the proposed closure of Caterpillar Tractors Ltd at Uddingston in Scotland? Does he appreciate that the Government's inactivity is causing widespread anxiety, especially since the company has benefited from the support of public funds and public orders and since the Secretary of State for Scotland has issued declarations of his anxiety? Could the Leader of the House at least give his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland an opportunity to put his view in this House?

Finally, judging from last night's events relating to the proposed sale of British Petroleum, there must be every chance that between now and the end of the Budget debate further measures will be slipped in to fatten the election bankroll. Will the Leader of the House assure us that the Finance Bill will be published early, so that we shall know exactly what we shall be asked to vote on?

Mr. Biffen: On the right hon. Gentleman's first point, about funding research, he will have heard the powerful riposte given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on the topic. Notwithstanding that, he still seeks a debate. I understand this anxiety on all these matters and perhaps this could be looked at through the usual channels. The entire House is joined in regret at the redundancies that are proceeding in BREL. The right hon. Gentleman pointed to the implications of that for the whole railway manufacturing industry. Doubtless he would also wish any such consideration to take place in the wider context of the present levels and trend in unemployment. Obviously, we can look at this through the usual channels.

Mr. Kinnock: Good news, but it does not put everything right, does it?

Mr. Biffen: I hear the right hon. Gentleman talking about good news and I know that it is difficult for him to find good news.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the possibility of a statement on purchasing policy in respect of Westland helicopters. Obviously, I shall discuss with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence the point which he has made.

I note the repeated request for a debate on Caterpillar Tractors Ltd and I cannot add much to what I have said previously when we have exchanged comments on this matter, but I take account of what the right hon. Gentleman says.

Finally, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the proposed sale of BP shares. He will be aware that that was foreshadowed in our debate on 14 March 1984, so it is hardly a recent addition to Government policy. I note his discomfiture and anxieties and I shall certainly see that we do all in our power to have an early publication of the Finance Bill.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Is the debate on agriculture and land use that my right hon. Friend said he would consider coming soon?

Mr. Biffen: Yes, Sir.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Following that question, will the Leader of the House confirm that it is almost unprecedented for the annual price negotiations to occur in Brussels, as they will shortly, without a debate having been initiated first by the Government in this House? Will he say why the House has been denied the opportunity to discuss this important question and whether it will be left entirely to the alliance parties to provide time to debate important agricultural and countryside issues?

Mr. Biffen: I am glad that farming flourishes in the heartland of Liverpool. I will look at the very significant point that has been raised by the hon. Gentleman and see what arrangement might possibly be made.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): My right hon. Friend will have seen early-day motion 706 entitled Cruelty to Animals.

[That this House expresses its horror at the increasing cruelty shown to animals, exemplified by the record number of complaints, 83,300 recorded by the Royal Society of Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in 1986; records its dissatisfaction with the inadequacy of existing legislation to deal with such cruelty; and calls upon the Government to toughen the provisions of the Protection of Animals Act 1911 as a matter of urgency, particularly by: (a) giving the police power of entry where a case of cruelty is suspected, (b) giving the courts the power to ban people convicted of cruelty from keeping any type of animal rather than simply dogs at present and (c) closing a loophole by changing the definition of captive to include wild animals that are unable to escape.]

The motion has been signed by nearly 70 Members of Parliament. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that there will be a debate on the subject of cruelty to animals and in particular a toughening up of the Protection of Animals Act in the near future?

Mr. Biffen: The point raised by my hon. Friend is important and atrracts widespread interest in this House. I suggest that he might consider the opportunities that will be provided in the proceedings on Tuesday when we will be dealing with the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will the Leader of the House find the time to have an urgent debate on the situation in BREL apd get one of his Ministers to explain how it is sensible economics to put 1,000 men on the dole at the same time as forcing BREL to put out its new build to tender, when many of the orders will be spread around every other country in the world?

Mr. Biffen: I do not accept the premise of the question and I have to refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave to her right hon. Friend the Leader of the Oppostion.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): Will my right hon. Friend try to find time urgently for another debate on the future of the Government's training and job schemes through the Department of Employment? I say that because the Opposition spokesman said yesterday that job-clubs and similar schemes were deplorable and that a Labour Government would not contemplate them. There ought to be an opportunity for the hon. Gentleman to explain what the Labour Government will do to these valuable schemes. I hope my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will help.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is quite right in inferring that unemployment and the measures that are designed to alleviate it are now causing some nervousness on the Opposition Benches. There is little prospect of Government time being available for the debate that my hon. Friend seeks, but he might consider the Consolidated Fund Bill on Tuesday.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Leader of the House not agree that, with the prison population now touching 50,000, the debate which I have asked him for again and again is now even more urgently due, before the prisons explode and thus solve the whole problem for us?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot deny the compelling logic of what the hon. Gentleman says, particularly as it is constructed on a few remarks of my own, but I suggest that he uses the Tuesday proceedings of the Consolidated Fund Bill to make that argument in the most compelling way so as to require subsequent debate.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will my right hon. Friend translate the word "soon" which he used a moment ago regarding the essential debate on agriculture and the environment? Could that debate please, without fail, be the week beginning 30 March?

Mr. Biffen: "Soon", like "beauty", is imprecise in its concept and application and that is why it is such a wonderful word.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion No. 738 regarding the disqualification of Liverpool Labour councillors?

[That this House deplores the introduction by the Government of legislation permitting use of undemocratic procedures which have resulted in the disqualification of the elected Liverpool Labour councillors, whose policies responded to the needs of the people who on three occasions supported those policies through the ballot box; and considers that the bringing of this action by the unelected Audit Commission undermines local government democracy in that it will change the political composition of an elected council without accountability and disregarding the democratic rights of the electorate.]

Has the Leader of the House also seen early-day motion No. 770 about the Secretary of State for the Environment?

[That this House endorses the joint statement of Liverpool church leaders Bishop David Sheppard, Archbishop Derek Worlock and Free Church Moderator John Williamson that the cash penalties imposed by the Law Lords on 47 elected Liverpool city councillors are 'without parallel' and should be reviewed immediately; contrasts the injustice meted out to these elected public representatives with the ease with which the Right honourable Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury has been able to avoid any personal consequences of his own contravention of the law on a number of occasions; believes it is a negation of democracy to allow any but the electors to dismiss from office those whom they have previously elected to represent them; and calls for an immediate repeal of the legislation which has given rise to this inequitable and iniquitous state of affairs.]

Will the Leader of the House find time to have a debate in this House on those matters, and in the course of that debate will he give hon. Members the opportunity of saying to the Liberals in Liverpool that to cut £100,000 from the unemployed resource centre is an absolute disgrace that can only harm unemployed people in Liverpool? There is 26 per cent. male unemployment in Liverpool and more than 21 per cent. for the whole of Merseyside.

Mr. Biffen: I cannot offer the prospect of Government time for the debate that the hon. Gentleman seeks, but he knows all the opportunities on Tuesday as well as any hon.

[Mr. Biffen]

Member. I hope he is lucky and deploys those arguments, because they will demonstrate the bankruptcy of the Labour party in its present policies and past record in Liverpool and thus help us understand why that party is in decline more generally.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of us on the Conservative Benches agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) about the urgent need for a full-ranging debate on training and employment measures because, as my hon. Friend said, the burden of the argument used by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) yesterday was that the most deplorable of all schemes and inventions were the jobclubs. Is that not a disgraceful view of measures which are designed to help the long-term unemployed?

Mr. Biffen: It is a disgraceful view, but, even more important, coming from such a formidable source it implied a nervousness about the position. None the less, I cannot go any further than the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that a week ago a number of hon. Members requested a special debate on foreign affairs so that the sale of arms to the Contras in Nicaragua could be discussed in the House and an investigation could be called for into the firm KMS that appears to be supplying mercenaries to fight the democratically elected Government of Nicaragua? Can the Leader of the House now say when there is likely to be time for a debate on foreign affairs so that those matters can be discussed?

Mr. Biffen: I am afraid that I cannot say when such a debate is likely to take place, but I stand by what I said last week and recognise the importance of the topic.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the wave of teachers' strikes this week and the fact that many more are planned. He is aware that we are approaching the season of examinations. Will he ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of state for Education and Science to come to the House fairly soon and say what advice the Government will be giving the examination boards if the strikes run right through the summer term? The candidates' performance in the summer examinations affects their opportunities for further education or a job.

Mr. Biffen: I will most certainly convey that request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): In so far as a link has been established between Sir Robert Armstrong and the security services in 1975, when he was in the Home Office, will the Leader of the House ask him what he knows about the Cunard affair that is alleged to have taken place in 1975? When the Leader of the House has found out the answer, will he arrange for a statement to be made to Parliament?

Mr. Biffen: It is not my task to cross-examine Sir Robert Armstrong. It would be just as well if we stuck to our lasts and did not have these absurd ambitions.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will my right hon. Friend give time for a debate on the constitutional implications of a hung Parliament, especially in the light of the comments made yesterday by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), when he said:

"the Labour party will automatically reverse the tax cuts as well as vote against them. We"—

that is, his party—

"do not say that, for very good reasons".—[Official Report, 18 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 967.]

In other words, there appears to be a basic difficulty within the SDP in arriving at any sort of governmental arrangements as a result of a hung Parliament. Does my right hon. Friend think that the leaders of the alliance parties are keeping abreast of developments?

Mr. Biffen: It is an interesting pre-election position, and my hon. Friend is to be congratulated on the careful way in which he is monitoring it. All those nuances of difference suggest that, should we ever miserably be in a no-majority Parliament, the odds and ends of the Opposition parties, once they got together, would present a most almighty shambles.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The Leader of the House referred earlier to the helicopter review and he will be aware of the profound implications of that review on Westland. May I remind him that that review was promised at the end of last year; it was then promised in the early part of this year, again at the end of January, again in early March, or at the latest by mid-March? Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that the Government's continuing delay and indecision in this matter are encouraging damaging speculation? They are preventing Westland from organising its future and are thus threatening jobs. Will the Leader of the House now tell us when the result of the review will be announced? If not, will he speak to his right hon. Friends, and tell them that, having damaged Westland last year by their bungling, they are now threatening jobs and threatening to inflict the same damage again by this criminal procrastination?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has made a number of allegations and he is well aware that they cannot be contested in the context of next week's business. I come from Somerset and had connections with Yeovil long before, as a Johnny-come-lately, he turned up, and I am well aware of the importance of this topic both to Westland and Yeovil. I assure the hon. Gentleman that his request will be as courteously considered as the Leader of the Opposition's request for a statement on this subject.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): May I endorse the point made by the Leader of the Opposition about the early publication of the Finance Bill? Will my right hon. Friend ask the Treasury to announce as early as possible the date of the Bill's publication? That is helpful to all those outside the House who have to look at the details of the Bill in a short space of time.

Mr. Biffen: Several factors govern the publication of the Finance Bill. I am sure that the whole House will want it to be published in as good a condition as possible. None the less, I take account of the various representations that have been made about the advantage of speed in that matter.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 690, which has attracted the support of 47 hon. Members?

[That this House views with concern the proposal of the Minister of Sport to merge the function and rôle of Playboard with that of the Sports Council; and, in view of the negative responses to this proposal from many interested organisations, urges him to postpone a final decision on this matter in order to allow a full debate to take place on the alternatives.]

Once again, may I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to early-day motion 365, which has now attracted the support of 97 hon. Members?

[That this House reiterates its support for the advancement of children's play, as expressed in Early Day Motion 363 which was tabled on 23rd March 1982; welcomes the establishment in 1983 and continued funding of Play Board as the national organisation dedicated to the development of children's play; applauds the achievements of Play Board during the past three years in co-ordinating effort, conducting research producing good-quality publications and especially in providing a much valued advisory and information service to local authorities and their Communities; and urges Her Majesty's Government during its review of support for children's play, to ensure that Play Board is appropriately positioned and adequately resourced to continue to provide these important functions in the interests of all children.]

Both early-day motions are about Play Board. Is the Leader of the House aware that Play Board has now agreed to go into voluntary liquidation rather than be compulsorily amalgamated with the Sports Council? Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Minister, who has not once visited the office of Play Board during his period of office, to come to the Dispatch Box and explain what the future is to be of children's play?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of what the hon. Gentleman says. I shall certainly convey to my hon. Friend the Minister his anxieties about the matter. We shall see how we go.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): May we have a debate on the unfortunate skilled children who have been neglected and deserted by both striking teachers and the Opposition? Does my right hon. Friend agree that there are some professional teachers—the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association and the Professional Association of Teachers—who have set a fine example, and that the other teachers are thoroughly greedy and irresponsible?

Does my right hon. Friend further agree that, if the Labour party really cared, it would have been the first to encourage the teachers to go back to work because they have a good job, instead of encouraging some schoolkids to be on the march outside the House of Commons today, saying, "Help our Teachers."? Surely greed and the height of irresponsibility are being shown by teachers and the Opposition.

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that I can help, particularly as I do not think that my hon. Friend requested me to do anything about it.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give us an explanation of the peculiarities of national housekeeping, which extols using North sea oil revenues to build up foreign assets, on which, presumably, we shall get dividends and interest payments, whereas simultaneously the assets that we have built up in British Petroleum over 70 years are being flogged off? Despite the trailer on the issue from 1984, can we have an assurance from the Secretary of State for Scotland that no measures will be taken to privatise the electricity industry in Scotland, as is currently being trailered in the press?

Mr. Biffen: Clearly, the points raised by the hon. Gentleman are of great significance, but we shall have a further debate on the Budget this afternoon. The debate on the Budget will be completed on Monday, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will speak. I shall draw his attention to the remarks that have been made. No doubt he will take account of them.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): May I help my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) by asking my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to find time for a debate on the teachers' dispute, so that many hon. Members can voice the views of parents, who see no justification whatsoever for the industrial action after a very generous pay offer, and who, after listening to Mr. Fred Jarvis's obdurate remarks on the "Today" programme this morning, will be immensely thankful that that awful man does not teach their children?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says, and I agree very much with him. It would be tragic if the whole situation were politicised. As to the prospect of a debate, there is no early availability of Government time, but on Tuesday we shall have the Consolidated Fund Bill. If that topic were chosen, it would strike a chord outside.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): In view of the fact that it is now public knowledge that telephone equipment has been installed in Whitehall which provides the capability of intercepting Members' phone calls, and since this is a matter that touches upon privilege, should not the House of Commons or the Services Committee certainly have the chance to discuss the debate whether the intention as well as the capability is there?

Mr. Biffen: If the hon. Gentleman believes that there is a question of privilege in that matter, he knows perfectly well what procedures are to be followed. If, on the other hand, he believes that that is a matter for the Services Committee, I dare say that he will find some way of raising the matter there.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My right hon. Friend has described the word "soon" as wonderfully imprecise. As my right hon. Friend is a wonderfully adept Leader of the House——

Mr. Biffen indicated assent.

Mr. Winterton: —will he perhaps outline a little more precisely what he thinks "soon" means in this context? The future of agriculture and land use is of immense importance to many people in the House and perhaps more important to the farming industry which has contributed to so much of the economy and progress of this country in recent years?

Mr. Biffen: In the interpretation of "soon", my hon. Friend's views will be taken fully into account.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Can the Leader of the House arrange for a statement next week by the

[Mr. David Winnick]

Prime Minister explaining why in 1979 she made a lengthy statement — and rightly so — about Blunt, which obviously dealt with matters that occurred before she came to office, yet she now refuses to answer questions about the way in which apparently MI5 officers were involved in destabilising the Labour Government? Clearly there is a strong impression of a cover-up here. Therefore, is there not a need for a statement as quickly as possible?

Secondly, on a completely separate matter arising from what took place yesterday in another place, will the Government give further consideration to a statue to Lord Dowding, the late Air Chief Marshal, who, far from trying in any way to destabilise our democracy, played a very distinguished role in 1939 and 1940 in ensuring that this country was safe from Nazi tyranny?

Mr. Biffen: On the first point, I have nothing to add to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said this afternoon. With regard to the second point, I must confess, not being one to follow the fortunes of the aristocracy quite as closely as the hon. Gentleman, that I am not altogether clear what the hon. Gentleman was getting at, but it sounded very honourable and full of esteem.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Has my right hon. Friend noted the decision of Bristol city council to refuse normal courtesies to a French warship visiting the port of Avonmouth in my constituency, purely on the grounds that the city council disagrees with French national policy in the Pacific? Would my right hon. Friend ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to make a statement to the House as to how he intends to re-establish British control over the foreign policy of the Socialist republic of Bristol?

Mr. Biffen: Of course I will make references to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary so that he can decide what can be done in the direction that my hon. Friend is seeking. I would have thought that, in an across-the-House spirit of consensus, we might suggest that we should dispatch the right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) to infect the Labour-controlled Bristol council with a bit of common sense.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that one of the most disturbing aspects in the recent increase in crime has been the growth of crimes against people in their own homes involving theft and violence very often committed by people who have obtained entry to those homes by deceit? Can we have a debate on that matter and in particular about any practical suggestions to deal with that problem — including the suggestion that people who have the right and duty to enter homes in the course of their duties—gas, electricity and other people—should carry standard indentity cards with photographs? Further, can we consider the Government's refusal to provide adequate police for the city of Leicester and the lack of hope of extra police emerging from the recent Budget?

Mr. Biffen: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for reminding us of the extremely complex social factors behind the current thoroughly unacceptable levels of crime. I cannot offer the prospect of an early debate in Government time, but I will certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to what has been said.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early statement or debate on extradition procedures so that the position of Mr. John Fleming can be investigated and we may discover how he is able constantly to avoid British justice when he is said to have been responsible for robberies involving about £26 million?

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that I can say anything helpful about that case, given all the legal factors involved, but I will refer my hon. Friend's remarks to the appropriate member of the Treasury Bench for consideration.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Will the Leader of the House join me in deploring the rampant press speculation about the date of the general election and find time for a debate on my Bill to provide for fixed-term Parliaments? Does he agree that in a democracy it is inappropriate for one person to have power to decide such an important matter?

Mr. Winnick: It depends who the person is.

Mr. Banks: No, I shall say the same to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition when he is Prime Minister. While we are at it, will the Leader of the House say what date he favours for the General Election?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman, who is a very perceptive observer of the scene, has seen that the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] — are stuffed full of academics with great affection for constitutional innovation, and he has lighted upon one of the very items that will be among the bargaining points between himself, with like-minded Labour Members, and Members from the alliance parties.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Is the Leader of the House aware that there is widespread anger that this week's Budget has done nothing to stop British pensioners from being the pauper pensioners of western Europe? If the Government will not provide a substantial increase in pensions, will they at least provide some extra money to ensure that pensioners who can afford to go out are properly protected and that those too terrified to do so have proper protection against the murders and muggings now taking place in all parts of the country?

Mr. Biffen: Bearing in mind the increase in public spending authorised in the autumn and the reductions in Government borrowing and in taxation, I believe that the public judge the Budget to be thoroughly responsible and balanced.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Skinner.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Did you call me, Mr. Speaker? We were just discussing other matters down here.

Mr. Speaker: In that case, I will call the hon. Gentleman later.

Mr. Skinner: No, it is all right, Mr. Speaker. You are on good ground—it is a good seam of coal.

Will the Leader of the House arrange for an inquiry into the letting of cleaning contracts in the Palace of Westminster? Is he aware that, since the cleaning services went out to contract in 1982, Members of Parliament have been unable to find out how much the contracts are worth? Worse than that, is he aware that there is a peculiar stink in the nostrils regarding BET, which has three subsidiaries which were involved in tendering for the latest contract in 1985, giving £25,000 to Tory party funds? It is coming to something when the Government are lining their pockets out of cleaning contracts in the Palace of Westminster itself while Members of Parliament cannot even discover how much the contracts are worth. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is the masonic lodge again."] There is certainly a smell of corruption about it.

Mr. Biffen: It is my recollection that the hon. Gentleman sought to ask me questions about this previously and that it was found to be a matter for the Department of the Environment. I will therefore pass on the hon. Gentleman's comments so that they may be appropriately evaluated.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Does the Leader of the House agree that there is an urgent need for a debate on the appalling conditions in Scottish psychiatric hospitals, especially following yesterday's report by the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs? Is he aware that, last weekend, 400 psychiatric, geriatric and psychogeriatric patients at Woodilee in my constituency were decanted to hospitals many miles away, leaving great problems for the health service in Lanarkshire, and that some found themselves in a ward in Mearnskirk where the ceiling was falling in and asbestos was identified? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that those problems are urgent and require debate at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Biffen: No one would deny the importance of the topic identified by the hon. Gentleman, but I suggest that Tuesday's Consolidated Fund Bill debate will almost certainly provide the best chance for the matter to be debated at an early stage.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the debate on research and development to take place at a time when the Prime Minister can be present, so that she can be educated in the facts? Is he aware that academic, university and research council funded research in this country accounts for only 0·25 per cent. of GDP compared with 0·45 per cent. in France and West Germany, so that an 80 per cent. increase in funding is required to match that of our industrial competitors? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the latest advice from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils to the Secretary of State for Education and Science, who will be seeing the chairmen of the research councils tomorrow, is that it cannot be right to cut our research capability as an advanced industrial nation?

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has a degree in chemistry. If I invited her to attend a debate because the hon. Gentleman thought that she needed education she would no doubt box first my ears and then his—and well merited it would be.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the United Kingdom fishing industry? There was a debate on quotas at the turn of the year, but there has been no recent full debate on all aspects of the industry. As a considerable restructuring of the fleet is taking place and there have been a number of developments since the common fisheries policy came into operation in January 1983, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that a review of the direction and performance of the British fishing industry would be a salutary and worthwhile exercise?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point in an engaging way. I will certainly pass on his observations to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Consolidated Fund Bill

4.7 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have a short statement to make about arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment which will follow the passing of the Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill on Tuesday 24 March 1987.

Members should submit their subjects to my office not later than 9 am on Monday 23 March. A list showing the subjects and times will be published later that day. Normally the time allotted will not exceed one and a half hours, but I propose to exercise a discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer, up to a maximum of three hours.

Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different Members whose names are drawn in the ballot, only the first name will be shown on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them, it is the responsibility of Members to keep in touch with developments if they are not to miss their turn.

Health Authorities (Public Statements)

4.8 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"ministerial interference in the public statements of health authorities, their staff and consultants".

Despite all the efforts of DHSS Ministers and their 29-strong press office, the facts about the parlous state of the Health Service still get out. Sometimes, when this has happened in a particular health authority area, DHSS press staff have contacted the staff of the health authority concerned to ask them to stifle any dissenting voices and to rubbish any statements suggesting that all is not well with health care in the locality.

Last week, as part of a public relations exercise, the Government released welcome but minor extra sums of money to health authorities in areas where the cuts were biting deepest. DHSS headquarters demanded to see draft press releases that were to be issued by the four regions concerned and demanded the alteration of three of the four drafts to make them what was described as "more positive". To back up their censorship efforts, DHSS officials threatened one health authority official by saying that unless his press release was changed to suit them the money for the health authority would be withheld.

On Monday, The London Evening Standard printed a double-page spread on the parlous state of the NHS in west London. The section on the West Lambeth health authority quoted a named consultant physician at St. Thomas's hospital who had criticised the lack of resources that prevented him and his colleagues from doing a proper job. Before the day was out, the health authority received a call from No. 10 Downing street telling it to make the consultant keep quiet and to threaten him by referring to the terms of his contract. I remind the House that the man that Downing street was trying to gag was a consultant physician and not an ex-employee of MI5.

The matter is important because cowardly, covert censorship is a threat to proper standards of public life and contrary to our proper tradition that British people should be allowed to speak out when they see wrongs done. Democracy requires those who make decisions to defend their decisions themselves and not to get paid officials to tell lies and half-truths on their behalf.

This matter is clearly important and I believe that it merits urgent consideration.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"ministerial interference in the public statements of health authorities, their staff and consultants".

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said but I regret that I do not consider the matter an appropriate one for discussion under Standing Order No. 20, and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Urban Road Building

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise a point of order relating to the rights of Back-Bench Members and the obligations of Ministers to the House.

Earlier this afternoon, I received a letter from the Under-Secretary of State for Transport notifying me that he would be answering a written question today on an important matter that affects my constituency, that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and those of the hon. Members for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) and for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office.

The question related to urban road building affecting the four constituencies and the letter said that the Minister would subsequently visit the area accompanied by the press. Despite attempts to speak to the Minister and his office to request further information, I was told that no further information could be given me, but that in due course I would receive a copy of the written answer. When I came to the House at 3.30 pm I had still not received it.

Is it proper for Ministers to behave in this way towards hon. Members, particularly when it transpires that at this very moment the Minister is in my constituency and adjoining ones making statements to the press and commenting on matters of which hon. Members have no knowledge? Is it proper for Ministers to show such contempt — [HON. MEMBERS: "Arrogance."] — to constituency members and to fail to make a statement?

Mr. Speaker: Normally, answers to written questions are available at 3.30 pm, so the hon. Gentleman should have had that. I cannot answer the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question except to say that normally, if a Minister were in an hon. Gentleman's constituency, it would be a courtesy to let him know.

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [17 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the national debt and public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or

(d) for any relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lawson.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 10155/86, Annual Economic Report 1986-87 and the unnumbered document, Annual Economic Report 1986-87 (final version as adopted by the Council).]

4.15 pm

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Today it is proper to begin to consider the extent to which Tuesday's Budget was a Budget for jobs, and undoubtedly it was a Budget for jobs. The background is that this morning's unemployment figures show that our economic policies are continuing to produce jobs. This month's reduction of 44,000 in the seasonally adjusted number of unemployed was the largest fall for any month since records of this kind began to be kept. We have now had falls in unemployment for seven months in a row. Since last July unemployment has gone down by nearly 150,000, and that is not the only good result since 1983.

Unemployment in Britain is falling faster than in any other industrial country. All areas of the country have shared in the reductions this month, with Wales in the lead. The number of those out of work for more than a year—the long-term unemployed—is now coming down steadily and youth unemployment, which has been falling for about three years, is continuing to fall steadily as well.

There is no doubt that the background to our discussion is that the monthly fall, which has been running at about 20,000, will continue. I believe that the Budget that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer presented on Tuesday will sustain the momentum of that welcome downward trend. The difficulty facing the three Opposition parties—they do not enjoy listening to this much-improved news—is that they do not understand how real jobs are being created in the economy. Hence they are somewhat bewildered when the figures continue to look so good.

We, on the other hand, have a strategy for jobs. It is a strategy that is working and one that the Budget has undoubtedly strengthened. The essential basis for any job strategy is a sound economy with steady growth and low inflation. Those are the conditions that create the economic climate in which firms can compete successfully and create jobs.

The growth in our economy this year has been sufficient to finance higher public spending and to reduce personal taxation and public borrowing. The combination of those three aspects emphasises our commitment to steady growth and low inflation. The lower interest rates that are beginning to come through in the wake of lower public sector borrowing will help companies to compete through lower costs, and encourage investment and jobs.

In contrast to that, we shall have to listen this afternoon to a succession of speeches from Opposition Members extolling the virtues of more public spending designed to boost favoured areas of the economy. With some small variations, it will be claimed by Labour, Liberal and Social Democratic spokesmen that various job packages can be put together in that way.

Some will claim a spurious respectability for their shabby parcels by saying that they have tried them out in computer programmes. I recently appeared on a television programme on which I had to listen to a bewildering discussion between Mrs. Shirley Williams and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), comparing the respective merits of the computer programmes through which they were feeding their high public spending plans.

That is all irrelevant to the satisfactory events outside this House. I ask right hon. and hon. Members to reflect carefully, to remember their own experiences in office and to consider the experience of other countries when those countries have tried to follow such nostrums.

I shall begin by discussing the reductions in personal taxation.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Did I hear the Paymaster General aright when he said that we must compare our experience with that of his Government? Does he agree that the number of people in employment when the Labour Government left office in 1979 was 400,000 more than it was when that Government came to office?

Mr. Clarke: When the Labour Government left office they left a collapsed economy going into recession, with the result that we had to shed many jobs in the first two or three years. The recovery in the economy during the past few years and the increase in the number of people in work, particularly since the spring of 1983, is better than that achieved in any other country. Of course there were more people in work in 1979, but most of them were in overmanned and uncompetitive industries and were doomed to losing their jobs in the wake of the high inflation that the Labour Government had imposed on the economy as it went into a severe world recession. It is obvious that the points I made were related to the strong and sustained recovery that the country has been making ahead of any others over the past six or seven years.

This year in the Budget the reductions in personal taxation are the key elements in the Government's strategy. The Opposition obviously attack that and claim that the choice confronting the Chancellor was tax cuts or jobs. In my opinion, two false assumptions lie behind that claim. The first is that somehow tax cuts cannot help to create enough jobs in an expanding economy such as our own, and the second is that public spending can, in itself, create more real additional jobs that last. Both those propositions are fundamentally misconceived. One of the reasons why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor chose to cut personal taxation is that tax cuts help to create jobs. They improve incentives, make it easier to keep pay increases in line with performance and they should make it easier for people to keep their wage demands in line with the performance of their companies. That helps us to reduce our unit labour costs, which, I am glad to say, are now in line with or below most of the costs of our competitors, and it should help to increase our competitiveness. That is the one real route to real jobs because more competitive firms can export more and supply more home demand.

The main effect of tax cuts is that they give people a real increase in their standard of living. It can be more accurately described as giving them back the standard of living they earned before Government taxation reduced it. As I understand it, the Opposition are not trying to make out some extraordinary case against increased living standards. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) is constantly urging increased take-home pay for millions of workers on average and below average earnings up and down the country. The strange position he is in is that he advocates increased living standards as long as they are achieved by pay increases but he is opposed to increased living standards if they are achieved by tax reductions.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham North-West) rose——

Mr. Clarke: There is an obvious political reason behind that apparent anomaly. He believes that workers will be grateful to trade unions for pay increases but grateful to the Government for the tax cuts we produce. There is an important difference. Pay increases put up industrial costs. Pay increases ahead of productivity and performance can cost jobs. Tax cuts do not cost industry. At no cost to industry or employers my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has raised the living standards of 25 million taxpayers.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East) rose——

Mr. Clarke: I think that the Opposition are in favour of raising living standards but when we talk about raising living standards by tax cuts—it never happens when we are talking about pay increases—we sudeenly have an outbreak of arguments about consumers spending money on imports. Indeed, I heard the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) say something about buying goods from Japan. I do not understand the logic of the argument that it is wrong to increase the amount of money that stays in the pocket of taxpayers because they might buy goods from abroad. I cannot understand why that logic is never applied to pay increases when they are advocated or supported by Opposition Members. I look forward to the day when local authority workers next apply for——

Mr. Leighton: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will not give way.

I look forward to the time when local authority workers next seek a pay rise and Opposition Members say, "No. It is wrong to increase the take-home pay of that large body of workers because they cannot be trusted with the money and might go out and buy imported goods." The answer to the question of imports, if anybody is concerned about it, is to carry on improving the competitiveness of our home producers, continue improving the quality, price and reliability of our goods and maintain our market share, as we are maintaining it in world trade. We are also increasing the volume of our exports. The idea that the answer to imports is to keep the public poorer is an extraordinary argument. Indeed, if one was to succeed in making the population poorer by reversing the tax reductions we have announced, I would still expect that poorer population to spend the same proportion of their earnings on imported or home-produced goods, according to their quality and attractiveness. It is absurd to respond to tax cuts on the grounds that they somehow give rise to a greater danger to the balance of trade or overseas imports.

If the Opposition support higher living standards from higher pay, but not from lower taxation, they clearly have no time for any increase in incentives to those who work in the British economy and who are succeeding in making it more dynamic. When we entered office in 1979 the basic rate of tax was 33 per cent., as hon. Members will recall, the higher rates of tax were 40 per cent. rising to 83 per cent. and 3·5 per cent. of taxpayers paid tax at higher rates. The tax paid by those top taxpayers amounted to 20 per cent. of the total income tax paid. We reduced the higher rates in order to promote entrepreneurship, encourage risk-taking and to stop the drain abroad of our best talents, all of which was taking place in 1979.

Look at what has happened since then: higher rates have been reduced, thresholds have increased in real terms, and the basic rate has been sharply reduced. The earnings of those higher rate taxpayers have increased to such an extent that they now represent 5 per cent. of taxpayers and they contribute no less than 27 per cent. of the yield. The top 10 per cent. of taxpayers—the top-earning 10 per cent.—are now contributing 37·5 per cent. as against their 34 per cent. share in 1978-79. The lesson is simple. Reducing the tax burden does not reduce the proportion of the take from the higher earners but the more people work for themselves and their families, the more effort they are likely to put into managing and developing their businesses and, in turn, the more the general public benefits.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): How, in terms of fairness, can the Paymaster General justify a situation that has arisen since 1979 where those on £125 a week have, through tax cuts, saved £2 a week whereas those on £70,000 a year have seen tax cuts of £389 a week? How, in equity, can the Paymaster General justify that?

Mr. Clarke: It is obvious with the graduated income tax that, in cash terms, higher earners save more than lower earners. In fact, throughout our period of office, the benefits of tax reduction have been spread across the spectrum. Indeed, by raising the level at which people start to pay tax, we have reduced the number of taxpayers by about 1·5 million. There would be almost 1·5 million more people paying tax if the thresholds had remained at the levels we inherited from the Lib-Lab Government.

I shall now return to the argument, which is full of weaknesses, about tax cuts versus jobs. One weakness is the belief that all three Opposition parties share about the role of public spending in creating jobs. One thing that the different packages put forward by the Opposition parties have in common is that they are all based on the notion that the Chancellor hands over a large sum of public spending, presumably to the Secretary of State for Employment, and then that public spending is distributed to favoured groups in a way that creates jobs. Of course, one could have an immediate and short-term impact if one increased the spending of local authorities up and down the country. If one did that one would, in the short term, create more local authority jobs. However, that is a short-lived increase in the total level of employment in the country.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Clarke: The artificial creation of such jobs inevitably raises taxes, or increases interest rates. The policies of all the Opposition parties seem likely to do both. That raises the cost of other parts of the economy and it loses more productive jobs elsewhere.

Just as in my opinion the tax cuts versus jobs hypothesis is based on a total misconception of how jobs are created in a modern economy, so, in my opinion, is the argument that we have chosen tax cuts as opposed to improving services. Many of the "make-work" schemes of the Opposition plan to increase spending and jobs in essential public services. However, most of them are in services in which the Government are already expanding spending, and sometimes employment. Continuing steady growth in the economy will mean that more money will be available to spend on public services such as health and education. Indeed, we have proved that. As a result of our record growth, the Government have been able to demonstrate that only this year. That is why we announced last autumn increased spending of £4¾ billion—much of it in health and education. At that time the House was lobbied and I was more closely involved than usual in the public spending discussions.

When we publicised our public spending plans, we were accused of making a U-turn. We were accused of going on a spending spree. The difference between that increased spending and the kind that our opponents are contemplating is that we have increased spending only in line with the ability of a growing economy to afford it. When the Labour Government were in office, they failed because they did not understand that the growth of GDP has to come first and then public spending follows.

When we choose our priorities for increased public spending, our first priority must be dictated by the need to improve the level of service to the public. We must consider what is best for pupils and what is best for patients. We are not concentrating on spending money to produce overblown levels of manning, which is what the programmes of the Opposition seem to imply.

Governments who have tried to promote growth by pumping the economy full of money that they did not have found that they had to raise taxes to pay for their increased borrowing. They failed to sustain growth in the economy and before long they had to cut public spending, which they had stimulated artificially for a short time.

Mr. Tony Banks: We are not talking about a Government who, at this time, do not have any money to give away. It is well known, as the Chancellor made quite clear, that there were many billions of pounds to give away. Will the Minister explain what would create more jobs—£3 billion spent on tax reductions, or £3 billion spent on targeted public expenditure such as infrastructure investment? Surely that is an investment in wealth and it certainly would create many jobs.

Mr. Clarke: Chancellors do not give money away. They raise revenue from the economy and dispense it. We are talking about the amount that the Chancellor can afford to keep in the economy. It is the combination of higher public spending, lower personal taxation and reduced public sector borrowing that is the key to this Budget. The hon. Gentleman is right. It is astonishing that no one is claiming that we cannot afford it. Such is the growth of the economy that everyone accepts that the billions of pounds of increased public spending, reduced taxation and reduced borrowing are perfectly affordable. We now have an economy that performs in such a way as to sustain that. The only argument from Opposition parties is that the Chancellor should spend several billion pounds more than we have and establish make-work schemes through overmanning in either the nationalised industries or the public services and returning to the old type of jobs package.

The use of public spending as a main weapon to regenerate the economy or to create jobs has usually been followed by unemployment and public spending cuts. We do not have to look too far to see how that has happened. We should consider the history of the Mitterrand Government in France. When they first took office their policies were remarkably similar to those of the Opposition parties. They had to reverse them after those policies had caused disaster within the first two years. That happened to the last Labour Government. They came into office with a rapid increase in public spending, followed by visitations from the IMF and savage public spending cuts. The last Labour Government were the only Government who would ever have dared to cut spending on the National Health Service in real terms because they were obliged to bring in the IMF in the late 1970s.

In contrast, our jobs strategy is to tackle the real needs of the economy. There is a need for skilled and well-trained people and people who are involved in the success of their companies. We need to create new firms and develop existing firms. We recognise that the special problems of the unemployed will have to be helped by programmes which will not give them useless jobs and overmanned services, but remotivate them and help them back into the expanding labour market. The expansion of our employment programmes, the last announcement of which we made last January, will strengthen that jobs strategy.

Our strategy tackles the need for training in the economy. The new job training scheme will help the unemployed to raise their skill levels, which will get them back into employment, and gradually improve the skill level of many in the labour force. The taxation changes announced in the Budget will give a tax incentive both to employers and to employees who are prepared to retrain for new employment opportunities.

The tax concessions announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget, and the JTS programme announced in January, are only the last in a programme of growth in the training provision in this country.

Mr. Prescott: What about the progress rate?

Mr. Clarke: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is not more subdued. The programmes that his party wishes to introduce imitate rather than criticise our schemes. Perhaps that is because of the slight change in guidance on the direction of employment policy.

Before the hon. Gentleman speaks, will he consider that about 1 million people in the coming year will be undergoing training under the YTS, the JTS, the enterprise training scheme and the adult training strategy, and that those 1 million people will be training with employers, supported by the Government? Only about a quarter of a million people were undergoing such training when the Labour Government left office in 1979. The only sensible part of the Labour party's jobs programme seems to be a straight crib of our JTS programme. That would cover about 300,000 of the places that the Labour party was looking for.

The difference between us and the Opposition is that they are not content to allow employers to take the lead. We tend to do that because we believe that it ensures training in the skills that really exist in the market place. The Opposition appear to want to tax industry heavily so as to give the Government a much stronger guiding role in the nature of training that is given.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East will have the opportunity when he speaks to explain the levy that he announced of at least 1 per cent. of turnover on all firms. A document published this morning still refers to that levy, but it has been toned down so as not to give any specific figures. However, the document seems still to imply a levy on all firms, with no exemptions. The street corner shop apparently is to contribute to such a levy, the purpose being that instead of building on the training programmes of employers, as we are with work experience with employers, a Labour Government will step in with a huge amount of taxation on all companies so as to run the training programmes themselves.

Mr. Prescott: The Paymaster General is right; perhaps I shall discuss the details of training in my speech. But first I must refer to the 1 per cent. levy on turnover. We have never said that the proposed levy would be 1 per cent. on turnover. I have said that the figures that we were aiming for and the resources to achieve comparability with most of our competitors lay within the range of 1 per cent. of turnover, and a combination of levies, contributions and grants would be the way in which we would finance a much more radically expanded programme. That is precisely what is outlined in today's document.

Mr. Clarke: I suspect that there was some scouring of past texts to come up with that formula. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall scour the text myself. I may be mistaken, but I recollect that the hon. Gentleman said in this Chamber that there would be at least a 1 per cent. levy on the turnover of all companies. I have a feeling that he has lost that particular struggle at this stage in producing his party's document, but the hon. Gentleman is still talking about a levy on all companies with limited exemptions. That means that all small companies will face a new 1 per cent. tax. That does not help jobs; that cuts jobs. The hon. Gentleman will have to explain the contrary if he believes it.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): My right hon. and learned Friend made be interested to know that the Opposition spokesman for employment came to my constituency and made that announcement about the levy.

Mr. Clarke: If the hon. Gentleman went to Nottingham to make that announcement, he went to a most important place to underline that policy. I think that it has been ironed out in Dagenham — but I fear that it has not been reversed, merely obscured. To be fair to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, he has won one battle because the levy still exists, as it was included in the document this morning. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be a little less emphatic about how much it will cost British industry—but cost it will.

Our strategy extends not only to training, because it is also designed to get employers and employees together so that they have a common interest and involvement in the success of their companies. I welcome my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's decision to introduce tax relief on profit-related pay on a more favourable basis than that outlined in the Green Paper. That should also be welcomed by everyone on both sides of industry, not because that form of relating pay to company performance is the only way or necessarily the best way to involve employees, but because it is one very useful method. It is vital to encourage managers and employees to continue to relate pay ever more closely and flexibly to company performance. It is also vital for people to be involved more closely in their companies and profit-related pay is an extremely important way of achieving that.

Our strategy also involves the encouragement of small firms. They are not highly regarded by the Opposition because the Labour party does not have a strong political base there. Small firms have proved to be the main source of new jobs here as in every other advanced and developing country. The Budget directly helps new and small firms in a number of important ways, building on the progress made in previous years.

I do not know whether hon. Members appreciate what a huge easing of the burden on small firms the VAT proposals in the Budget will be. The ability to account for VAT on an annual basis will reduce the administrative burden and help the cash flow management of small firms. The ability to account for VAT on a cost basis matches the VAT system much more closely to the way in which most small businesses are run, and also solves the problem of VAT on bad debts which, as I am sure my hon. Friends will agree, has been the source of persistent complaints from small business men for as long as any of us can remember. Tax reform of this kind will lift the burden on many small businesses and enable people to pay more attention and give more time to the real needs and problems of running a small firm successfully.

The reduction in personal taxation and the cut in corporation tax for small companies will give small businesses more room in which to develop and a greater incentive to expand and create profits and jobs. All these measures support our direct steps to help the long-term unemployed—people who have been out of work for six or 12 months or more—to get back into the expanding labour market which our economic policy is creating. Our restart and community programmes and our other programmes all come into the picture.

Of course, when we produce good news on jobs, as we have done today in talking about the downward trend in unemployment, the Opposition attack that part of our policy which gives rise to that good news, saying they are just schemes. They ignore the background that I have just given of an expanding economy and all our direct support to new businesses and new job creation.

The Opposition do not even understand the programmes that they attack. The shadow Chancellor is not in the House. He has an appalling record for attacking all the good news about jobs through our schemes, and he does not even take the trouble to find out what on earth the schemes are. In describing the restart programme, he said:

"I am aware that the scheme for identifying the long-term unemployed and giving them counselling . . . is not only . . . patronising to the long-term unemployed, but demonstrates a deep ignorance of the problem."—[Official Report, 19 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 306.]

I am glad to say that the restart programme is now tucked away in the Labour party's policy document. After the abuse to which it has been subjected, the Opposition now incorporate that scheme in their policies. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) talked about "a deep ignorance of the problem."

He continually demonstrates a deep ignorance of the nature of the help that our schemes give to unemployed people. Yesterday morning I listened to him on the "Today" radio programme and I was astonished at what he said. I have the transcript here. He was talking about the way in which unemployment has fallen over the past six months. He did not know how good the news would be this morning. He said:

"It's not a very real drop," and he turned to what he called "those extraordinary schemes".

"Do you know that young people in my constituency are told they only get unemployment pay if they go to job clubs, and when they turn up to job clubs they're required to play games under the supervision of nursery school teachers. Thus they're removed from the unemployment register. Thus the figure goes down. I think humiliating them that way is disgraceful. It has absolutely nothing to do with improving the economy."

It also has absolutely nothing to do with the truth. That statement is totally and ridiculously wrong in every feature. Job clubs are not at all as the right hon. Gentleman describes them. They are attended by long-term unemployed people who are brought together and given help in searching for jobs. They are allowed free postage and free telephone calls and given professional support in applying for the jobs which can be found in the evening and provincial newspapers as well as in our jobcentres all over Britain.

Those unemployed people are successful. The people in job clubs are not removed from the unemployment count as the right hon. Gentleman said, but they remove themselves because the majority of them get jobs. The right hon. Gentleman was talking about his own constituency. I looked up the job club in his constituency and found that of those who go to it 72 per cent. leave the unemployment count because they go into jobs and training. More than half of them get jobs and another quarter go into training and into the community programme. The score in Sparkbrook is that 72 per cent. of people are being helped into jobs by the Sparkbrook job club.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook derides the club. His claims are ridiculous. I usually accuse the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East of making up things on his feet as he goes along. The next time that he does that I shall accuse him of having a touch of the Hattersleys, because the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook obviously made up his claims as he sat talking into the microphone in Broadcasting house. He is doing serious damage by talking nonsense because all the people that we are helping in Sparkbrook will be deterred from going along and getting the growing number of jobs that can be found in the Birmingham Evening Mail and in our jobcentres. That will happen if the right hon. Gentleman continues to make irresponsible and ridiculous remarks.

It is not just that the Opposition do not understand our programmes. As I have tried to explain, the schemes are only one part of our job strategy for bringing the long-term unemployed into an expanding economy and into all the new jobs that are coming along as we stimulate new and small businesses. The trouble with the Labour party, the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party is that they are completely hung up in asserting that expanding and stimulating the economy in this way is no answer. They want jobs programmes involving £X on public spending and believe that that will somehow be converted into Y jobs by some other Minister.

I have already described the ridiculous process of those parties, arguing about computer models into which they feed their various programmes, to which I had to listen. Creating the right conditions for employment is not just an academic exercise on a computer programme. There is only one representative of the alliance in the House. However, he is a distinguished one.

I heard Shirley Williams somewhat troubled by allegations made rather skilfully by a Labour spokesman about the slight adjustment that would have to be made to the alliance computer model in order to get the right answer to come out. The one result the computer did produce was that unemployment would continue to come down under Conservative policies. The alliance reduction was not quite right and structural changes were made to the computer.

I am reminded of what I believe is a true story about a chap who had theories about the great pyramid in Cairo. Some people specialise in producing tremendous theories about the course of history and the end of the world by drawing up theories about the measurements of the great pyramid. One night one such person was found at the peak of the pyramid trying to chip a little bit off to try to make the great pyramid fit his theory. That seems to be the kind of practise in which alliance politicians indulge with their computer models and their extraordinary programmes.

Given the programmes produced by Labour and the alliance I find it difficult to tell their policies apart, especially because changes are continually being made to the figures and the content every time a spokeman for one or other party produces the latest version. The alliance and the Labour party have the same unrealistic target because they use the same unrealistic method. The alliance claims to be moderate because it says it will take a little longer to get there. Both Labour and the alliance admit that they would push up taxes. The alliance would certainly have to do that. Both Labour and the alliance would push up borrowing and inflation and in the long term they would push up unemployment rather than reduce it in any lasting way.

The only moderation that I can see in the policies of the alliance is that it cliams that it will spend on its package £1 billion less than the Labour party. That is based on alliance costings which I do not believe for one moment. The only other difference that I concede to the parties of the alliance is that they admit that their policies would be inflationary. They would seek to restrain that, not with a new idea but by going back to the tired old answer of a statutory incomes policy.

Spokesmen such as the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), a former Chancellor of the Exchequer, have been going back to the good old days and producing a somewhat watered-down version of Labour policies. He has described with loving care the model of a statutory incomes policy, with every employer notifying central Government of every pay settlement.

The imposition of the Government norm with a new tax imposed on companies that do not comply with it takes us straight back to the days of the Wilson and Callaghan Governments. We should not be going back to those days. We need to build on the success of our policy, and the success of Tuesday's Budget. By judicious management of the economy the Government have achieved three central objectives. First, we have cut taxes at the base rate. Those cuts will create the improved business climate in which jobs are created. They will provide assistance for the low paid, just as the lifting of 1·5 million people out of the tax bracket by the Government has increased incentives. The strong downward trend in unemployment over the past seven months has given people the incentive to work, to seek new jobs and to join an enterprise culture which tax cuts will help.

Secondly, we have also cut borrowing by reducing the PSBR to £4 billion—a target which in the past 48 hours has produced a fall in interest rates which will also reduce industrial costs, increase competitiveness and create real jobs.

Thirdly, we have the £4·75 billion additional public spending, first announced in the autumn statement, essential spending on our Health Service, our education service, the poor and those most in need. As I said to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), no one denies that the growth in the economy enables my right hon. Friend to afford all that additional spending. Only sustained growth in the economy with low inflation, increased competitiveness and increased productivity can achieve those three objectives simultaneously.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): May I draw my right hon. and learned Friend's attention to the fact that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has just sauntered in? Will my right hon. and learned Friend repeat the telling passage in which he demolished the right hon. Gentleman in his absence?

Mr. Clarke: As the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is not going to become Chancellor of the Exchequer, he may soon face a prolonged period of unemployment. I suggest that he visits the Sparkbrook job club, where he will find valuable services of which he is at present hopelessly ignorant.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): The area has a male unemployment rate of 51 per cent., which has increased from 17 per cent. since the election of the Conservative Government. How many of those men does the right hon. and learned Gentleman think that the jobcentre will help?

Mr. Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman should listen more carefully. I was not talking about the jobcentre; that is the office to which he would go to look for job vacancies. If the right hon. Gentleman had been present, he would have heard the welcome news that of those who visited the Sparkbrook job club, which he was attacking the other day, 72 per cent. had ceased to be unemployed. Half of them had obtained jobs, while the remainder had been taken on to training and community programmes.

It is no good the right hon. Gentleman looking so sad and worried. He should be rejoicing. The fact that such things can happen in his constituency shows what the Government can achieve. The fact that the right hon. Gentleman is so out of touch with his local job club may explain why his constituency is often littered with posters demanding his deselection by dissident groups in his party. He should nurse his constituency more carefully, and find out what is going on there.

Mr. Hattersley: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is right to say that he is making me angry. My anger is on behalf of the 51 per cent. of my constituents who are unemployed. Let me ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the question again, so that he will have a chance to give a straight answer. How many of those men will be helped by the job club?

Mr. Clarke: No doubt I shall be able to find a figure for Sparkbrook. I am sure that Sparkbrook is benefiting from the continuing fall in unemployment in the west midlands. Employment in that region collapsed in the wake of the collapse of the vehicle industry which followed years of subsidy, mismanagement, overmanning and bad industrial relations in the 1960s and 1970s. The industry fell prey to a number of problems in the recession which followed the departure from office of the Labour Government.

However, over the past year, unemployment in the west midlands has been dropping consistently. It is third in the list of regions in which unemployment is falling most rapidly. The right hon. Gentleman should rejoice that unemployment is falling and that positive action is being taken in Sparkbrook, rather than giving entirely fanciful descriptions on the radio of what is occurring.

As I have said, only sustained growth in the economy can achieve the objectives that my right hon. Friend set out in his Budget. Only those policies can sustain and accelerate a long-term downward trend in unemployment. So far, we have seen the creation of over 1 million new jobs since the spring of 1983. That record is the envy of our competitors, and is fast becoming a matter of great concern to all the Opposition parties. We intend to sustain that record, stimulated not least by my right hon. Friend's Budget statement.

4.55 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): The Paymaster General usually makes his points much more clearly. His speech today has been very confusing, but I shall try to answer a couple of his observations.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to be knocking economic models as making no contribution to judgments and decisions about the creation of work. But, while he may ignore what such models tell him, I believe that the Chancellor would work on the Treasury model and make many judgments and assessments in the light of the information that it provides.

It is generally agreed that many more jobs can be created through public expenditure than through tax cuts, although we may differ about the sort of jobs that it creates. The evidence for that comes from the Paymaster General himself. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Government had spent an extra £4 billion, creating jobs in health, education and other public services. He answered the very question that he posed: public expenditure can play that role.

If we compare the performance of our economy with that of other members of the European Community, we see that their use of public expenditure has been much more effectively deployed and that they have been able to maintain far higher employment than we have. We have considerable evidence on which to make judgments about the role of public expenditure—some of it has even been provided by the OECD — when comparing Britain's economy with those of the other developed countries.

Whatever else is claimed for this Budget, it has certainly not made reducing mass unemployment a priority. That is one fact on which all observers are plainly agreed, as we can see from today's editorials. The unemployment that the United Kingdom has been experiencing is higher than it was in the 1930s, and has lasted longer. In the 1930s, unemployment increased every year for four consecutive years. However, unemployment has increased year on year in the eight wasted years of this Government's term of office. Their policy has undoubtedly contributed to that unemployment.

When the Chancellor spoke in a party political broadcast on television the other evening, we heard a great deal about how Britain was at the top of the league. He told millions of people how proud we could be when comparing the 1980s with the 1960s and 1970s. He flagged up a number of dubious statistics showing Britain at the top of the league. More significant was what he left out. The countries used by the Chancellor as examples are those used in a booklet given to us by ITN. That shows that, while the Chancellor was right to point out those things in which we were top of the league, he significantly left out the fact we are also top of the league in unemployment.

This has a significant effect on the argument about public expenditure. The OECD, in comparing the problems of unemployment in all the developed economies, discovered that Britain had a higher level of unemployment since the period 1979-84. The record shows that the average level of unemployment in Britain under past Labour and Tory Governments has been similar to the average for other developed economies, and that level has been creeping up. We must address our attention to this problem. The significant difference is that since the period 1979-84, for some reason the level in Britain has gone 2 or 3 per cent. higher.

I asked the Library of the House of Commons whether it could estimate how much less unemployment there would have been in the United Kingdom if we had kept to the average level of unemployment commensurate with the OECD countries, as we did in the past two decades. The answer is that there would have been 1 million fewer unemployed. I draw the Paymaster General's attention to the fact that the Library analysed what had gone on in the different economies. Public expenditure has remained high in the United Kingdom, but the change in how it has been spent has been considerable. We have put more into defence and less into education. I was amazed to hear the Paymaster General say that the Government are concerned about pupils and where the money goes, because everybody tells us that they are desperately short even of books to carry out the curricula which the Government have asked them to implement. It is a cheek for the Paymaster General to tell us that he is concerned about pupils. What he means is pupils in private schools. That is another difference between us and the Government.

Expenditure on transport and health — Departments for which the Paymaster General had responsibility once — has been cut, thereby throwing people on to the dole so that we spent £20 billion keeping them wasting their lives doing nothing. It is in those sectors that the Paymaster General now claims that his £4 billion package will get people back to work, but it was cuts in those sectors that contributed to the extra unemployment suffered in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I should like the hon. Gentleman to specify where he thinks we made the cuts in expenditure. Was it in the trunk road programme, in railway investment, or in the Health Service? All three sectors have seen sustained increases in public expenditure, largely making up for the 1976 cuts made by the Labour Government.

Mr. Prescott: That is the kind of clever answer that we have come to expect from the Paymaster General. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Before hon. Members laugh too much, I point out that that kind of clever reply does not address itself to the problem. What the Paymaster General says about transport largely means roads. The public service obligation in British Rail was, as the Paymaster General knows, about £900 million, which is equivalent to the average support given to railway systems in Europe. That was cut by almost £500 million. That affected the level of investment in British Rail.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose——

Mr. Prescott: Just let me finish.

The Paymaster General and I have argued about transport before, when we had responsibility for that subject. British Rail secured agreement with the Government to carry out investment, and we now know how British Rail carried out that investment. It increased redundancies to pay for that investment. In other words, we paid for people to be thrown out to waste their lives on the dole.

British Rail did not carry out the investment programme that it should have, and we heard some evidence of that yesterday with the sixth announcement of cuts in British Rail Engineering Ltd. With each of those six announcements, we were told that there would be no further cuts, but the company has continued to cut manufacturing capacity, which is largely dependent on public expenditure and affects the level of unemployment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman and I are both jobbing back a little, but it is relevant to the argument. What we have cut on British Rail is losses. That makes the railways less of a drain on the general economy. We have increased investment on the railways, for example through electrification on the east coast railway line, and in East Anglia. That investment costs jobs. I usually cite this example against Liberals going on about infrastructure spending. Electrifying railways cuts manpower needs on the railways and reduces the need for maintenance. It enables manning reductions to be made. It is desirable because one gets a more modern and efficient railway, which serves the public, but it is another demonstration of how straight public spending does not create jobs.

Mr. Prescott: We could continue the argument, basing it on the evidence of the passenger transport consultative committee, which talks about the declining quality of travel and investment in the British Rail system. It is an independent body, the Government's watchdog, telling the Minister the results of low investment in British Rail. The deregulation of the passenger transport industry has led not only to fewer services costing more but to a decimation of the bus industry, which further undermines manufacturing. Public expenditure not only provides jobs and services and meets needs, but is used to rebuild investment in our crucial manufacturing industry about which the Government appear so indifferent.

Public expenditure is critical in any argument about unemployment, but it is not always the Government's case that it does not create jobs. The Paymaster General justified why the Government are spending more money creating jobs. Our argument is that if resources are available, they should be targeted on trying to maximise jobs and decrease unemployment. That is our central case, which we shall be putting to the electorate.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Loughborough) Does the hon. Gentleman dismiss wholly the possibility that extra public expenditure may be justified not merely by its job creating powers but by the fact that it will improve services in education, health and so on? He is talking solely about public expenditure as a job creation mechanism. The increases to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred are justified by the fact that they improve the services available to the consumer.

Mr. Prescott: I endorse what the hon. Gentleman says. He must have listened to my argument when he opposed me in my constituency. Our argument has always been that we shall use public expenditure to meet real needs by providing real services and create jobs in doing so. That has an important multiplier effect on manufacturing industry, which is crucial for us. We do not want to use public money wastefully. We think how we can target it effectively in getting jobs. That 2p off income tax does not target anything. It helps the rich, who will spend on imports, thereby aggravating the problems of manufacturing industry, which cannot get a sufficient domestic base to give it the strength to export.

We know all the well-rehearsed arguments. I do not think that anybody doubts that public expenditure can play a role in creating employment. The central question about the Budget is what one would choose to do with the money. Would one make tackling unemployment the highest priority, or is one concerned more about short-term considerations — appearing to the City to be prudent and rewarding the wealthy on the proposition that some of their spending assists the economy? The Government have made the wrong choice. Their choice seems to have more to do with keeping down inflation —for example, there is no further tax on cigarettes and drink.

However, even on inflation it is remarkable how the Chancellor did not flag Britain's record. As he pointed out, the percentage has come down, but that is true of every other country, and in fact it has not decreased as fast here as it has in other countries. The Chancellor's argument about inflation is a mistruth which misleads the electorate about the true position. That is one of the reasons why we reject the central argument in the Chancellor's television appearance.

One of the main charges against the Government's priorities is that they will fuel a credit boom and create more of the problems about which we are concerned. At this time of year the Government talk about a Budget for jobs and growth. In the past they have always associated jobs with their Budget programme, and unemployment has gone up and up, in spite of nearly 750,000 places on employment schemes brought in in an attempt to fiddle the figures. That is apart from the 18 or 19 other fiddles. A significant feature of this year's Budget is that there is no pretence that it has anything to do with jobs. For the first time, the Chancellor has not made a major issue of jobs or said that the Budget will help industry. Although past Budgets have been associated with jobs—the electorate has heard that year after year—there has not been a reduction in unemployment. The opposite has happened. Despite all the fiddles, unemployment has continued to increase. In the past year there has been an increase in ten-and-sympathy skivvy training jobs on community programmes, the YTS and the new job training scheme. That is because the Government are more concerned with massaging the figures than with solving the real problems associated with training our people.

Great claims have been made about the present unemployment figures. Let me make it clear—as I did with Lord Young today—that we would welcome any reduction in unemployment. We believe that much of the claimed improvement is on the basis of the Government's massaging of the statistics by means of various schemes. Lord Young said on the radio that the January job figures did not include one place on a scheme. I was surprised, because that implies that many scheme places had affected the employment figures in previous months. I have repeatedly tried to make that point and Lord Young has repeatedly denied it. Yet he said this morning that the January figures were free from any massaging. I find that hard to believe.

While I was writing this speech, a man from Burton-on-Trent telephoned me. He had been self-employed for a long time, and unemployed for 12 months. This morning he received a letter announcing that he was now to be removed from the unemployment register. He wanted to remain on the register, but was told that he could not. He was told that his insurance benefits would not be affected. Presumably, because he has now reached the age of 60, the authorities believed that they would not be able to find a job for him. The letter made no reference to job clubs or any other scheme that might improve his prospects of employment. People are being removed from the register against their wishes, day in, day out.

A further fiddle is now in progress. Civil servants have been instructed that when they interview someone leaving a restart or other scheme, if they believe that he may get a job—even if it is in six months' time—they are to mark on the records that he has a job. That is to lift the figure of people who have obtained jobs from the schemes. Fiddling of that kind goes on all the time.

The electorate understands that the Government fiddle the unemployment figures, as is clear to see. I shall turn my attention to the fiddle behind the Government's claim that 1 million jobs have been created since that magical year, 1983. We constantly hear that claim from the Government. I do not know which Government were in power between 1979 and 1983; everything seems to have happened since 1983. However, I will take the Government's starting point of 1983 and look at the reality of the figures. If the employment figures today represent a reduction in real terms of 40,000, that is welcome. However, the reality is that 1·8 million more people are unemployed now than were unemployed in 1979. Despite eight years of this Government and their "Labour isn't working" campaign, nearly 2 million more people are unemployed than in 1979—even on the fiddled figures.

Let us analyse the claim that 1 million jobs are being created. The Paymaster General has sometimes rejected the Library as a proper source of information, but, nevertheless, I invite him to listen to the figures that it has provided. From March 1983 to September 1986, 593,000 people became employees. With 445,000 self-employed people, that gives a total of over 1 million. However, one must make a number of adjustments in order to understand the real position. To a certain extent, the figures are based on double counting. It is pretty much accepted that many part-time jobs are second jobs, and the Department's evidence shows that to be the case.

If one subtracts those second jobs from the 593,000, the figure comes down to 331,000 — according to my analysis, 262,000 of the jobs are second jobs. I shall give the Minister the figures if he wants them. We should disregard people with second jobs. That is the important point. I hope we are not creating work so as to provide people with second jobs. We are concerned with taking people off the register and giving them one job, not two. Let me use an acceptable statistical practice. Of the total of 593,000 jobs, 417,000 are part-time. If we convert them into their full-time equivalents and then subtract that number from the full figure, the total of jobs is 385,000. Whichever figure one opts for, one reaches a total of about 350,000 jobs.

Let us consider the second figure of 445,000 self-employed. As the Minister knows, his Department has adjusted those statistics, too. Apparently, in the new labour force survey, the number of self-employed people is altered by 100,000.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Overnight.

Mr. Prescott: That is right. They are being changed at a stroke. Let us consider the number of self-employed people registered as paying national insurance or tax. I agree that some people may avoid paying tax or national insurance so that figure may not be the same as the figure for self-employed people as a whole. However, the figure we are given of self-employed people is 30 per cent. greater than the number actually recorded as paying national insurance. If, however, we adjust the figure of 445,000 that we have been given for self-employed people to take account only of those recorded as paying tax or national insurance, that gives us a figure in the region of 300,000.

The 1 million increase in jobs claimed by the Government is, in fact, nearer to 600,000. That is another fiddle by the Government as they massage the figures for the jobs that they say that they have created since 1983.

I know that there may be some confusion among the electorate about the statistical arguments, but there is no doubt about the direction—for unemployment figures it is always downwards, whereas for the number of jobs it is always upwards. That is the effect of the Government's policies. They are policies for adjusting and playing with the figures rather than for creating work. That is our argument against the Government.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the Shadow Chancellor's statement that, if the Labour party came to power, it would make no change in the way in which unemployment statistics are collated?

Mr. Prescott: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me a chance to make that absolutely clear. We have made clear that our job contribution will be on the registered figures. We have no desire to change them and, in any case, if we were to change them at all the first accusation that would be made when the present Government were in opposition would be that we were beginning to change and fiddle the figures. So we shall be measured by the same criteria as the Government, who say that we cannot reduce unemployment. We cannot continue to have arguments about the dishonesty of the unemployment figures. We shall go back to a system that is comparable to that of other European countries. We shall introduce a consultative document so that, over a period of time and after proper public debate, we may begin to put some honesty into the unemployment figures.

The basis of calculation of the unemployment figures will not be changed within the two-year period that we have set ourselves to measure. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) for raising that point. I shall tell him why we shall be able to put honesty in those figures. We shall go back to putting up the 2,000 more houses a week that we were building before he as Housing Minister embarked on cutting the number and putting the work force on the dole. It is in that particular area of housing that the greatest need exists. It is by helping in that area that we can take off the register people who are languishing there. With the capital we can put them to work and so begin to meet the need for houses. It could not have been a more appropriate hon. Member to have raised that point.

This Budget, whatever is claimed for it in the way of its financial prudence, has nothing to do with jobs. However, one thing is clear: there will be no more doubt about the availability of money. Money is washing about. Money will come from the sale of the British Petroleum shares. There will be extra taxes from corporations, further privatisation, the credit boom. No one has any doubts about £6 billion being available if the Government want to use it. Our argument is concerned not with where the money comes from or with the borrowing requirement, but with how the money is used and what the priorities are. That is the clear issue and it is what the Chancellor has now proposed. So let us be absolutely clear that the money is available.

Our priority is to get people back to work, and to put into the training schemes the quality necessary to make them proper training schemes. In both those areas, we are spelling out our intentions in a way that no other party has done. One plan was launched today, the document on training. It puts to the electorate our arguments on how we can begin to get our people back to work by creating not only the jobs but the training required.

The Paymaster General has constantly asked us where our job programmes are and what the quality of our training will be. He has asked whether it will be any different from what his Government are doing. Our plans are now being spelt out and the Paymaster General can judge for himself. What is rather curious, after all the cries that I have heard from the right hon. and learned Gentleman outside the House about our lack of a detailed jobs package, is that he has done little about making a direct attack on the content of our proposals. I would have expected him to do that.

Our proposals consider the kind of jobs that we shall create, 1 million jobs in a two-year period. We identify the jobs and the real needs. We shall provide real services. We believe that a major contribution can be made in those areas. I can give only a summary now, but the documents are available for hon. Members if they want to look at them, and there has been quite a bit of publicity about them.

I do not think that the Paymaster General would deny that it is possible to get jobs from an improved housing programme. If the Government choose not to use the money on public housing, that is their decision. We shall change their priorities and revamp the housing programme. We know that there is a good deal more room for investment in the railways and other parts of the infrastructure. Those needs have been catalogued so often that they do not have to be argued today. The question is whether people have the resources and are prepared to use them to meet the needs and make the jobs. In that area alone, in stimulating capital investment, we have made clear that 250,000 jobs would be created in both public and private sectors. The Paymaster General tells us about the quality of services. He thinks that the only difference between us is that while we would put money into education we are not concerned about the pupils, according to him. Of course we are concerned about the pupils, just as we are concerned about the hospital service and about a number of public areas where we can invest money and create jobs and reverse the Government's policy.

I say the Government's policy because one of the prime purposes of the cash controls has been to throw people out of work. The Treasury's own rules discriminate against public sector industries which do not carry out labour-intensive investments even though they are profitable. The chairman of any nationalised industry would say the same. That is because the Treasury has ruled that each year there must be a reduction in the real cost of labour. So these bodies concentrate on capital investment rather than on labour investment even though both are profitable. It seems right to us to change those rules in order that we may carry out the kind of capital investment programme which puts a greater accent on jobs. We can discount the argument of the Paymaster General about two postmen on one job. I notice that the Post Office has increased the number of jobs by 5,000, and it has not led to a charge against the Post Office that it is inflating the labour force of a nationalised industry. The Post Office is doing a good job, meeting a need, providing a service. That is the very argument that we would use for both the public and the private sectors. The quality of the services is quite critical.

We make proposals about economic enterprise jobs and investment in manufacturing. We identify in a costed way the number of jobs available—250,000. Our programme has now been subjected to a number of computer models. I am sure it has even been tried on the Treasury model. If the Treasury model were to show that it did not work, I am sure that the Paymaster General would have been here, showing us precisely how it did not work, asking for it to be rejected and subjecting it to ridicule. But we have heard none of that. We have had the exposure of figures apparently trumped up by the Chief Secretary, who is constantly finding all sorts of proposals on which to put figures. We have proposals to create a million jobs, and these proposals are open to examination.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West) rose——

Mr. Prescott: No, I am sorry, I cannot give way. I have not enough time.

One of our proposals deals with skill training. We envisage not piecemeal schemes but the development of training in a coherent national training programme, providing 300,000 places. Today we have spelt out the kinds of training programmes that we believe to be necessary. There could not be a starker difference between the attitude of the Government and that of the Opposition. The attitude of the Government in this area was determined in 1982 by the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) who, when Secretary of State for Employment, told us that we could get more training done if we left it to voluntary schemes. He dismantled the statutory boards. He got rid of 16 of them and did away with the bureaucracy. He said that if we gave the employers more money they would produce more training and skilled places. We all know that to have been a fraud, to have been wrong. We all know now from the Chancellor's own report and from the report by the National Economic Development Council that we are desperately short of skills in every area. Every employers' organisation tells us that daily. They say that we cannot put even the unskilled to work in the building industry because we are desperately short of the most traditional skills. In many ways, the youth training scheme, particularly in construction industry training, has undermined the full-time skills because there has been a concentration on producing half-trained people rather than the fully trained people who need more than two years' training.

Perhaps the classic example is that only last week in the House of Commons the engineering industry training board actually asked the House to double the levy on its industry or remove the exemptions in order to rescue it from a crisis which it currently faces. While its levy should give it an income of £166 million, it receives only £9 million because 95 per cent. of the companies have been exempted from paying. Our skill training in this country is undermined by all the free riders who are not prepared to provide the money for training. When I hear the Paymaster General being asked to put a levy on small companies, I point out that the cut-off rate under the engineering training board is 40 employees. So 95 per cent. of companies are exempted from paying any kind of levy or doing that kind of training. We feel that that is unacceptable. All engineering firms have a responsibility to pay towards the cost of training.

Let me make it clear that we intend to build on the excellence already available. We intend to fill the empty training places that we have at present. There are hundreds of them in the engineering industry and big opportunities in British Rail who have cut back on skilled jobs, as in British Rail Engineering Ltd. There are many places available. Some of the nine Manpower Services Commission centres are available because they are still empty. We will open them up on day one; we will take the trainers off the dole and we will fund programmes of training. Even if we double our target programme, we shall not have started to compare with what our European competitors are doing. We hope in 10 years to begin to develop a training programme that will reskill our people and improve on the figures shown in the Paymaster General's survey. Only 10 per cent. of our work force is given training compared to 70 per cent. of the work forces of most of our competitors.

Apart from workers, we have the worst trained labour management of many countries. Managers are denied the opportunity of proper training because companies will not give priority to it. Our programmes are designed to bring more training to the place of work. We shall require companies to publish audits of what has been done. It is deplorable that we do not know how many skills we produced in 1985. That is one of the first problems we see when we begin to study the problem. So there will be a requirement to show what the skills are. There will be a national training fund to which all companies will be expected to contribute. It will be financed by a combination of grants and levies.

Before the Paymaster General jumps in, may I draw to his attention a press release which I got today from the construction industry training board? Apparently under its levy system — one imposed by the Government — construction firms paid £47 million in levy but they got back from the Government £67 million. The taxpayer is carrying the major burden of whatever skill training is taking place, and industry does not pay anywhere near its fair share. In other developed economies industry pays three to five times more than is paid in Britain. That is wholly unacceptable. [Interruption.]

I will answer the Paymaster General in his own terms. He knows that the Manpower Services Commission is examining precisely what is spent on training, and how the funding of training might be organised more effectively. That report should have been out before the election. It is a pity that it will not be because the Government would have had to face up to their responsibility to train people. I believe the report is to come out in the autumn. We shall take account of that study when it is published.

We are not apologetic about our view that if we are to change radically the skill content of the labour force, which is the least-trained labour force of the developed economies, we will all have to make a contribution. The Chancellor and industry will have to contribute. Industry will have to pay more. The exemption rule has been a means by which people have avoided their responsibility. Our announcement today about training programmes provides the alternative.

This Budget is in no way a solution to our problems. It is a Budget for the better off at the expense of the less well off. It is a Budget for those in employment, not for the unemployed. It is a Budget for wealth, not wealth creation. It is a Budget for short-term electoral gain, not a long-term solution to our problems. These will be the issues at the next election. We will gladly join battle on them, defeat the Government and return to begin to make the changes that are necessary.

5.33 pm

Sir Barney Hayhoe (Brentford and Isleworth): As I listened to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) I thought that perhaps there might have been some justification for his speech if he had made it about a year ago when regrettably unemployment was still rising. But on a day when we have had the welcome and encouraging news that the trend of unemployment has been firmly downwards for seven months and that unemployment is 150,000 lower than in the middle of last year, it seemed inappropriate for the hon. Gentleman to make most of that speech. What is clear is that the downward trend of unemployment, which is good news for the country, is bad news for the Opposition.

The Opposition reaction to these encouraging figures seemed sour, carping and nit-picking. There was nothing much new in what the hon. Gentleman said about the alternative policies that he will place before the electorate. I venture the view that those policies will be judged by the electorate as irrelevant to the real problems facing the country when the election comes, whether it be later this year or next, just as the policies put forward in 1983 by the leaders of the Labour party were judged irrelevant.

As a Treasury Minister I was involved in the construction of four Budgets. Inevitably, as would be confirmed by anyone with that experience, whether in my party or in the Labour party, Treasury Ministers are not agreed on every single detail in a Budget. But once the Budget has been agreed, collective responsibility applies, and one supports the judgments that have been made and carries them through in the detailed consideration of the Finance Bill both on the Floor of the House and in Committee. Now, of course, I am free to express the personal preferences which in the past one had to do behind closed doors with the limited numbers within the Treasury who were privy to the Budget discussions. Now a certain welcome freedom has come upon me, but I must be careful about how I use it.

As I listened to the Chancellor, the fundamental point that he was putting to the country and to the House seemed to be the strength of the British economy. If I take only one aspect, the staggering figure of £110 billion that is in the Red Book and was referred to by the Chancellor in his speech as the totality of the country's overseas assets is 28 per cent. of our GDP. Considered in that way, it is four times the percentage of GDP represented by overseas assets when we came to office. That shows the great improvement during the last eight years.

The oil revenues have not been frittered away, as the Opposition so often claim. Those revenues have contributed to the increased investment overseas. The income from those investments, already running at about £5,000 million a year, will steadily increase and will continue to flow long after the oil is finished and long after all of us, and perhaps our sons and grandsons, have gone. Those investments overseas, which have resulted from balance of payments surpluses, from North sea oil and from the removal of exchange control, will prove to be of great value for future generations.

Yet the Leader of the Opposition, in his rather curious and extended immediate reaction to the Budget, said that those investments represented a loss of about £70 billion net over the past eight years. So investment overseas, which is bringing a steady return, is described by the Leader of the Opposition as a loss to the country. Such curious economic thinking perhaps explains the over-emphasis of the Opposition on the problem of our balance of payments. No doubt Opposition Members look back to the traumatic time of the visitation from the IMF and see any flutter in the balance of payments as dangerous. However, the strength that we have now built up in the economy gives us the possibility of being able to deal with balance of payments difficulties in a way which was certainly not open to the Labour Government.

Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury referred to the happy trio of higher public spending, less borrowing and lower taxes. My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General spoke in similar terms today. Hindsight gives a somewhat spurious sense of harmony. A substantial chunk of the higher public spending announced in the autumn statement was for local government. That showed that the Government recognised the realities of local government expenditure in a way that had not happened previously. The public expenditure White Paper shows that for 1986-87 the estimated outturn is now about £3 billion more than it was in the plans that were published over a year ago.

I am happy with this increased realism about local authority expenditure, and I welcome the extra expenditure on health and education that was announced in the autumn statement. However, I suspect that those additions were the absolute minimum that were judged to be required by the star chamber, the Cabinet or whoever reached the final decisions, to avoid very real difficulties, and to give some scope for developing services.

Those public expenditure decisions were taken last autumn when, as the Chancellor made clear, his judgment was that there was little room for tax cuts, and, as I assume must have been true, the forecasts that were available to the Treasury were not predicting the substantial undershooting of the PSBR of which we are now aware. If the favourable tax take and borrowing figures had been known then, I wonder whether any extra spending might have seemed reasonable in that more relaxed financial atmosphere. As I believe that some extra spending, although not a great deal, might have been proper and reasonable in those circumstances, I was somewhat disappointed that absolutely nothing new was announced in the Budget.

Hon. Members from all parties will have their own suggestions about what might have been done. I know that pensioners and those who are largely, but not wholly, dependent on the state pension see people in employment increasing their standards of living much faster than they. There is certainly an argument that there should be something extra—out of the national cake, to use an old analogy—devoted to increasing those people's standards of living. It may still be open to the Government to announce that, instead of the Christmas bonus being £10, this year it could perhaps be £25. I am sure that, within the arithmetic of the Budget, such additional expenditure would not cause repercussions in the markets or undue difficulties across the exchanges.

There was a letter in The Times today about research council expenditure. Although small sums of money are involved, it seems that the extra salary increases that have been agreed, presumably by the Department of Education and Science and not by the research councils individually, will have to be met by the research councils out of their total research budgets. Therefore, they have to cut down on research to pay for those salary increases. As relatively small sums are involved, I suggest and hope that the Treasury will be prepared to look sympathetically upon the arguments that, presumably, will be put to it by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science who, I have little doubt, will seek Treasury approval to make some adjustment so that cuts in research projects will not be necessary.

Having said something about pay, I now refer to the welcome increased spending on the National Health Service. In real terms, it has increased in the current year as compared with the previous year and is planned to increase again by 2·8 per cent., in real terms, in the coming year. That is welcome, but there could be problems about pay. I want to say absolutely nothing today that could have any effect on the pay negotiations that are now taking place for the Civil Service and those that are undoubtedly beginning for other parts of the public services.

However, the real benefits of those increases to the NHS could, at least in part, be dissipated if the review body awards and the pay settlements negotiated in the coming months are higher than those budgeted for in the amounts which have gone to the regions and the district health authorities. Last year, some account was taken of the awards made by the review body and adjustments were made which made it pretty well certain that, across the country, there would be no cuts in services as a result of the Government's decisions about the review body's recommendations. Again, I believe the arithmetic of this Budget should allow a similar approach to be followed later this year.

Having suggested some extra spending, it behoves me to speak instantly about extra revenue. I was disappointed that the tax on cigarettes was not indexed or increased by a little more than indexation. There are powerful arguments for increasing the tax on cigarettes not by a swingeing amount, but at least by an indexed increase or a little more. That would have provided valuable additional resources which could have been deployed in some of the ways that I have suggested.

I know that this territory belongs within the Treasury, to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who will reply tonight. I do not expect him to reveal the advice that he gave, but I hope that he will register my disappointment, as someone who has shared and held his responsibilities for indirect taxation, that that opportunity was missed. Of course I understand the RPI effect which is pretty small in relation to cigarettes, and also the headline effect of increasing that tax. I am not quite sure whether it was the RPI or the headline effect which dominated the Chancellor's thinking. However, I should have preferred that tax to have been increased.

I should like, briefly, to congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister of State on the changes in the VAT regime. He has succeeded in doing what I failed to do when I held that job. Although we managed to make some helpful provisions for those traders who were being charged tax on money that they had not received—we made some changes in that direction—I welcome the much more effective action that my hon. Friend is now proposing. I hope we shall see that fully implemented in the Finance Bill later this year.

There is much else that is good in the Budget and in the Budget speech. Perhaps I should refer, at least in passing, to the burial of M3. I do so as one who never worshipped at that particular shrine and always regarded that idol, if not as false, then at least as sometimes giving false signs which, if followed slavishly, would lead to unnecessary difficulties in the economy. It was good to see M3 buried. I suppose that the funeral oration given by the Governor of the Bank of England in Loughborough, to which the Chancellor drew our attention, was a proper way for it to depart from the dominance that it used to hold in some thinking.

Tax cuts are generally popular and the welcome cut in the standard rate of income tax is no exception. My one regret is that ways were not found within the context of cutting direct taxation to improve the incentive differentially for the low-paid. More should be done about the poverty trap, the employment trap and the perceived surcharge on the low paid as they move out of benefits into taxation. That would encourage that element within society. When the Inland Revenue is fully computerised and there is closer interaction between what it does and national insurance contributions, other possibilities may appear through which differential arrangements along those lines can be achieved.

I welcome the downward pressure on interest rates that the Budget has produced. I support the cautious and prudent action of the Chancellor towards both interest rates and his overall Budget judgement. The central theme of the Government's case in this debate, and in May or June or whenever the election comes, is the growing strength of the British economy. Today's good news about lower unemployment augurs well for the future and I applaud the Government and the British people for all that they hve contributed to that success.

5.52 pm

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): It is good to hear the right hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe) making such excellent use of his new-found freedom. I doubt whether many hon. Members have heard the burial of the dead commemorated with such a sensitive, gentle touch as his fond farewell to sterling M3. He also followed my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) who yesterday made almost identical comments on the dangerous meanness of the research budgets. I hope that constant reiteration of that point, bearing in mind the modest sums involved, will penetrate the skulls of those on the Treasury Bench.

I must differ from the right hon. Gentleman on one point. The ramshackle system of Government accounting enabled him to pick out one capital item—the welcome replenishment of our overseas assets—for commendation. If we had a national balance sheet in an appropriate form, as we should have, it would be revealed that, while overseas assets have been piling up, public assets at home have been losing their value. There is a signpost to that—nothing like as much information as there should be—on page 27 of the Red Book. An important table on gross fixed domestic capital formation—in other words, the Government's stewardship of our public assets—shows that the figure for domestic capital formation by business during 1986 was the negative figure of minus £3 billion. That is an astonishing report for a country which must shortly face a future without any more family silver to sell and with much depleted revenues from North sea oil. The Government's record on their stewardship of capital assets on that count is negative.

A Chancellor with a proper sense of reality would have felt obliged this year to budget not for one nation, but for two. The two nations which are widely agreed to exist are not to be distinguished geographically, because there are two nations to be found within each region. They are the two nations of the relatively prosperous—good luck to them — and the seriously deprived. That was well encompassed by one radio listener north of the Trent who listened to the Budget speech and was interviewed about what he thought of it. He simply said with northern brevity, "That is not a country I recognise. I simply do not know the Britain that the Chancellor is talking about." Indeed that must be so. I shall take only two items from many which illustrate the difference between the two nations and the gap that is still widening.

As hon. Members will know, the constrast in unemployment figures is enormous. On a county basis, to use one measure, Berkshire has about 6·6 per cent. of its work force unemployed and falling and Hertfordshire has 6·8 per cent. and falling. There are several areas like them where it would be dangerous for the Government to apply strongly expansionary measures because soon skill shortages would become acute, wages would overheat and inflation would get under way. At the other end of the scale — this illustrates the fact that the divide is not geographical — the county of Cleveland has 20·8 per cent. of its work force unemployed and Cornwall has 19·7 per cent. In other words, three times as many of the work force are unemployed in some parts as in others.

We in the alliance believe that that must be recognised. That is why under our proposals, which the Paymaster General could not be bothered to distinguish from the proposals of the Labour segment of the Opposition, employers' national insurance contributions would be reduced by 25 per cent. in travel-to-work areas of above average unemployment. That would be a targeted measure. Clearly, the tax on jobs should not be applied with the same vigour in areas of high unemployment as in areas approaching something near to full employment.

In the same way we have proposed a recruitment incentive in the black spots to employers who are willing to increase the total of their labour force by recruiting specifically from the ranks of the long-term unemployed. The Paymaster General was eloquent today about the various splendid schemes over which he presides. I am not here to denigrate them, although I deprecate the exaggeration of their benefits. I speak for many people when I say that it is disappointing that, of the long-term unemployed, who are surely the worst victims of the Government's deliberate policies, only about one in five can find a place on any of the Government's schemes. I am wholly in favour of their being invited to join properly run job clubs and so on, but only the most resilient in the best of health with a positive attitude and a good deal of luck can eventually return to employment without some assistance with repairing their rusty skills or learning new ones, or generally with readapting themselves to the habits and needs of regular work.

I regard this Government as neglectful of the interests of the great majority of the long-term unemployed for whom we believe special measures should be targeted. The Paymaster General was in his customary brazen form in saying how virtuous was the Government's conversion to higher public expenditure and abandonment of its boasted medium-term strategy in favour of more public spending because of the approach of some national event, which it is apparently sacrilege to mention. The Paymaster General was brazen in suggesting that this is the work of reformed characters because it is all going to be properly paid for.

That comes from a representative of a Government who are still—and at an accelerating pace—selling off the family silver, as we learnt last night in the Budget debate. We had been told of a figure of £5 billion asset sales in the Red Book and we were given last night an additional figure for British Petroleum which makes it even more substantial. Whatever the figure—I hope we shall be given some total when the Minister winds up tonight—there is not much more family silver left to sell off. That circumstance makes it quite attractive to be retiring from the House at the end of this Parliament. The problems facing whichever party or combination of parties comes to government will be all the more horrendous because of the profligate depletion of the national capital.

The second source of bumper revenue — I am surprised that the Paymaster General could mention this without a blush—arises from the enormously increased yield on corporation tax, being far more than the Treasury estimate, mainly because business unfortunately has not been investing, and therefore the capital allowances against corporation tax have been phenomenally modest, and disgracefully so. I do not see why the Government should take credit from a yield of corporation tax which arose from failure to invest.

Finally, the bonanza of huge VAT revenues from the credit boom—about which the Treasury and Ministers are strangely silent—must cause them a great deal of worry. That said, we welcome the partial conversion of the Government to higher public expenditure, to targeting the exchange rate, which we have been urging for the past seven years, and for the demise of the ridiculous sterling M3. That is to their credit, but it is regrettable that it is so late in the day.

Criticism has been made of the alliance plans by no less distinguished a Liberal than Samuel Brittan in today's Financial Times. He seems to think that it is very illiberal of the alliance to be complaining that public expenditure is only to be about 43 per cent. of GDP. This criticism, like that of the hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth, ignores the difference between current expenditure and capital. The extra public expenditure which the alliance is pleading for—and would wish to have the opportunity to implement—is on the capital side: in other words refurbishing, rehabilitating and modernising our public assets, buildings and plant which have been so neglected in recent years by false economy.

Whether liberal-minded people like it or not, the state does own all these assets. To say that we should not spend money on keeping our assets in proper repair is rather like the owner of a house, which he does not enjoy very much and which he would prefer to be very different, saying "I hate this house, so I shall not repair the roof or rebuild the windows. I will let the place go to rack and ruin because I do not very much like it."

Whether we like it or not, the state has these assets and therefore has a duty to spend more on capital account to keep them in repair. Very soon the Government, of whatever complexion, have to face the fact that some of the great temporary bonanza of the last decade is rapidly coming to an end and we shall have to earn our own living without so much assistance from providence. Our objection to this Budget and to the income tax basic rate cuts, against which we shall vote on Monday, is that the Budget does nothing to prepare this country for having to earn its living in a much harsher climate.

6.5 pm

Mr. George Gardiner (Reigate): I listened with some interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright). He is a senior and respected Member of this House but, if he will forgive me, I will not follow his remarks in any detail since they suggested that he—and certainly his party—learned very little from our collective experience of the past 15 years and even less from the period 10 years ago next week when we had all the benefits of a hung Parliament and he and his colleagues were sustaining a Socialist Government in office.

Mr. Wainwright: The golden age.

Mr. Gardiner: The golden age—we have to remember that.

I join my hon. Friends in congratulating the Chancellor on his Budget. When we look at the British economy in 1987, with growth higher than in any other major European country, with low inflation, increasing output, growing profits, expanding investment, rising living standards—and now unemployment turning downwards—we can afford to smile at all the predictions of doom and disaster that have come so regularly from the shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley).

Yesterday he was at it again, but finding it even more difficult to make his gloomy forecasts stick. He is like the small boy who has cried wolf a few times too often. But even that was not so bizarre as the advice offered to the Chancellor on the very eve of his Budget by four men who served as economic advisers to previous post-war Governments—architects from the years of decline and failure presuming to lecture those who are achieving expansion and success.

The Chancellor and his predecessor have together managed to create what might be called a virtuous circle because the economy is now on such a sound footing. Exchequer revenues are buoyant, thus enabling the Chancellor to increase public spending in priority areas like education and health, as he did last autumn, and cut income tax, and cut Government borrowing and so ease interest rates downwards — all these things in turn strengthening our economy still further.

I specially commend the Chancellor for cutting the standard rate of income tax to 27p in the pound, so increasing take-home pay for the man on average earnings by £3 a week. The shadow Chancellor has committed himself to clawing this back if he ever gets a chance. [Interruption.] I can understand the increasing irrascibility of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott).

There was a time when Labour could genuinely claim to be the party of the working man, but alas no more. The moment that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook came to introduce his first Budget—an emergency Budget no doubt, and the first of many at six-monthly intervals—the worker on average earnings would immediately be £3 a week worse off, and we all know that this would be the first down payment on the heavy price he would have to pay for a Socialist Government. Meanwhile, the alliance parties are in a world of their own—voting against tax cuts, yet accepting them once they are in the voters' pockets, so staying true to their reputation as the party of all things to all men.

The Chancellor's reduction of the standard rate to 27p still leaves him short of our 25p target. I do not criticise him for that. Given the re-election of a Conservative Government, we should see the 25p target reached early in the life of the new Parliament. I believe that my right hon. Friend and his colleagues should start thinking further ahead than that. Targets are important as an expression of the ideal society that we are seeking to achieve for our people. The 25p standard rate should not and must not be the limit of our ambitions. Our aim should be a standard rate of 20p in the pound by the end of the next Parliament. That would leave more of the money that people earn in their pockets and give them more freedom to make decisions concerning theirs and their families' futures. We should not stop there.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Red Book for this year shows the sale of assets to the value of up to £5 billion? Yesterday we heard of the further sale of assets—the BP shares—which will perhaps fetch up to £5 billion on the open market. Will the extra 2p reduction, necessary to achieve the 25p rate, be declared in an emergency Budget after the election and will it come from the sale of this asset?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not drawing up the future Chancellor's Budget. If the hon. Gentleman will listen to my further remarks, he will discover how a great many of those on average earnings — once upon a time they might have been regarded as Labour supporters — welcome the disposal of the assets to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

We should not rest content with the sole target of a standard rate of 20p in the pound. Indeed, I believe that the time has come for a thorough review of our direct tax system and that should take place in the life of the next Parliament.

I am sorry that this year, although the Chancellor has cut the standard rate, he has not had room to cut the tax rates at the higher levels—that must be a priority in the next Parliament. However much the shadow Chancellor may scoff, there is ample evidence—as the Paymaster General told us today—that cuts in the higher rate of taxes would lead to an increase in revenue from higher earners. Indeed, if the shadow Chancellor wants to raise an extra £3·5 billion through taxing the rich, he should think about cutting their tax rates rather than raising them. That is the only conclusion to be drawn from the experience in Britain, following the cuts in the punitive top tax rates inherited by the Government, and based on the experience in the United States.

I commend The Sunday Times for the lead it has taken in making clear to its readers the advantage of cutting the top tax rate. That point has also been made by Professor Patrick Minford of Liverpool university. The Wall Street Journal has noted:

> "In Britain as in the United States, reductions in top marginal rates are not a sop to the rich. They are an incentive to participate in the economy. They do not cost the government revenues; they gain revenues."

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): That is based on no evidence.

Mr. Gardiner: There is ample evidence.

We must also consider cutting our top tax rates to bring them more closely into line with our competitor countries in the West. It is a sobering thought that, next year, the top tax rate in the United States will be just 1 per cent. higher than the lowest tax rate in this country. Our top tax earners will pay a marginal rate of 60 per cent. compared to the United States' rate of 28 per cent. Our most successful managers, top researchers and commercial creators are highly mobile and we will not keep them in this country if they are clobbered for taxes in this way.

I see a further target for our Chancellor in the next Parliament—the standard rate of tax should be 20 per cent., the marginal rate should be 30 per cent. for a wide band of high earners and there should be a rate of 40 per cent. for those at the very top of the earning table. In that way we will create a still more vigorous, enterprising and flexible economy.

A further matter on which I wish to congratulate the Chancellor and urge him to project his policies is his encouragement for the expansion of the share-owning democracy. Unlike the hon. Member for Colne Valley, I welcome the news that the remainder of BP is to be privatised and is to be added to the sale of British Airways and Rolls-Royce in the immediate programme. There are now 8·5 million individual shareholders in Britain — three times as many as in 1979.

Let us consider two figures set alongside each other —8·5 million individual shareholders and 10·75 million trade union members. Let us ponder the significant social change that is implied by those figures and by the narrowing gap between them. They are not, of course, totally separate groups, not the two nations as the Opposition would have us believe; they overlap heavily. Thanks to the popular privatisation exercises, vast numbers of today's trade unionists have become direct owners sharing in the wealth of our country and, at the same time, we have given them more control over their unions. That is what responsible society means. I hope that the Chancellor and his colleagues will carry those policies a lot further with more popular flotations of our remaining state industries.

In the next Parliament I look forward to the privatisation of electricity generation and distribution—preferably not in one monolithic unit, but in competing ones. I look forward to the privatisation of substantial sections of our coal industry with certain pits sold together with the generating stations that they serve. I look forward to the privatisation of the Post Office with counter services taken to more, not fewer, sub-post offices.

I urge the Chancellor and his colleagues to build upon their achievements and to set those targets for us very soon. That will point the way to the even stronger economy and freer society that we seek.

6.16 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): This year the Treasury is awash with money. It has had £6 billion to "give away". That has meant a £3 billion cut in the already low public borrowing requirement to keep the City sweet, and some £3 billion in tax cuts. The figure of £6 billion is interesting and significant because it is the entire cost of Labour's plan to create one million jobs. So the question for the Labour party is not where the money is coming from, but where the money is going to.

[Mr. Ron Leighton]

Where that money has come from is not a sign of virtue or success. First, it has come from the pre-election credit-financed consumer boom, based on imports from abroad, and on which the Treasury levies VAT. Thus there has been an increase in those VAT receipts. Secondly, there has been the selling-off of public assets — as Lord Stockton described it, "the family silver." British Gas, British Telecom and British Airways have gone and now we are told British Petroleum is to go. This represents the selling-off of the nation's capital. It is using the proceeds for revenue and it is rather like selling the furniture to pay the rent—a disreputable rake's progress. That will raise some £5 billion per annum and will be used to bribe the voters with their own money.

There is nothing virtuous about how the Chancellor has got this money into his hands. However, he could have used it to help those in desperate need. Instead the Chancellor and the Government have cynically targeted their largesse upon those whom they want to induce to vote Conservative at the next election. There is nothing in the Budget for the homeless, nothing on pensions for the elderly, nothing on child benefit for families, and nothing for the 8 million living in poverty, nor for the millions of unemployed. Why is there nothing for them? The Chancellor has written off the unemployed and the poor because he does not expect votes from them. He is widening the gap between the haves and the have nots. The Government hope that there will be enough haves to vote Conservative at the next election. It is as simple and as evil as that.

A married man with two children, on £40,000 a year, will get a tax cut of £8·71 a week. A married man with two children on £4,000 a year, will get 86p. Of course, most of the unemployed pay no tax at all, so they do not even get those pennies. With society being so violently and cruelly divided in that way, it is no surprise to me that the crime rate rises so rapidly under the Conservatives.

While the family silver is sold off to finance the Conservative's pre-election conjuring trick, the real economy has been crippled. After eight years of Conservative Government, unemployment is 2 million higher than it was in 1979; manufacturing output is still less now than in 1979—in other words, we have gone backwards; investment is one fifth lower than in 1979, and that is cumulative; we have a huge balance of trade deficit, which is growing every year; and we have a deficit on our trade in manufactured goods for the first time.

The colossal bonanza of North sea oil revenue has all been dissipated, with hardly anything to show for it. It has all been wasted on paying £20 billion a year to finance the dole queue. Any definition of success that allows mass unemployment is not recognised by me. I have heard nothing in the Budget that helps the unemployed. There was not even a pretence this year that it was a Budget for jobs. The Government's only policy for the unemployed is restart, although we did not hear much about that today.

I am in favour of contact with the long-term unemployed. I was critical when the Government gave up contact with the unemployed in 1982. That was because, in 1980 and 1981, they created so many unemployed that they thought that there was no point in keeping contact because they had nothing to offer them. So I should like to look at the restart programme. I have a copy of the tutors guide to the programme. It conspires to suggest to the unemployed that their unemployment is really their own fault. The guide says at the beginning that the course is "a very first step in becoming competitive in the labour market."

It is as if those people were unemployed because they were uncompetitive. The guide continues:

"It is designed to engender sufficient feelings of confidence and well-being for participants to believe that they are capable".

Why did those people become unemployed in the first place? Not because they were incapable or had no confidence. They became unemployed because they were made redundant or because, when they left school, no jobs were available to them.

The note to the tutor for day 2 of the course says

"It has been suggested that a session on 'healthy eating on a limited income' could be an appropriate part of this programme."

In other words, those people are to be reconciled to their poverty. That is what the restart programme seems to be about. That reminds me that during the war I heard a story of a meeting when Lady Bountiful came along and explained to the poor people how to make a nourishing meal out of a cod's head. The Socialist at the back of the hall asked, "Who had the rest of the cod?" That is the question that some of the unemployed might ask at present.

The guide says that on day 2 the unemployed have to submit to personal stocktaking. Session 4 deals with strengths and weaknesses. The unemployed have to submit to a strengths checklist. I should like to read part of the list to the House. I hope that hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members, will pay attention. I wonder how many Conservative Members have these personal strengths. These are the questions that the unemployed are supposed to ask themselves:

"Am I honest, determined, patient, alert, friendly, happy, humorous, generous, caring, gentle, fit, considerate, genuine, skilled, sensible, capable of initiative, energetic? Am I bright, smart, cheerful, positive, trusting and trustworthy? What other personal qualities do I have? What other strengths do I have which are not included in this checklist?"

I wonder how many of those qualities the Paymaster General would have. I think that we have ruled him out straight away.

I am all in favour of training. I am greatly in favour of an increased training programme. Where a training programme is badly needed is on the Treasury Front Bench. On day 5, in session 4, the guide says:

"What we will do is to fix a large sheet of paper to each person's back (demonstrate)"— they have to be shown how that is done—

"and collect a felt tip pen."

So everyone gets his piece of paper and his felt tip pen. The guide continues:

"Then for 10 minutes we will walk round the room looking at people and then writing on their sheets any positive thought or feeling we may have had about them at any stage (ie anything good we have noticed about them)."

If the Paymaster General were here, and we stuck a piece of paper on his back, I could not think of anything positive to write about him. I could think of some things to write, but they would not be polite. I have some sense of the decorum of this place, so I shall not mention them.

Originally 30 per cent. of the participants of restart were supposed to go on those courses. That was revised down to 15 per cent. in 1986 because people did not want to go on them. In East Ham, which is in my constituency, only 8 per cent. went on them.

We have here the results of the pilot initiative. I should like to look at what actually happened. A letter was sent to every one of the long-term unemployed. The last sentence was rather heavy:

"Please note that if you do not keep this appointment or give a good reason why you were unable to keep it, the Unemployment Benefit Office will be told."

Oh dear. The letter says that that "may result in a loss of entitlement to unemployment benefit".

That is what those people were told. How is that for frighteners to start with? The people conducting the interviews told me that for the first 10 minutes they have to reassure the clients who come along that it is not a punitive exercise. How long do they have for an interview? The Paymaster General told me some months ago that it was an hour, but it is not—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] He is not here. He is checking up on his personal strengths.

The time for the interview is down to 25 minutes, so half that brief period is spent just reassuring people that they are not to be penalised.

What is the purpose of restart? How are we to judge it? Paragraph 1.1 of the report on the pilot initiative says that the aim is "to offer them either a job or an opportunity in one of a range of different programmes".

If that is not clear enough, paragraph 3.3 says:

"The counselling initiative was a programme aimed at helping long term unemployed people find a job".

That is what it is about—finding a job. That is how we have to judge the programme. The pilot projects were set up in "suitable areas". What is a "suitable area"? It is one with a skillcentre. But we know that the Government have been shutting down skillcentres. In other words, the pilot projects will get a better response than the rest. According to the people who dreamed up the scheme, a skillcentre is essential, but the Government have been shutting them down.

The restart courses are intended to rebuild confidence and improve people's ability to manage on limited resources. Another objective of restart is to help participants

"make more effective and enjoyable use of their time."

In other words, people are not going to get a job and will be unemployed so they must learn how to make more effective and enjoyable use of their time. They should not expect a job; rather they should make more effective and enjoyable use of their time because they will remain unemployed for a long time. That is what people are taught on the pilot projects.

One of the items on the restart menu is jobstart. That is an allowance of £20 a week for up to six months to take a low paid job. I have visited my jobcentre and I am certain that some Conservative Members who are interested in these matters will have visited their jobcentres as well. I onlywas told by the staff at my jobcentre that jobstart was "monumentally unpopular".

In East Ham since 9 June there have been only five applications for jobstart and only four were accepted on the scheme. The number of people who gained places on jobstart is 84 per cent. below the national target. Jobstart has been a dismal failure. It has been pathetic, pitiful and abysmal. I am talking about the practice and what has really happened. I am not talking about theory. That is what happened in the pilot project.

Many Conservative Members—some of whom are not present this afternoon—do not believe that there are really long-term unemployed people. They believe that there are plenty of jobs available and that the so-called long-term unemployed are up to their necks in the black economy and engaging in fraud. What really happens and what have we discovered about fraud?

Paragraph 6.8 of the "Pilot Initiative to Help the Long Term Unemployed: A Report to the Manpower Services Commission" states that out of the 30,308 people who entered the pilot projects

"Only 5 cases of actual fraud ie people claiming benefit and not declaring that they were working came to light."

In other words, there was no fraud. I am sorry to disappoint Conservative Members who may have thought that there was a high incidence of fraud.

I said originally that the objective of the schemes was to provide jobs. How many jobs were provided in the pilot projects among the 30,308 clients who were called in to jobcentres? We have already heard much about jobcentres. The Paymaster General — who is absent from the Chamber—invited my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) to visit the jobcentre. We do not have to look into the crystal ball when the exact figures are available. Out of 30,308 clients, 321 people have been placed in jobs. That is 1 per cent. In my constituency, far fewer than 1 per cent. have found jobs. Those are the facts. If any hon. Member wants to contradict me and quote figures from his constituency, I would be happy to give way.

The conclusions on the pilot initiative in the report to the Manpower Services Commission published in January 1987 state:

"It is clear that one interview is not enough for most long-term unemployed people."

People are called in for about 15 minutes and are then sent for an interview. They are not asked how they got on. They are not called back in for counselling. People are brought into the jobcentre to discover whether they are engaged in fraud and to shake them off the register. However, no one cares about them. We do not want just one interview. We should be genuinely interested in the long-term unemployed and people should be brought in regularly to jobcentres for help.

The pilot project principally showed that there were no jobs available. We hear about the availability test, about the availability of the jobless for work. That is not the problem. The problem is the availability of work for the jobless.

Of course we want the restart programme. However, alongside that programme we want the programme outlined so effectively and capably by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) of 1 million jobs created in two years, so that when people come in desperate for jobs, and who want to work, we have a programme of jobs available. The sooner my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East is Secretary of State for Employment and can give help to the unemployed the better.

6.35 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): At the outset, I want to comment on the speeches that have been made by [Mr. Ian Gow]

Opposition Members. I want to start with what I consider to be the most disgraceful remark made so far in the debate. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), the shadow Chancellor, said yesterday:

"The most deplorable of all the schemes and inventions are the job clubs."—[Official Report, 18 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 951.]

I hope that the Opposition spokesman who is to reply to this debate will try to find his right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor—and that may not be a very easy task—and bring him back to the Chamber to explain which job clubs he has visited to provide the evidence upon which he based his disgraceful proposition. I will gladly give way to the right hon. Gentleman if he appears. I hope that whichever Opposition spokesman replies, he will address himself to that important point.

Reference was made in two speeches by Opposition Members to a point which is becoming old hat in this place — that the very welcome and long overdue policy of denationalisation, a policy pursued in the Budget statement and reinforced by the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury yesterday, amounts to "selling off the family silver". Those words were apparently used by my late noble Friend Lord Stockton in another place. The Opposition fail to understand, and apparently my late noble Friend also failed to understand, that the silver has gone to the British people and the silver is still there.

We have transferred bogus public ownership—that is, nationalisation—to real ownership and the assets belong to the people. I warmly welcome the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that we are to continue with the sale of BP shares. That policy was first embarked upon by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) when he was Chancellor.

You have a very accurate memory in these matters, Mr. Speaker. You will remember that it was in the famous letter dated 15 December 1976 sent by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East to Dr. Johannes Witteveen that the sale of BP shares was announced by the former Labour Government. It was announced for the purpose of reducing the public sector borrowing requirement. You will remember a later passage in that letter, Mr. Speaker, in which the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, the present shadow Foreign Secretary, said that an essential element of the Government's policy was a continuing and substantial reduction in PSBR.

Now, on 17 March 1987, some 10 years and three months after 15 December 1976, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is following that policy of abating PSBR. That policy was set out by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East. However, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is soundly rebuked by the Opposition for that policy.

The shadow Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), has described a policy which goes back to the old days when the Government borrowed what they dared not tax and printed what they could not borrow. Mercifully, those days are gone for ever so long as my right hon. Friend remains at the Treasury, as I very much hope that he will throughout the next Parliament.

In great areas of economic policy pursued with consistency, and indeed persistency, of purpose since 4 May 1979, we sought to abate inflation, to diminish the size of the public sector, to increase the competitiveness of industry, to extend ownerhsip of all kinds and to create the conditions to give our people the possibility of a sustained chance of fuller employment, an aspect to which I shall return later. It is against the parameters and targets that we set ourselves at the start of the new Conservative Government that the Budget must be seen, because it is all part of that consistent policy which, in every area — including, as today's figures confirm, the creation of prospects for fuller employment — has been a success and increasingly a perceived success.

I wish to make some modest criticism of my right hon. Friend's Budget proposals, although I am in enthusiastic agreement with their general thrust. First, I should like to say a word about monetary policy. There are now only two weapons in the Chancellor's hands to control the rate of monetary growth. I affirm that I am still one of those who believe that inflation is caused not by trade unions or oil prices, not by foreign sheikhs, or even by the European Community so dearly beloved of my hon. Friends the Members for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner) and for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell). Whatever the failings of the people who live in Brussels—I am glad to see the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) in the Chamber—I certainly do not attribute to Brussels any responsibility for inflation in the United Kingdom. Inflation is caused by Government and can be cured only by Government. It occurs when growth in the money supply exceeds growth in the supply of goods and services.

The Chancellor's two weapons to restrict and restrain monetary growth are, first, interest rates and, secondly, the level of the public sector borrowing requirement. I warmly welcome the very much lower PSBR of £4 billion for next year and I believe that it will help to restrain monetary growth. However, I have not been weaned away—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe) has been weaned away and even my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been temporarily weaned away—from sterling M3.

I therefore read without satisfaction the words on page 20 of the Red Book:

"The growth of £M3 rose to 18 per cent. in the early months of 1986-87 and has since remained at about that level. This is some 3 points above the top of its target range".

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor explained in his Budget speech why he thought that in current circumstances it would be wiser to eschew any explicit target, but I find myself in respectful disagreement. I believe that it would have been better to set a range within which our target for the growth of sterling M3 fell, although I have, alas, to concede that in recent years we have been unable to stay within the target range set either by my right hon. Friend or by his predecessor.

An important aspect to which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made only passing reference in his Budget statement is that of mobility. My right hon. Friend rightly said at column 825 of Hansard for 17 March that his proposals in relation to pensions would be "good . . . for labour mobility". Apart from the pensions difficulty to which my right hon. Friend turned his attention in the Budget, there is another highly significant obstacle to mobility. As all legislation affects the Treasury and as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, like my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General, has a key interest in mobility, I must say to my successor who is to wind up the debate today that I hope that as a high priority in the next Parliament the Government will address their mind and their legislative attention to removing the greatest single obstacle to mobility — the inability of peopel offered jobs in another part of the country to find accommodation for themselves and their families.

A significant step in that direction would be to liberalise —I say this in the presence of the right hon. Member for Hillhead—the law governing landlord and tenant. If we said that in respect of all new lettings the term of the tenancy and the rent that could be charged would be as agreed between landlord and tenant rather than as determined by the Rent Acts, I believe that a significant amount of currently unused or underused property would be brought into use and new investment would be attracted to the private rented sector. It is a scandal that there is empty accommodation when people are anxious to move from one area to another to take up employment but cannot do so because of the shortage of accommodation. I appreciate that that is not a direct responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, but as he referred to mobility and as I believe that my suggestion would have a greater effect than his welcome changes in regard to pensions I think that it is legitimate to raise the matter today.

I wish to make two further points. I have referred to my anxiety about the rate of growth of sterling M3 as recorded in the Red Book, and I find myself in respectful agreement with my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth. There seems to be a trio of Members here today who have served as Ministers of State, Treasury — two have already spoken and one is to speak later. I wish that excise duty on tobacco and alcohol had been increased. I wish to confess my sin: I smoke and drink. I am therefore arguing to penalise my own vices. My right hon. Friend did not increase excise duty on tobacco and alcohol——

Mr. Madden: Because an election is coming.

Mr. Gow: Not because of that.

I am anxious about the growth in the money supply that has taken place recently, and it would be right to increase excise duties, not least because that would enable us to have a further reduction in the public sector borrowing requirement or in income tax.

It is a matter of legitimate debate whether any income tax concessions should be distributed by raising the thresholds, diminishing the basic rate or altering the bands. I have always thought that a starting rate of 29 per cent. for the last financial year, or 27 per cent. this year, is far too high. As a result of my right hon. Friend's Budget, a single person earning £47 a week will pay 27p in tax on the next pound that he earns. A married couple with an income of £73 a week goes straight from no tax on the first £73 to 27 per cent. on the next pound. No other step on the ladder of higher rates of tax is as high as the first step. One goes from nought to 27 per cent., and from 27 to 40 per cent., which is another 13 per cent. One continues upwards in stages of 5 per cent.

I believe that it would have been right — I have argued the point before with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor—to have a lower rate of tax. That would be important in tackling the poverty trap, which means that those who have been offered — and have accepted — relatively low-paid jobs find that their net take-home pay is little more, and sometimes less, than the sum that they received when they were unemployed.

I give the Budget my warm approval. It is consistent with the policy that we have been following for the past eight years. Sound money, honest finance, greater incentives for our people and a wider extension of ownership are all essential to a more successful Britain. They are important also for a Britain that has recovered its sense of individual responsibility and pride. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will present many more Budgets in the next Parliament.

7.6 pm

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) on his excellent speech. It was effective, relevant and aimed at the needs of the vast majority of people in this country, unlike that of the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment.

On Tuesday, I listened to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for almost an hour and never once did I hear him mention the millions who are unemployed, mostly because of the policies of this Government. I wondered at times whether we lived in the same country or even on the same planet.

I shall confine my remarks to the thousands who are unemployed in the north and, in particular, in my constituency. The Budget does little or nothing for such people. The Government do not seem to think that life exists north of Watford. In the north, we have unemployment of 163,902 men and 64,493 women. In Tyne and Wear 72,695 men and 26,268 women are out of work. One of the best job agencies in the area was the Tyne and Wear metropolitan county council, which the Government abolished 12 months ago.

In my constituency 6,029 men are out of work; 16·2 per cent. have been out of work for more than a year and 32 per cent. have been so for more than two years. One thousand nine hundred and ninety three women are out of work; 17·3 per cent. have been out of work for more than a year and 23·5 per cent. have been so for two years or more.

Such people are human beings — breadwinners, one-parent families, youngsters who went through the education system — and they are now being thrown on the human scrap heap because of the policies of the Government. They are, as I say, human beings, not figures. This week I have heard about £6 billion, £4 billion, £20 billion, and £2 billion, but those figures are not relevant to ordinary people. People are out of work: they want a job and the dignity of a pay packet, so let us have none of the nonsense that we heard from the Paymaster General.

The Paymaster General talked about job clubs. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) has already discussed the restart programme. How on earth can the job clubs in Jarrow help 9,000 people when the jobcentre has only 123 job vacancies? That is nonsense and a con.

There is in our area an advertisement in which two chaps are seen walking along the road. One asks the other where he is going, and he replies, "To the pub." The other suggests that they go to the job club where they can get a telephone, papers and training for interviews. So the first man goes along to the club, as if he were going to get a job.

I am a great believer in putting myself in Gilligan's place. Can any hon. Member imagine himself being out of work for 18 months or two years? I have been out of work on a number of occasions, once for many months. After being out of work for a while, one does not bother to get up in the morning. One lies in because there is no point in getting out of bed.

One morning a noise is heard in the passage, so the wife goes out to investigate. Suddenly, a squeal is heard; the wife comes back with a letter and says, "You must go down to the job club." The man has been out of work for 18 months so he goes along to the job club, where the interviewer says to him, "Look here, Dixon, I believe you have been out of work for 18 months. What do you do?" "Well, I am a ship's carpenter," I say. "I am sorry, but there are no ships to repair or build now."

At one time one could walk across the River Tyne because there were so many ships tied up at its sides. Now there are no ships at all. So the interviewer says, "I am sorry, you have no chance of getting a job as a ship's carpenter. Can you do anything else?" "I have built my own house". "That is no good, either. We are not building any houses now. Eight years ago the council in south Tyneside was building 700 houses. This year it is building only 26. There are still over 7,000 people on the housing list but the council is building only 26 houses. Therefore, there is no chance of getting a job building houses, even though you built your own house. Is there anything else you can do?" I might then say, "When I was in the Army and I was on jankers I used to get sent around the officers' quarters cutting the grass with a pair of scissors." The interviewer would then say, "Bingo, we can fix you up. The local authority has just paid off its gardeners and we are setting up a community scheme to cut the grass in people's gardens. We have made it. We have found somebody at last". That is what the job clubs do. It is nonsense. The Paymaster General talks about the job clubs helping 9,000 people in Jarrow but there are only 123 vacancies at the jobcentre. He is talking nonsense and he should know that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East pointed out how the Government massage the unemployment figures. Last week a couple came to see me in my surgery. The husband had been out of work for 12 months. He applied for a community programme place but was told that he could not take part because his wife was working full time. It was suggested that he could be fixed up on the community programme if his wife stopped working. Therefore, his wife finished work. She cannot go on the unemployment register because she is a married woman. He came off the register and joined the community programme and the unemployment register is reduced by one. If one multiplies that up and down the country one can see that that is how the figures have been fiddled for a considerable time.

I remember when I was first elected. I listened to the Prime Minister saying, "We do not want any artificial jobs, we want proper jobs". A total of 729,000 people are on programmes such as the community programme, the enterprise allowance scheme, youth training scheme, young workers scheme, community industry, job release scheme and the job splitting scheme. When the job splitting scheme was first introduced everybody was going to split jobs but only 250 have been affected. Those are the sort of gimmicks that we have had from the Government since they were elected. They have tried to con the people who are out of work. I have spoken to many people on such programmes and the last time I spoke to some youngsters they said, "Mr. Dixon, we are not out of work, but we have not got a job." That is the truth and that is what is happening on some of those programmes.

I spoke earlier about the statistics that are thrown about in the Chamber, as if it is an extension of the Oxford debating society. I want to read a letter that I received on the morning of the Budget from one of my constituents. The letter states:

"This letter is on behalf of myself and the unemployed. Before Christmas I asked for a grant for cleaning and decorating. I was told when I asked that I could not get a grant because I was not a pensioner or disabled. I still have that letter. I was a fit and healthy person. I would like to know what being fit and healthy and not being a pensioner or disabled has got to do with the needs of people like myself who are unable to find work, who are getting on towards 60 and have been out of work for a considerable time . . . you have a roof over your head and bread to eat but you are not entitled in this world of high-tech prosperity to ask for clothing or cleaning materials. Hygiene does not come into it. The kettle broke so I asked for a grant for a kettle. I was told, 'as you have a pan to boil water in, you do not need a kettle' . . . This is not the way anyone should be treated on £30·64 who has to pay for heating, electricity and food and that is without the small items that one takes for granted like soap, toilet rolls, underclothes . . . I will not make a list. Poverty is nothing to be ashamed of but in this year of 1987 we are still living in the 1900s . . . It is not the people who are at fault. The shipyards and factories have closed . . . and although enterprise may achieve work for some, small companies cannot employ many people. They cannot employ the elderly like myself who have tried without hope. The young people have little in life to look forward to. What did I work for? What did my father work for and his father work for? They worked for a better world for us to live in not poverty. My grandchildren and their grandchildren I pray will not need or want or beg or appeal to anyone like myself and those unemployed have had to do."

That is the sort of person we are talking about. We are not talking about statistics but human beings. That is the sort of misery they are living in as a result of Government policies; and the Budget does not do anything for that person or the others I am talking about.

The Budget will not help the pensioners who are living on the poverty line in my constituency and who are standing in long queues to get the extra pound of butter that the Government or the EEC are prepared to provide. It will not help those who are waiting for hospital treatment. I live in an area where children are more likely to die in their first year of life, be brought up in care, be low academic achievers and end up on the dole than anywhere else in the country. Those are not my statistics but the results of the Government's regional trends survey. The Government have proved that from birth to leaving school young people in the north can expect to have a hard time. Of those who find a job, it is estimated that over one third of full-time workers are so low paid that they are barely better off than the unemployed. The Budget has done nothing for them.

I heard the Paymaster General on the "Today" programme a few weeks ago. He suggested that there are people in Newcastle receiving higher wages than those in London. He did not specify who they were or what jobs they were doing. Of course, the chief executive of Newcastle city council will receive more than a library assistant in London. If low wages create employment, we should have no unemployment in the northern region because we are one of the lowest paid areas in the country. He also suggested that wages are higher in the south-east because of the price of houses. The Government should sort that out. One of the reasons why there is a shortage of housing is that people are taking note of the chairman of the Tory party and getting on their bikes and looking for work. When they get on their bikes they cannot take their houses with them, so that is creating a demand for houses in areas where there are jobs. The Government should be providing jobs where the people are and where they have their houses. That would sort out many problems.

My constituency was mentioned in the Black report as one of those suffering from a lack of investment in the Health Service. I want to read another letter. It is important that we receive letters from constituents and that we start talking about human beings rather than bandying around statistics that are irrelevant to the people who are suffering. The letter comes from a person who lives in Whitburn in my constituency. The letter said:

"Dear Mr. Dixon, Thank you for your help in my problem to obtain a new fire, which I am pleased to say is now settled. Unfortunately I am once again requesting your help in an extremely serious matter with regard to my health. I am 82 years of age"—[Interruption.]

This is no laughing matter. The hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) should wipe that supercilious grin off his face. I am talking about somebody who is 82 years old. If the hon. Gentleman listens to the letter he will not be smiling.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): The hon. Gentleman has been speaking for a long time. He has gone on about Tyneside. None of us underestimates the difficulties facing Tyneside. The hon. Gentleman has read his postbag but we would be interested to hear what he and his party are proposing other than higher taxation, higher public spending and higher borrowing to get his people back to work.

Mr. Dixon: We are proposing to deal with the unemployment and the Health Service in this country. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East has put the points effectively. If the hon. Gentleman does not like what I am saying he can, like the rest of his colleagues, go and probably spend more on a dinner than some unemployed people have to live on each week. The letter goes on:

"I am 82 years of age and for the greater part of my life have experienced good health until recently.

Some 4 months ago I underwent an operation to remove a growth from my stomach and my health is deteriorating rapidly. In other words I have cancer. I am in serious pain, and I cannot obtain relief from the pain.

After my operation I was sent to . . . rest hospital for two weeks and on one occasion I was in great pain and requested the assistance of the duty sister. She gave me a tablet called Sulpadeine which I took with water and it relieved the pain.

Since I came back home, I have attempted to obtain the same tablets, but at one period the tablets ceased to be manufactured".

He was told that he could not get a prescription because the tablets had been put on the proscribed list by the DHSS. This patient was suffering from cancer and sulpadeine tablets were his only relief. Sulpadeine was put on the proscribed list and he could no longer get it. He wrote to me and I wrote to the Secretary of State for Social Services and received a lengthy letter acknowledging receipt of my letter. The letter said:

"Please assure Mr. Weston that ways in which sensible savings might be made in the drugs will have been and will continue to be sought to release funds for other vital areas"

I received that letter on 17 February 1986 and wrote immediately to Mr. Weston. I got a reply from his nephew which said that Mr. Weston had died between the time I received the reply from the Secretary of State and the time that I wrote to him. Mr. Weston's nephew said:

"My Uncle was very well cared for during his last two weeks in the Hospital . . . and, but for the change of tablets, would have been a lot easier."

That is the sort of public expenditure that we should be talking about instead of talking about taking 2p off the basic rate of income tax. We should be looking after people like Mr. Weston and spending money on the National Health Service. That is what a Labour Government will do.

I have one or two other things to say, but I have spoken for a bit too long. I did not intend to speak for as long as this. I hope that Conservative Members who seem to think that I have spoken for too long will keep their contributions short because a lot of my hon. Friends wish to take part in the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East talked about how we could get people back to work. In the northern region 27,000 fewer construction workers are employed now than were employed in 1979. Thousands of people are on the waiting list for houses and those construction workers could be put back to work tomorrow if the Government would provide finance and let the local authorities use the money that they have received from the sale of council houses. That would have an immediate effect.

The Budget does nothing for my constituents. It does nothing for the pensioners or the unemployed or for those people who are waiting to go into hospital for treatment. The Government are almost at the end of their present life. I hope that they will go to the country as early as possible and let the people choose between our programme and the non-programme that the Government have put forward.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): I listened with care to the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon). I do not doubt for a second the genuine anxiety echoed in the letters that he read to the House. I am bound to tell him that he would have served his constituents better if he had spelt out precisely what he has in mind for improving the economy, and had faced the fundamental errors in the management of the economy in the second half of the 1970s.

Like many of my hon. Friends who have spoken in the debate, I welcome the sound approach and the constructive measures taken by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. His Budget reflects a significant advance on several fronts in the British economy. The economy is now benefiting not simply from higher levels of public expenditure but from better targeted spending, lower borrowing and steadily reducing taxes. Taken together, these trends present an encouraging prospect for future prosperity and for job creation that would have seemed quite unthinkable during the sorry period of economic mismanagement under the last Labour Government.

Before I mention some specific aspects of the Budget, I shall comment briefly on the media treatment during the run-up to Budget day. The media have long regarded the Budget as one of the great moments of spring theatre along with the Boat Race and the Grand National. There has always been a good deal of speculation before the event, but this year the press surpassed itself. With a few notable exceptions, the editorial copy was long on predictions and relatively short on an analysis of how the economy has been transformed from its fragile and fractured condition before 1979, with rampant inflation, huge borrowing and low productivity, to its present robust form.

That transformation has been achieved in spite of the savage worldwide recession that struck in 1980 and that took its toll of overmanned industries, and in spite of the more recent massive fall in oil prices. In view of what happened to oil revenues and the following reappraisal of sterling in the currency markets, it is not surprising that the Chancellor adopted a cautious stance in his forecasts in the last autumn statement. It is all the more rewarding that the economy has proved so buoyant.

A combination of productivity improvement and greater competitiveness of British industry in world markets from the fall of sterling against European currencies, notably the deutschmark, has continued to fuel company profits, to encourage expansion of private sector capital investment and to stimulate job creation. As a result, Britain is now at the top of the European economic league for growth in GDP in which we languished in the relegation zone for so long in the late 1970s.

In order to maintain and improve our position and to place the substantial spending plans contained in the last autumn statement in the context of a consistently prudent policy, the Chancellor had to make a large reduction in his PSBR target. If he had not done so, not only would there have been an outcry about an election spending spree, but there would have been some fundamental doubts in the world money markets about a resumption in inflation and a rapid erosion of the advantages that have accrued over the last eight years.

The fact that he cut the PSBR by more than most observers had anticipated and still reduced the basic rate of income tax by 2p is a portent of many good things to come. It means that the incentives for initiatives and enterprise will continue to improve and that sterling is likely to hold up well in the currency markets allowing a gradual drop in interest rates and, hopefully in due course, in mortgage rates. Above all, it means that a challenge has been thrown down to the Opposition, who have made it quite clear that they want to see higher public sector borrowing and increased taxes. That challenge will not be overlooked by the electorate in the months ahead.

Of the several other sound measures announced by the Chancellor I shall briefly mention three. The help to be given to the over-80s by way of a special increase in the age allowance at double the rate of inflation is an important recognition of the special needs of that age group. The same is true of the 50 per cent. uplift in the blind allowance. On a separate front, the Chancellor's help for small companies by way of VAT reforms and especially the means of cash accounting for VAT are most welcome. Along with the help that he has provided on profit-related pay for employees this year and the assistance in previous years by way of the business expansion scheme and lower rates of corporation tax for small companies, the Chancellor has done a great deal to stimulate the prospects for small firms and thereby the prospects for employment.

Of the items which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor did not include in the Budget, I single out two for his consideration in the future. One is some form of tax incentive for research and development along the lines that he has targeted for research and development in oil companies. The other is a lowering of employees' national insurance contributions for those on lower incomes, so that along with the tax reductions there can be help to deliver more take-home pay for those on the fringes of the poverty trap where the financial net incentive to work is only marginally more than the income from supplementary benefit.

In the final analysis, this debate is likely to revolve around two vital issues that distinguish the success of the Government's policies from the muddled economic thinking of the Opposition parties. Those two issues are capital spending and jobs. Bearing in mind the increase of over £4 billion projected in the autumn statement for the year ahead, it is nonsense to suggest that the infrastructure is being depleted. More is being spent on roads, railways, hospitals and other essential parts of an improving infrastructure. Capital spending in the public sector now stands at £22 billion. I make no apology to the hon. Member for Jarrow, who is leaving the Chamber, about quoting these figures.

That figure of £22 billion is on top of £5 billion being spent on major maintenance projects in the infrastructure. A record £60 billion is being spent on the combined public sector and private sector capital investment. It is little wonder that new jobs are being created. We do not hear often enough that nearly 24 million people are working, that 1 million new jobs have been created since 1983 and that a higher proportion of the working-age population is now employed than in any other European country.

It has become entirely predictable, in debates on the economy and on employment, that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and his hon. Friends will make the sort of anlaysis of employment that we have heard from them today. They have learnt nothing from what happened under a Labour Government a decade ago, but continue to prescribe their familiar nostrums in which public expenditure of unrealistic proportions is claimed to be the cure-all for unemployment. By job creation, Labour Members usually mean more public sector employment. Yet anyone who works in manufacturing industry could tell them that the greatest single cause of unemployment is that companies price themselves out of the markets that they supply. They lose orders and have to cut jobs.

By far the largest component of the prices that those companies charge for their products is the payroll cost. That does not simply mean the salaries and wages paid to their workers; it also includes the payroll element in the cost of materials and of utilities such as gas and electricity, and of the rates that they pay. Real gains in employment can arise only from increased competitiveness, which means that pay increases must be matched by improvements in productivity. That is the way to achieve a greater market share, more orders and more jobs.

It would be cosmetic and utterly irresponsible to use substantial extra Government revenue — whether it is borrowed, with the inflationary threat that that implies, or taxed — merely to create more non-productive jobs in the public sector. The burden of costs would then land on the wealth creators, and without successful wealth creation the country could not continue to afford the social priorities that hon. Members on both sides of the House would agree are essential for the protection of those in genuine need. To promote ever more public sector jobs and to create subsidised employment in the private sector that makes businesses less competitive is not an industrial policy or an employment policy; it is a farrago of empty promises whose effect would put the country back into the miserable economic decline of the late 1970s, when the Labour Government aspired to a national lifestyle that could not be afforded and ignored the damage done to our competitiveness by inflation.

In contrast with those unworkable policies, the Chancellor's Budget was prudent. It will sustain the present encouraging rate of economic growth; it is good for business, and therefore must be good for jobs in the longer term. Perhaps most important, it has reintroduced to our nation an aura of success that is long overdue.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I do not intend to pursue the line that the hon. Gentleman has been pursuing, but I shall respond to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon). My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the issues which concern the overwhelming majority of people, and which will determine the result of the next general election.

I do not believe that those people, who must clearly see that the Labour party will tackle those problems, are asking for anything unreasonable. They have a right to expect a job, and a job with reasonable pay and conditions; they also have a right to expect a decent home that they can keep clean, warm and dry. They have a right to a Health Service—based on need and not on ability to pay—which spends much more money on preventive medicine and early diagnosis, and to decent educational opportunities for their children. But all those rights are being adversely affected by the Government's policies.

When the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) referred to the selling of public assets—the socially owned industries—he failed to say, as the Government always fail to say, what they will do when there are no more publicly owned industries to sell. I have asked them that time after time, because they are now using their money to meet other items of expenditure.

Assets cannot be sold twice. Once they have been sold, and the capital receipt has been used, those assets are gone for ever. The Government are also forgoing the income that they would have received from such industries, which, in the main, have been trading very profitably for many years. I challenge the Government to say what they intend to do when they have no more assets to sell and nothing with which to plug the gap. They are cornering their position by saying that they want to continue reducing taxation at the same time.

When the Paymaster General opened the debate, he had the nerve to call this Budget a Budget for jobs. Of course, it is not the first time in recent years that a Budget has been introduced by the Government as a Budget for jobs. Yet they have failed to solve the problem of unemployment. The 2p reduction in the basic rate of income tax was wrong, given the opportunities available to the Government. Such reductions benefit the higher paid much more than they benefit the lower paid. The Government would have done better to look at the thresholds rather than simply increasing them by 3·7 per cent. in accordance with index linking. However, in their place I should not have been tempted to use the available resources for tax handouts.

The Paymaster General referred to the 1·5 million people whom the Government had taken out of the tax bracket by increasing the threshold. I am not sure whether his comparison was fair. Unless the Government have broken the resolution made in the Finance Bill Committee some years ago, they must index-link. I accept that on one or two occasions they have gone beyond the existing commitment.

When they take 1·5 million people out of taxation, the Government should also take into account the fact that those people have been heavily affected by increases in VAT and in national insurance contributions. Most of them are far worse off as a result of the change in taxation emphasis. Yet, almost as soon as the Conservatives had won the 1979 election, the highest earners benefited from tax reductions from 83 per cent. at the top to 60 per cent.

Mr. Bermingham: Perhaps we have had the first smell of the same thing again. I asked earlier about the £5 billion of BP shares. Does my hon. Friend smell a possibility that the figures that were not disclosed in the Red Book may be the handout that will be given to the rich after the election?

Mr. Pike: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. One reason why the reduction has been limited to 2p was to keep something in reserve, and the Government are to sell additional assets for that purpose. I have no doubt that they will say, "Vote for us at the general election and we shall give you another 2p off the basic rate of tax."

The reduction in the basic rate will not benefit the low paid who are not taxed, or those who are on benefit. One of my constituents, a Mr. Lord, aged 84, telephoned me just before 11 o'clock on Friday of last week. He said, "Do not the Prime Minister and her Government realise that a 2p or a 4p reduction next week will be of no benefit to me, or to millions of other pensioners?" I tried to explain to him that we had been telling the Government that almost continuously over the past 12 months, but that they failed to recognise it, that they did not want to recognise it and that they will not face reality.

While those who have mortgages will benefit once the fall in interest rates takes place, although for the interim period they may be paying slightly more, those who are paying rent will not have that benefit, and once again they will be the losers. The Burnley and Pendle constituencies, covered by one DHSS office, have a population of about 165,000. There are now 16,857 claimants of supplementary benefit, as compared to 10,483 in 1979. What is more, the population is smaller than it was in 1979. Many people have taken the advice of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and moved elsewhere to get jobs. That means that 6 per cent. of the housing stock is empty, but there is little point in attracting people from areas with a shortage of housing because all they can do is immediately add to the massive level of unemployment.

The housing benefit situation is also significant. In Burnley in 1979-80, 5,332 people were receiving housing benefit but in 1986-87 the figure is 10,765. In Pendle, the figures are 5,460 and 12,670. Those figures show what has happened to the people as a result of eight years of Tory Government.

The Paymaster General referred to the Liberal and Social Democratic parties. I do not call them an alliance because they are an alliance only for electoral purposes. They are clearly two different parties, and they are not even represented by one hon. Member at this stage of the debate. The Paymaster General referred to their policies of statutory incomes. However, the incomes policy of his party is to argue for low pay. The Paymaster General is on record as being against national wage negotiations and settlements and for low pay because, he says, it leads to job creation. In 1979, when the Conservative Government were elected, they argued for free collective bargaining, but they have used the biggest possible weapon against that system—the threat of unemployment. In other words, if one does not toe the line, one will be out of a job.

My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow made an interesting point about the north-east which applies also to the north-west and to Lancashire, where low wages have been traditional but where there has been a massive decline in job opportunities and availability of work for the people. In the autumn statement it was announced that there would be a massive increase in public expenditure. In all the questions I have asked of various Ministers, I have yet to find a single public sector department in my area that has benefited from this alleged increase. The allocations for education, housing and the Health Service are all down. All these key services are being reduced. I do not understand where the money to which the Government refer is going.

I welcome two little measures in the Budget. The first is the move on unleaded petrol. The reduction in tax on such petrol is environmentally correct, and we should ensure that people are not penalised by a higher cost factor if they want to use such petrol. I also believe that some of the measures to assist small businesses will help them, so I welcome them. I do not decry the direction in which the Government are moving.

The Government's special measures for jobs will not tackle the problem of unemployment. I do not say that job clubs and restart have nothing to offer or that everything is wrong with them. However, I believe that restart would be far better if it were a two-week programme rather than a one-week programme because the good restart programmes are trying to push too much into one week. The job clubs also have something to offer, but at the end of the day the key factor is whether they create new jobs. They may assist those who have been long-term unemployed to get a job or get into training, and I do not dispute that that is so in a number of cases, but they affect only a small percentage of those who need help.

The Paymaster General referred to the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and said that 72 per cent. of the people who had gone through the job club there had been able either to get a job or go into training. However, that will be only a minute percentage of those affected. My right hon. Friend said that there is 51 per cent. male unemployment in that area. This scheme affects only the surface of the problem. It is not a totally wrong idea, but we have to keep it in perspective and recognise that we need to do far more if we are to move in the right direction. Many people who go on the job training scheme will be involved in travelling costs and have to pay for meals, and will in many cases end up worse off financially than they were when they were on the dole. That has to be nonsense, and I hope that the Government will reconsider this aspect of the matter.

I asked the Department of Employment, and I have received an answer today, how much of the money used to finance the job training scheme was new money and how much was allocated from other sources. It is strange that, although the question was tabled for answer yesterday, I received only a holding answer yesterday. The answer today tells me only that I can go to the Library and find the information. I would have thought that such information would be to hand in the Department, and the Minister could have given those figures and shown how much of that money is new.

The Government have to look at projects such as the Leeds and Liverpool canal corridor which is a scheme being pushed in the north-west by the Lancashire county council and the councils in the Merseyside area. It has the support of borough councils and political parties. There is an area of great dereliction with much unemployment. If the scheme is to go ahead, it needs support and financial assistance from Europe, from the Government, from the private sector and from local government. With full support it could help to create jobs, generate growth and improve life along that canal corridor. One must remember that in Yorkshire and Lancashire that canal produced great industrial wealth in the late 18th and early 19th centuries. It is important that we regenerate the area and make sure that once again it plays a role similar to its original role, when it was an asset, not a drain on the area.

The number of people who have not had jobs since they left school is a significant and important factor. I can give the figures for the north-west, using information from an answer from the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier). He said that in the region 44,118 unemployed claimants had never had a job since they left school and, within that figure, 12,073 were aged under 18. We really should be concerned about the fact that when people leave school they have no opportunity of getting a job.

I want also to refer to some of the figures because they are indicative of the way in which Government have assisted industry. I asked a question about the assistance, expressed in 1985-86 values, given to industries in the north-west from 1976-77 to 1985-86. In 1976-77 it was the equivalent of £143,495,000 and in 1985-86 it was £75,108,000. I stress that the figures are in 1986 comparative values and it was the Minister who gave me the answer. So it shows that we are giving only half the assistance to manufacturing industry that we were giving some 10 years ago.

Manufacturing industries are the bread and butter of our nation. I do not decry the importance of small business or tourism or of the service sector, but in the end this is a manufacturing nation. We have depended on our manufacturing base in the past and will do so in the future. But I fear for the future when the Government talk of a £7·5 billion trading deficit on manufactured goods and do nothing to rectify the situation.

I asked the Paymaster General what reduction there had been in manufacturing jobs in the north-west. It has to be said that the north-west is primarily dependent on manufacturing jobs and my part of the north-west, north-east Lancashire, is dependent above the average. He replied that the figure in June 1979 was 971,000 and that in September 1986 it was 638,000, a decrease of just over 34 per cent. What an appalling record that is. The Minister indicated that there were one or two qualifications on that and I have to say, in all fairness, that there will be some qualifications that he does not mention in the other direction; but time prevents me from going into the detail of them.

I accept that some of the changes have come about as a result of new technology. As a shop steward in industry before being elected to this House, I accepted that if we wanted to continue in business and to carry on employing people we would have to accept change. But we have to get our manufacturing industry into surplus, and the Government should be doing something about rectifying the appalling present situation.

The north-west spokesman for the Confederation of British Industry, the regional director, Mr. Andrew Toop, speaking at a meeting just before the Budget on interest rates, said that he welcomed the previous week's reduction of 0·5 per cent. which he said would save industry and commerce about £125 million a year. He went on to say:

"It is the level of interest rates against our competitors which is the biggest single factor that prevents our business climate improving more quickly and at the same time restrains investment and overseas sales."

He also said that in the previous year the United Kingdom's real interest rate was 7·2 per cent., compared with 4·9 per cent. in West Germany, 4·8 per cent. in the United States and 4 per cent. in Japan. He went on:

"In a medium-sized manufacturing firm employing 300 people this could mean an extra £150,000 on their costs every year, which could make all the difference when competing for contracts."

That is important. I recognise that there has been a further reduction following the Budget, but we still have a long way to go.

We have to accept that manufacturing output is still lower than in 1979. I acknowledge that productivity is higher but output is still lower and investment in manufacturing is also still lower than in that year. Those figures must give concern to all hon. Members. I hope that hon. Members on the Government Benches will not dismiss this fact.

My final point is a plea for north-east Lancashire. We have been trying to persuade the Government to give us an extension to our enterprise zone. Enterprise zones have many faults but ours has been extremely successful. We have applied for an extension and have been told that the Government have put all these applications on ice. If they were to give us that, it would be one small move in the right direction. If they were also to connect us to the main motorway network, it would, at least in one small part of the country, be a good move. But the Government have many lessons to learn, and I believe that the Paymaster General was completely wrong to describe this as a Budget for jobs.

7.45 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): This debate takes place against a further monthly fall in unemployment of some 71,000, the biggest monthly fall since records started in 1971. This is the seventh consecutive month of a consistent downward trend in unemployment which has fallen by 150,000 in the past seven months, an average fall of some 20,000 every month. This substantial fall has occurred without any change whatsoever in the methodology by which the unemployment statistics are compiled. This month's fall, in particular, is all the more noteworthy because the 71,000 do not involve any extra places on training schemes.

But this is not the only consistent fall in unemployment figures that demonstrates the real and steady improvement on the jobs front. Unfilled vacancies are standing at their highest level this decade. One does not have to look simply at the official statistics to see this. A glance at the jobs page of every major local and provincial newspaper tells the same story. In the west midlands, the Birmingham Evening Mail has seen recruitment advertising rise by 40 per cent. in a year. In the north-east, the Newcastle Evening Chronicle has seen a 30 per cent. increase in advertising revenue. In Wales, the Cardiff Evening Echo has seen a 16 per cent. increase, and in the north-west the Manchester Evening News has seen an annual increase in recruitment advertising of 11 per cent. No wonder the CBI suggests that there is three times more work available than official figures suggest. The CBI puts the figure of unfilled vacancies at well over 600,000, and probably nearer 750,000—three-quarters of a million jobs waiting to be filled.

That there has been this degree of recovery should not be a matter for surprise. In the past three years our growth has averaged around 3 per cent. We have had high growth combined with low inflation, a combination that has not been achieved for a generation and a combination certainly never achieved under a Labour Government. Investment is at record levels; company profitability is at its highest for over 20 years; productivity is up by more than 30 per cent. since the end of 1980; and manufacturing output is at its highest since 1980. Throughout the 1980s Britain has had the highest growth rate in the European Community. Manufacturing and productivity during this period have been growing at the highest rate of any leading industrial nation. Britain is the only major country whose export volume is rising, the only economy in the European Community for which forecasters are now more optimistic than they were this time last year.

This is the background for this year's Budget. There seems to be some confusion in the minds of some of the media and the Opposition parties as to what the Budget is all about. It is not about how much the Chancellor should give away in public spending. That is determined in the autumn statement. Let us not forget that last autumn the Chancellor gave away £4·75 billion in public spending, including £1·25 billion for local government spending, much of it for extra pay for teachers and extra resources in our schools, £600 million more on health and personal social services, £450 million more on housing investment and £65 million more for new roads. So massive amounts of money are being spent on the infrastructure, on new roads, new schools, new hospitals and new housing. In my area alone we see work starting this year on the M4 motorway extension from Oxford to Birmingham and £12 million being spent on new buildings at Horton hospital.

Nor is the Budget about how much personal benefits such as pensions should be increased. That will come at the next benefit uprating. But let us not forget that pensions have gone ahead faster than price increases. Between 1979 and 1985, the average weekly net income of pensioners has risen by 18 per cent. in real terms, more than twice the increase for the population as a whole. Under Labour the average annual increase in pensioners' income in real terms was 0·6 per cent. Under the Conservatives, there has been an annual increase of 2·7 per cent.

So the Budget is not about public spending, or about the whole range of uprating benefits. The Budget is the occasion when the Chancellor decides not what he will give away but rather what he will take by way of taxation.

[Mr. Tony Baldry]

In framing his Budget, the Chancellor has clearly heeded the advice of those such as Sir Terence Beckett of the CBI, who observed a little while ago:

"We shall not move into better scenarios unless bold decisive action is taken to reduce the share of national expenditure taken by the state."

He continued:

"Our overriding objective must be to reduce the proportion of economic resources passing through Government hands . . . The freeing up of enterprise is the best single way to create more jobs."

Mr. Prescott: He has Tory backing.

Mr. Baldry: If the Opposition parties cannot heed this, perhaps they should recall the advice of the shadow spokesman on trade and industry, who is hardly a Tory hack. He said:

"We must persuade people that wealth creation is the key to creating jobs in the caring industries like the hospitals. Socialists must interest themselves more in the creation of wealth and not just in the redistribution of wealth."

We have heard little in this debate from Opposition spokesmen about how wealth creation should take place. Wealth creation must be right. Stimulating enterprise is not just the best way to create new jobs; it is only free enterprise that can give people political liberty. If the state starts to take all and if it starts to spend all, sooner or later we will all become serfs of the state. Conservatives wish to see not a nation of serfs but a nation of free men and women. That is why it is right as a matter of practical politics and as a matter of principle that the state should not take from the individual any more by way of taxation than is absolutely necessary.

Those in the Labour party and in the SDP who want higher taxation want greater state control. Let there be no mistake. The Labour party and the SDP are both parties of high rates and high taxation. Before they seek to impose even higher taxes, Opposition spokesmen might like to consider other nations.

In the United Nations the top rate of tax is at approximately the same level as our basic rate. It is perhaps no coincidence that the United States is an economy that has been consistently creating thousands of new jobs and that the job-creating momentum is led by smaller businesses. In the United States small firms have been the driving force in creating jobs. In the past 10 years, 20 million new jobs have been created by firms employing fewer than 20 people, firms that receive not a penny of public subsidy. In Britain also it is smaller businesses that are creating new jobs, real jobs, and this Budget is of considerable benefit to smaller businesses.

Mr. Bermingham: Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that the way the United States got its economy going was by deficit loaded funding; that is, the state went into deficit and the national Government borrowed money which was reinvested in the country.

Mr. Baldry: The Labour party just cannot believe that it is possible to create jobs in any other way than by higher public spending. So when one sees an enterprise economy, and jobs being created by enterprise, the Labour party has to find some reason why that has not been done by enterprise. New jobs in the United States have been created because the state has created the climate for entrepreneurial activity.

The Budget has been good for smaller businesses and for those who are creating new jobs. Tax has been reduced for unincorporated businesses and for the self-employed. There have been successive reductions in small business corporation tax from 42p to 27p. There has been steady expanison of the business expansion scheme which has helped fill the venture capital gap. That has helped to stimulate the growth of smaller businesses by some £400 million. Indeed, between 1979 and 1985, venture capital in Britian has increased by 40 times, so that Britain now accounts for almost half the venture capital in the whole of the European Community.

The changes in the VAT system will help some 800,000 businesses, will be of positive assistance to cash flow and will mean that businesses will not have to pay VAT if they are not paid by their customers. Small businesses will also be greatly assisted by lower public borrowing, which will mean lower interest rates and lower costs for industry.

Those who wonder whether this is a Budget for jobs should simply ask those who are creating real new jobs how they see the Budget. They will find an almost universal welcome and the feeling that the Budget will create a climate that will assist investment, encourage enterprise and make real job creation more likely.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry). When I intervened I was trying to help him but he was not prepared to accept crumbs or pieces of advice from the gods, such as his Front Bench has accepted from last year, as I shall explain in a moment. If the hon. Gentleman knew anything about economics, he would know that the United States got its economy going by borrowing vast sums of money, going into deficit and reinvesting in the economy. Lo and behold, what did it do? It began to create wealth.

What have we seen in this Budget? The Chancellor has said that he will cut the PSBR from £7 billion to £4 billion. In other words, we will not borrow as much money. Therefore, we will not invest as much in the economy and we will not create as many jobs. If only the Government would listen occasionally. I have to claim some success in making them listen. Last year I had—I was about to say the privilege—the pain of serving on the Finance Bill Committee. That may have proved to have been a pain not only to the Government but at times to my own Front Bench when I moved amendment after amendment.

One amendment proposed the removal of on-course betting duty. A year later the idea put forward by cross-party Members, including myself, has found favour with the Government. On-course betting duty has now gone. That is a great boon to racing. We put the proposal to the Government a year ago and somehow the message got home. Obviously someone else pressurised the Government. That is one of the few proposals that I welcome in the Budget.

I see my own Front Bench nodding at me almost sagely, as if to ask what my ideas are for this year. The obvious one is that the whole Treasury team should resign, that we should have a general election to get rid of the whole shower and that we should get back to running the economy properly.

Yesterday I listened to the Chancellor talk about helping small businesses on VAT and other matters. As he spoke, a thought flickered across my somewhat tired mind about the correspondence that I have been having with the Treasury, with Inland Revenue officials and with VAT officials. Somewhere someone has forgotten to tell the people who work for the Inland Revenue, and particularly those who work for the VAT authorities, that small businesses have had a rough time in the past few years, not of their own making but because of Government policies and the international economic scene. I do not wish to assign blame for causing the small businesses to have trouble. The outcome has been that a number of these businesses owe the VAT authorities considerable sums of money.

One business in my constituency owes the VAT authorities approximately £20,000 and it also owes the Inland Revenue approximately £20,000. Business is beginning to take off for that small company. I wrote carefully to the Chancellor and to the people dealing with VAT as did everybody else, for example, the accountants and the banks, because it now appears that the VAT authorities and the Inland Revenue are seeking to wind up the company, notwithstanding the fact that, during the past 12 months, many thousands of pounds have been repaid in VAT and tax. In addition, all current payments due are bang up to date and the arrears are steadily being paid off. Will the VAT authorities and the Inland Revenue allow that company and its nine or 10 jobs to survive? I suppose that that is not many jobs to the mandarins in the Treasury or to the sharks in the VAT authorities. However, in my constituency, which has more than 20 per cent. unemployment, those nine or 10 jobs, and the hope of more jobs, mean something.

Therefore, I make one more plea to the Minister. Can somebody please tell those who are in charge of collecting VAT and income tax that if all current payments are steadily being made and the arrears are being paid off, they should allow such small businesses the hope of success and the time to pay? I know that if they ask for two or three years to pay off the arrears that have accumulated during several years of hard times that may seem a long time. However, jobs will be protected, those little businesses will continue to grow, more jobs will be created and eventually the Inland Revenue and the VAT authorities will get their money. If one goes the other way and decides to liquidate those companies, jobs will be lost, small businesses will close, the authorities will not get their money and everybody will be the loser.

However, that idea uses intelligence and common sense and I toss it across the Chamber as last year, in Committee, I tossed an idea to the Minister. Perhaps he will find the time to pick it up as he found the time to pick up my idea that on-course betting duty should be abolished. Wisdom came slowly to the Minister.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke) indicated assent.

Mr. Bermingham: I see the Minister nodding sagely and smiling. He learned that lesson.

Twice tonight I have carefully intervened to ask about British Petroleum because, as a lawyer, I am naturally suspicious. Therefore, when I do not see something on the face of documents, I begin to ask myself why. This year, I took great care to listen to what the Chancellor had to say and to read the little Red Book carefully—in this case not the thoughts of Chairman Mao, but the predictions of the Treasury about what will be spent next year, and the assets and income that will be received. It stated that the Government would receive about £4 or £5 billion from the sale of public assets—I forget the exact figure.

I thought about the calculations. I worked them all out. I remembered about British Airways and half a dozen other things, all of which the Government will flog off although they belong to you and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to every other taxpayer in this country. Be that as it may, those assets are to be sold off as so much else has been sold off during the past eight years. Somebody referred to those assets as "the family silver". We are now down to the brooms in the broom cupboard. The furniture, the silver, and the tea service have gone, and now we are down to the broom cupboard.

There is no mention of BP in that £4 or £5 billion, which comes from British Airways and others. Suddenly, late last night, we heard that BP is to go as well. The £4 to £5 billion will depend on share prices. I asked myself, if BP is not included in the calculations, what will the Government do with those sums, if and when they get them? Will we have the Budget mark II in 1987? Will the same thing happen as happened in 1979 when, with the election out of the way, we had another Budget?

I pose those questions seriously because we have a right to know. I can understand why the sale of BP was not mentioned in those prediction figures until after the closure of the London and New York markets. I can understand the tactics of that because of its effect on the value of the shares on those markets. However, I begin to ask myself what those moneys are for. Could it be that the various suggestions that have been floated by various commentators in the past few weeks are in the Government's mind for the fiscal year ending in 1987? I refer, for example, to altering the start of the 40 per cent. band, to the reduction in the 40 per cent. level of taxation or even the 60 per cent. level of taxation. Will those things come in the mark II package later this year, when the election is out of the way? The £4 to £5 billion figure referred to in the BP share sale would just manage to pay for those things. However, if they had been in Budget mark I, what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said in answer to the Chancellor yesterday about gimmickry and buying votes would have been proved to be true. That funding is there.

It could just be that I am overly suspicious in 1987 because it happens to be an election year. However, we have a right to know. If we are told that the PSBR will be brought down to £4 billion—that will affect interest rates—we have a Budget that plays only with the margins of age allowance, does certain things in respect of VAT and takes only 2p off tax. The Government say that that is because the country is going ahead, more revenues are coming in and there is not a great amount of expenditure. However, we suddenly find that another £5 billion of revenue is anticipated. In those circumstances, one has a right to know the Government's real plans.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) said earlier, we are discussing human beings and not power or such matters. In reality, we are discussing human beings and the people, such as those in my constituency, who have not worked for years. We are talking about the roads that need repairing in my constituency, the housing stock that needs refurbishing, the schools that need to be updated and the technological skills that are being lost because of the lack of job opportunities. We are talking about industries in the north-west which, because of modernisation, mechanisation and industrial progress, are shedding their work forces, and with them skilled manpower, which has nowhere to go. When one considers the country rolling north from Manchester through the areas of the north-west, those are areas of great skill but with industries which were manpower-intensive, and which are now becoming machine-intensive. Therefore, we need investment in those areas.

When considering the Budget, I must ask "What is in it for the north-west?" Taking 2p off tax does not mean much to somebody who is out of work and who has little, if any, prospect of working again because he is 54 or 55 years old. That person may have spent 20, 30, or 40 years in the coal, chemical or glass industries, investing in our nation, but he finds himself rejected and without much hope when he is in his 50s. He, too, has a right to know what the Budget is supposed to do for him. The tragedy is that this Budget does nothing for him in real terms. It does not give him any hope because the minute that we reduce investment in the state, we reduce that man's prospects of work.

As I suggested in my intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Banbury, through national and federal investment, America has shown us that wealth can be created. The Government have launched a Budget that deliberately cuts investment because it cuts the PSBR figure from £7 billion to £4 billion. At the same time we must ask whether the Budget is fair for all. It is certainly fair and good for some, such as the horse-racing industry and some pensioners, but it is not fair for the millions of people who live in the north in areas where standards of housing and services are declining and where industry needs refurbishment and reinvestment.

When a Government begin to serve only their friends and not the nation, it is time for that Government to go. I suggest to the Treasury team that this will be their last Budget and that soon they will go.

8.10 pm

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): Any Conservative Member would find it difficult to follow the logic of the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham). The Budget serves the entire nation, which is why the Opposition parties are so terrified about the response in the opinion polls next week. It is a Budget for the general good, not the Conservative party's good, although that will undoubtedly be a side effect. Obviously, it is bad news for the Opposition because they always interpret good news as bad news.

I need not follow the hon. Gentleman. The Budget is about economic growth and enabling companies to grow, expand and employ more people. It is only by increasing national wealth that we shall have more to spend on the very items that the hon. Gentleman wants us to increase expenditure on. It is illogical in the extreme for him to waffle on in that misleading way.

As a Member of Parliament for a constituency in north-east Wales, in the industrial front line, I am principally concerned about the effect of the Budget on unemployment. I was going to say, as the only Welsh Member present, but in deference to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams), I have to say, as the only hon. Member representing a Welsh seat speaking in the debate, I welcome today's unemployment figures which show that the unemployment rate has fallen faster in the past year in the Principality than in any other area. There has been a fall of nearly 15,000, which is 8·5 per cent. In the past year in my constituency the decrease has been even more dramatic. Unemployment fell by 13 per cent., from 5,805 in February 1986 to 5,075 in February 1987. That reduction is all the more dramatic when one remembers that during that period my constituency had to absorb the major Courtaulds closure at Greenfield with a loss of 530 jobs in the summer of 1985 and 200 jobs in the previous November, not to mention the multiplier effect.

The Government have begun to reverse the industrial decline of the past 20 years in north-east Wales. That is due in great part in Delyn to the enterprise zone approach. It has shown how effective and intensive a localised approach to unemployment can be. Since designation in 1983, 1,555 new jobs have been created. They are not predominantly part-time, female or in the service industries. That will save me from three interventions from the Opposition, who always tell us that new jobs are part-time, female and in the service industries. Eighty eight per cent. of those jobs are full-time, 63 per cent. are full-time male jobs and 86 per cent. are in a wide range of manufacturing activities. The Budget will help to continue the work that has been done by the Government's policies in Delyn, to create more jobs and to continue the downward trend in unemployment in the Principality as a whole.

Before I go on to four particular points about the Budget, I should like to refer to the speech of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). It was surprising to hear a Labour Member call for an extension to his enterprise zone. I am sorry to say this in the presence of the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), but clearly the alliance disease has spread this evening from his Bench back to the Labour Bench. This is yet another split in the Labour party, although we do not need another as we have so many to choose from.

In the past year I have given the Labour Front Bench several opportunities to tell the House whether its position on enterprise zones has changed—as we know, Labour party policy has a habit of mutating. But the Opposition have never said that their policy has changed from that announced by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) when he had responsibility for enterprise zones and said that the Labour party would have no more of them. Yet tonight the hon. Member for Burnley called for an extension to his enterprise zone, saying how successful it had been. I recognise, admire and respect a rebel who stands up against his Front Bench, and just as the hon. Gentleman's enterprise zone has been successful, so has the Delyn enterprise zone.

Why do I think that the Budget will help jobs? First, the ½ per cent. drop in interest rates in anticipation of the Budget and the ½ per cent. drop in response to it is what every industrialist and small business man in my constituency wanted most. That more than anything else will help us to create jobs because it reduces costs and increases competitiveness. The Labour party will rue the day if they continue to forget that 75 per cent. of small businesses have an overdraft and know what it is to pay high interest rates, as do those in the farming industry. The fall in interest rates, especially for those in the hard-pressed dairy sector, will be of great assistance.

Secondly, high taxes damage the economy and restrict economic growth. I try to put it simply because, in trying to get the message across to hon. Members opposite, we have no option but to put it simply. High taxes reduce incentives for those in work and for people to take on jobs. High taxes crush enterprise, straitjacket small businesses and stifle job creation. A cut in the basic rate, like raising thresholds, reduces the unemployment trap. That reduction in the basic rate of tax is of particular value to the self-employed and to those whom we are encouraging to set up on their own. I am particularly aware of that, as my constituency was in one of the original pilot schemes for the enterprise allowance.

"With the rate of inflation remaining low, and with these substantial tax reliefs, modest increases in earnings should ensure that real living standards can continue to rise over the year ahead without unduly increasing our industrial costs. This is the best possible recipe for commercial and industrial success. It is the only recipe for curing unemployment."—[Official Report, 11 April 1978; Vol. 947, c. 1207-8.]

Those are not my words, even if they are my sentiments. They are the words of the last Labour Chancellor—certainly the last ever.

How do the Opposition square those words with those of the Leader of the Opposition, who said:

"The Government choose across-the-board cuts in taxes. We and the British people want across-the-nation cuts in unemployment."—[Official Report, 17 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 829.]

The Leader of the Opposition is economically illiterate. We could forgive that were he not Leader of the Opposition. Moreover, he seems to believe that tax cuts and unemployment cuts are incompatible when in reality tax cuts can, do and will lead to unemployment cuts. His view that tax cuts and unemployment cuts are incompatible was not the view of his right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it is not the Government's view either. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General said this evening, tax cuts create jobs.

Thirdly, I turn to VAT and the administrative changes that have been proposed. As one newspaper put it succinctly today:

"Cash flow is the problem that often kills small businesses."

One of the greatest concerns of small businesses is the late payment of bills and having to pay VAT on unpaid bills. Optional cash accounting will ease their cash flow problems and provide automatic tax allowance for bad debts.

Fourthly, the Chancellor rightly described training and retraining as vital to a flexible and competitive economy.

I spoke at the beginning of my speech of the problems we are facing in my constituency. They are the problems of success, principally in training. With our success in attracting garment manufacturers to my area, we have developed a shortage of machinists. The Manpower Services Commission has been extremely helpful, but funds are limited. Notwithstanding a major investment in training by Laura Ashley, by Seddons and by Christie Tyler, more people could be taken on if more training was available.

I realise that the retraining measures announced by the Chancellor are a complement to the existing concessions on training for employees to acquire and improve skills in their existing jobs. The proposals made by the Chancellor on Tuesday will ensure that employees about to leave or who have left their jobs will no longer be taxed on the expenses of a training course, and the employers whom they are leaving will be able to deduct the cost of further training or retraining schemes from their taxable profits.

I welcome this change—I hope the Minister will be able to answer this point when he winds up—but I wonder how much advantage will be taken of this concession by other than the largest companies. How can we encourage those large companies to do so and to ensure that they have the conscience to do so, especially as they have made many people redundant?

Courtaulds still has a small presence in my constituency at the Deeside mill, which employs 154 people. In 1985, Courtaulds made nearly 800 people redundant in two phases. Would it be possible now for Courtaulds to take advantage of the Chancellor's concession on behalf of those of the 800 who still remain unemployed? Would it be possible to let those of the 800 people who do not yet have jobs to embark on training schemes for which Courtaulds can have tax concessions?

I would be grateful if the Minister could reply on that point, as tomorrow I have a meeting with the deputy chairman of Courtaulds, Dr. Norman Wooding, to review the help that Courtaulds has given on the Greenfield business park. That would be a point that I and the chief executive of my borough council would wish to put to him.

The Greenfield young enterprise centre is one of too few enterprise centres in my constituency, and is designed to help young people to develop their own ideas practically and effectively and to set up in business. The Greenfield young enterprise centre has been a great success. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, when she was in my constituency last Friday afternoon, met several people who had been through the course at that centre and who are now setting up business on their own.

We want to encourage an enterprise culture. Many are receiving an enterprise allowance. Some of them have now moved from their original stall in the Greenfield young enterprise centre into a bigger work space, for which they managed to pay the rent, in the micro-workshops that have been set up in the Greenfield business park. Despite this movement through the young enterprise centre, we still face a shortage of space. I believe more can be done to help young people who wish to set up on their own and who have business ideas. All they need is guidance, financial advice and marketing help, and they can then set up effectively and employ not only themselves but ultimately other people as well.

As the Chancellor and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary have said—it was repeated by the Paymaster General today—the Chancellor has achieved a unique treble—an increase in spending, together with cuts in borrowing and taxes. I have to be fair to the Opposition. They too could, given the chance—I know they will not have it, but let us suppose that nightmare came about—achieve a unique treble that was last achieved by President Mitterrand prior to his Thatcherite conversion when he managed almost uniquely to get borrowing, interest rates and inflation soaring through the roof at one and the same time.

The Leader of the Opposition, in his response to the Budget speech, said that it had little to do with the general good. In one respect he is right. It is good for everybody in the country except for the Opposition parties. Only bad news is good for them. A review of his speech could well have echoed the review in The Economist of his book

[Mr. Keith Raffan]

"Making our Way", which was described as "a characteristic blend of vacuity and sentimentality". As a former journalist, it reminded me of the famous editor of "The Londoner's Diary" on The Evening Standard who decided one evening to skip a party that he was meant to attend and write up for the paper the next day. Despite not attending the party, he still wrote it up before it took place, only to discover the next day that it had never actually happened.

The Leader of the Opposition wrote his speech in advance of the Budget. His speech was a response to a Budget that was not delivered. The editor of "The Londoner's Diary" was subsequently fired and the same fate awaits the Leader of the Opposition at the general election.

8.25 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): A week ago the west Yorkshire low pay unit issued a press release with the headline: "What hope for west Yorkshire low paid in Tuesday's debate?" Prophetically the low pay unit said a week ago:

"a 2p cut in the basic rate of tax would cost the Chancellor around £2,600 million. Average earners would be more than £3 a week better off, whilst many low paid workers would benefit by less than £1 a week."

Mr. Jonathan Fry of the low pay unit added:

"a cut in the basic rate of tax is not likely to provide much help to the low paid or our local economy. To the extent that tax cuts have some impact on jobs and the economy, they are more likely to benefit those areas with high average earnings and a strong and developing economic base: the south east of England rather than west Yorkshire."

Some time ago I was looking at the list of 50 constituencies with the highest rates of unemployment and 50 constituencies with the lowest rates of unemployment. I was not surprised to see that there was only one Conservative Member of Parliament representing a constituency with a high rate of unemployment and only one Labour Member representing a constituency with a low rate of unemployment.

Ever since 1979 Government policies have been deliberately aimed at ensuring that the southern constituencies of the United Kingdom were given every encouragement and support to ensure a return of a Conservative Government. It is those southern constituencies which this Budget is all about. The Budget has been deliberately designed to buttress those southern constituencies to ensure that every last Conservative vote is wrung out in a desperate bid to ensure that this Government are re-elected.

It is not surprising that there has not been a single Conservative Member representing a constituency in Yorkshire or Humberside in the Chamber throughout the whole of this debate on unemployment, and still less surprising that no Conservative Member of Parliament has sought to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, to speak in this debate on behalf of their constituents who are unemployed and who are facing great misery, desperation and anxiety over what the future holds for them.

It ill becomes the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan), a former Daily Express newspaper journalist, to accuse others of economic illiteracy and to tell us that the problems in his electorate are the problems of success. Every Opposition speaker represents constituents desperately worried about the economic situation and the extent of unemployment. They have not spoken about the problems of success or economic illiteracy. They have been speaking from the heart.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) who spoke as the authentic representative of those millions of people in the northern half of this country who are desperately ill served by this Government and its policies. Those people have nothing to thank this Government or its policies for and they are desperately worried about their futures and their families. My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow was speaking with the authentic voice of those of us who have the honour to represent those constituencies, which are extremely hard pressed.

Let us remove a few myths. Firstly, we are told by some Government Members that tax cuts and the 2p cut in the standard rate are necessary to give incentives to people to work harder. Why is it that the Government and Conservative Members believe that it is necessary to give people, already well off, a lot more to persuade them to work harder? Many other people who are not well off are supposed to receive even less to persuade them to work harder. I have never understood the logic behind the argument that rich people need more to persuade them to work harder, but poor people should get less to persuade them to work harder. That is the natural philosophy behind the Government's persistence in reducing tax for the well off. Since 1979 they have got the poor to subsidise those tax cuts.

Since 1979 £8 billion has been given in tax cuts, but the poorest six million taxpayers have received only 8 per cent. of that figure while the richest one million taxpayers have shared one third of total tax cuts. The taxpayer on £70,000 has received a tax cut of £367 a week. The low-paid have received under £2 a week and that has been offset by increases in national insurance contributions, VAT, excise duties and other indirect taxes.

What about all this stuff about incentives and the necessity of tax cuts to make people work harder? I am told of a Treasury report — buried long ago — that exposed that myth. It said that tax cuts do not make the rich work harder. In fact, they look at their net pay, see that they are doing reasonably well and, if anything, work less hard than before. Therefore, even in Conservative party logic that is nonsense.

We are also aware that many people have absolutely no choice about whether to work overtime, and therefore tax cuts are no incentive to them. If anything, there should be concern about those living in poverty who are on marginal rates of tax at 90 per cent.—the most vicious tax rate prevailing in this country. If people earn an extra £1 they lose 90p of it. We should be concerned about their tax rates rather than those of people earning £50,000 or £60,000. People should not be kidded into believing that those receiving such salaries are rare animals and pop up only in the Hickey column opening the champagne on Tuesday night to celebrate the money that they were pocketing from this Budget. Oh no! There are 50,000 people in this country earning £70,000 a year.

Let us consider one of the other myths—that there is no money around. There is a myth that there is no alternative to what the Government have been doing since 1979 because there is no money around to do anything different. The truth is that this country is flooded with money. There are oceans of money and enormous amounts of wealth. Where has it gone?

My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow urged that we should not talk about millions or billions, but sometimes it is necessary to do so. Some of the money has gone on £8 billion worth of tax cuts, £20 billion to finance 4 million men and women to waste their talents, skills and enthusiasm on the dole queues. Some £600 million has been spent on flogging cheap butter to the Russians, £1 billion on keeping the Common Market food markets in place, £2 million a day on fortress Falklands and hundreds upon hundreds of pounds on Trident nuclear submarines. If this lot are re-elected we will be squandering £10 billion on Trident nuclear submarines.

That is where some of the money has gone. A lot more has gone on sending out lifeboats to banks and propping up all sorts of other ventures. However, in my city tonight there will be 30,000 families going to sleep in houses that need serious renovation. There are 10,000 owner-occupiers on low incomes who desperately await home improvement grants. There are 8,000 families on the housing waiting list.

Today I was told of a group of houses that need £40,000 to renovate them. Once that renovation is complete the market value of the properties will be half that figure. That is the reality in inner city Bradford and other inner cities up and down the country. The cost of construction or renovation is substantially more than the market value of property. That is a reflection of the recession and the mass unemployment that we are witnessing up and down the country, but which is concentrated in the north.

We need £10 million to electrify our railway between Bradford and Leeds. That is another important project that requires public spending and that would create jobs and improve our ability to overcome unemployment. It would expand our local industry and promote tourism. There are many crumbling schools in my area—scores of them are literally falling down. In my constituency half the schools were built when Queen Victoria was on the throne. My children attend schools that are overcrowded, with class sizes well above 30. Teachers are desperately trying to give those kids a decent start in life, but are prevented from doing so because equipment is in short supply. The schools are in a dreadful condition. The opportunity to give those kids a decent start in life is extremely limited.

We hear a lot from the Government about their desire to support high technology. However, cuts imposed in 1981 on the university of Bradford decimated that university. The Government similarly attacked Aston and Salford — both technology universities. Last week, the chancellor of Bradford university announced another 60 redundancies as a result of this year's grant allocation to the university.

In a few days' time the maternity grant will be abolished. That grant was £25. Most Conservative Members despise £25. It would not even meet the price of a decent lunch for most of them. However, for women in Bradford and throughout the country an extra £25 at a time when they are expecting a baby is extremely handy. The amount of money that is available to pregnant women and mothers with children will be considerably reduced as a result of the measures in the Social Security Bill—steamrollered through Parliament in the past 12 months by the Government. Women will have their financial support reduced, and their maternity rights will also be greatly reduced.

Men and women in my city are aware that, if the Government are elected and the rest of the measures contained in the Social Security Bill are implemented, 10,000 free school meals will be abolished. Many pensioners will lose their housing benefit. Many others will be in desperate conditions because they will lose their incomes. Some 19,000 households in my constituency will lose up to £5 a week as a result of the Social Security Bill.

That is the reality of what is happening in constituency after constituency north of Watford. However, the Government do not care, they have not cared and they never will care. All they are concerned about is buttressing the comfortable people who live in the comfortable southern constituencies of this country, which have been their electoral target ever since 1979 and which remains their target.

We must remember that when the Chancellor came to the Dispatch Box on Tuesday he faced a number of choices. He had £6 billion in resources to allocate. He deliberately chose to ensure that the available resources were given over to cutting tax in the full knowledge that most of those resources would go to the well-off and that the major benefit would go to those with substantial incomes. He chose to cut public spending.

The Chancellor could have chosen to put available cash into providing work, into new homes, improving older homes, building new schools, renovating old schools, building new hospitals, repairing the collapse of the National Health Service, and doing all the other things that we know are desperately needed, particularly in the north of England. The right hon. Gentleman could have chosen to help the unemployed by providing work. He could have chosen to help the pensioners by substantially increasing their pension. He could have chosen to help the low paid by trying to ensure that child benefit was increased — the most effective way of combating child poverty.

The thing that appalls us most is the waste of money that has been the hallmark of this Conservative Government. There has been a waste of people. Despair and desperation are written all over the faces of most of our constituents. They have given up hoping for better things. They are just enduring the present and are fearful of the future.

Bradford is an extremely disadvantaged and deprived city, yet we have been robbed by this Conservative Government of £70 million in rate support grant in the past seven years. There are 30,000 unemployed in Bradford, 10,000 in my constituency. One in five people is unemployed. Every job is being chased by five or six unemployed people. Half the long-term unemployed — the posh name for those who have been out of work longest — are under 35. That is the reality of my consitituency and my part of the country.

This hard-faced, uncaring and uncompassionate Conservative Government used to talk about real jobs. When the Prime Minister was the Leader of the Opposition in 1979, and before that, I remember that she used to trot up and down the country talking about the Conservatives wanting real jobs. What have we had instead of real jobs? We have seen the unemployment figure fiddled and an expansion of the so-called job training programmes.

[Mr. Max Madden]

Jobs have been created. I have to say to the hon. Member for Delyn that most of the new jobs that have been created are part-time and low-paid. The self-employed statistics are highly questionable. So we must question the quality of the new jobs that have been created by this Conservative Government. We must say that we are not prepared to settle for more of the same, that we in the Labour party are determined to see the creation of more than 1 million real jobs in two years. In the past few days we have set out in clear detail specific proposals for achieving that return to work by men and women who want to work, and who recognise that work needs to be done. That need is crying out to be met. We shall fulfil that challenge when we are given the opportunity by the electorate.

Monetarism is dead. I am surprised that Conservative Members here tonight are not wearing black ties in memory of monetarism, which is no longer with us. Earlier this week the Chancellor got upset with a radio presenter who remarked on the death of monetarism. In reply he accused him of being a Labour party supporter. I understand that the chairman of the Conservative party became upset recently about remarks that he is supposed to have made to the effect that no one with a social conscience votes Tory. I do not agree with him. Many Conservative supporters and voters are deeply unhappy at the performance of their Government in office. I believe that large numbers of natural Conservative voters are repelled by the effects of Conservative policies on constituences such as mine and constituencies throughout the north of England.

Those Conservative voters are expressing their concern about the Government's policies. They did not want a cut in the standard rate of tax. What they wanted their Conservative Government to do was genuinely to try to devote available resources to creating work, rebuilding the NHS, repairing the damage done to the education service and improving the quality of life for all our people. That is what Tories with a social conscience wanted. They are bitterly disappointed by the Budget. Those in the southern half of the country will show their dismay at and bitterness about the Budget. My constituents and those of others who represent northern constituencies are in no doubt that the Budget is a Budget of missed opportunities. Above all, it is a Budget that ignores the needs and desperate anxieties of those whom we in the House represent.

8.47 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Loughborough): I am not wearing a black tie, nor am I wearing a solemn countenance, for one good reason. I have listened to every speech by Opposition Members during the debate. None mentioned, welcomed, was pleased about or celebrated the fact that today's fall in seasonal unemployment is the largest ever to have been announced by a British Government. I do not have to wear a black tie for that. It is a long-delayed but welcome step in the right direction. I am proud of it and certainly do not apologise for it.

Nor do I see any reason to apologise for the Government's recent record on public expenditure, which the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) made much of. He is living in a different world from the one that is formed by the Budget package, which has been brought forward over the past few months by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. It is important, in any sensible and intelligent comment on the Budget package, to consider the Budget announced by my right hon. Friend on Tuesday and the public expenditure White Paper published a few weeks ago as a total package. I disagree with the emphasis of my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) who insisted that the two should be treated separately. On the contrary, they should be treated as two sides of the same coin. They are both part of the Government's economic plans for the financial year beginning this April.

Far from representing a scheme where the Government are cutting back public expenditure to finance tax cuts, when taken together, those plans represent a scheme where the Government are able substantially to increase public expenditure and at the same time to introduce tax cuts. It is instructive to look at the balance between those two different ways of using the resources that the Chancellor felt were at his disposal.

Let us look at the effect of the decisions that will be implemented at the beginning of the next financial year. The Government's spending programme foresees an increase in Government spending of £4·5 billion and tax cuts of £2·5 billion. In round figures, of the room for manoeuvre that the Chancellor felt that he had, he has used two thirds to increase public spending and only one third to reduce taxes. It is a grotesque distortion to represent that total package as one where we are cutting spending to finance tax cuts.

Our opponents say that most people are willing to forgo some tax cuts in order to see proper public services. I agree with that. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor obviously agrees with that because it is precisely the policy that he has pursued. It is not the same as saying that the public are not interested in any form of tax cuts.

When considering the balance of the package that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has introduced for the next financial year, it is clear that he has weighted it two thirds to one third in favour of public spending increases. It is also instructive to look behind the total figures. There is £2·2 billion additional public expenditure for the Department of Education and Science alone. In other words, the total cost of the 2p reduction in income tax exactly matches the total increase in public spending on education. To suggest that the two factors are out of balance seems, as I have said, to be a grotesque distortion.

I very much welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, as a result of a growing economy and of the fact that our economic recovery is now well under way, has been able to introduce public spending increases of £2·2 billion in the education service, £2·2 billion for the budget of the Department of Health and Social Security and £500 million for job creation in the Department of Employment. I do not see any reason to apologise for those figures.

One Opposition Member said earlier that he could not see where the benefits would come in his constituency. It is very clear. There is a 25 per cent. increase over 18 months in teachers's pay and there has been a 20 per cent. increase in real terms in spending on the National Health Services since 1979. Those are the results of a public spending commitment by the Government, which some of us have been pushing on the Government for several years. Now that that is taking shape, I am pleased to welcome it.

In an intervention earlier in the speech of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), I sought to highlight the difference between the public spending plans introduced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and those espoused by the Opposition. We are not seeking to create artificial jobs by, as one Labour spokesman suggested, regarding local authorities as a job creating machine. We are trying to improve the level of services available to people who want to use services such as the Health Service, the education service and other services that the vast majority of people look primarily to the state to provide. We are trying to provide a better targeted, better managed and growing level of service from the public sector. I warmly welcome that as one of the elements of my right hon. Friend's Budget strategy.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor was correct to see the public sector borrowing requirement fall from the plan that he originally had for the next financial year. There are two reasons for that. The immediate reason is that the announcement of the fall has allowed interest rates to begin to fall and we can hope that they will continue to fall. That has an important effect on businesses and job creation and an important effect on mortgages and therefore on home ownership.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is right to see the PSBR at a lower level for another reason, which should appeal to the Opposition. The Opposition, like me, say that they believe in the principles of demand management. In that case, I believe, as the Opposition claim to believe, that public borrowing should be allowed to rise during a recession. However, the corollary to that must be that in a recovery the PSBR is allowed to fall. I have no dogmatic objection to public borrowing as such. However, I have a clear objection to excessive borrowing.

At the moment, private borrowing is buoyant. That is precisely the time when it is right, under any form of demand management approach to the economy, for the Chancellor to be reining back on his own borrowing requirement. In demand management the total level of credit creation in the economy is important. When the private sector has a high demand for credit leading to high credit creation towards the private sector, that is the moment when the public sector should be reining back its demand for credit to ensure that we have a balanced economy that does not run into the dangers of overheating of which Opposition Front Bench spokesmen repeatedly talk. The policies espoused by the Opposition would cause such dangerous overheating.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is right to see public borrowing fall at this stage of the economic cycle. If he had allowed the borrowing requirement to rise to a much higher level, there would have been a significant danger of overheating. I enthusiastically endorse my right hon. Friend's approach on that subject.

I want to raise another point which does not arise directly from the Budget, but which concerns taxation policy in the medium and longer term. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be working on this point now in anticipation of a third term in office during which he can put the results of his deliberations into practice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) and my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner) referred to the importance of the marginal rate of tax on incentives and they both concentrated on the standard rate. I believe that they understated their case when they considered the effect of a 30 per cent. or a 35 per cent. standard rate of tax on incentives and that they missed the important solution to the real problem of inadequate incentives that exists in the income band in the country of between £80 and £200 a week. In that income band, the effective marginal rate of tax is not 27 per cent., 29 per cent. or 30 per cent. It is the standard rate of tax plus the national insurance contribution, plus the housing benefit taper, plus, very probably, the rate of withdrawal from family income supplement and the withdrawal of other means tested benefits. In many families in that income band, the effective marginal rate of tax can be around 90 per cent. In the next Parliament, the key taxation strategy that I want a Conservative Chancellor to adopt as a high priority is that marginal rate of tax and benefit loss on low income households should be brought into line with the maximum rate of marginal rate of tax that we are prepared to tolerate for other income groups.

After all, if we believe that 60 per cent. is too high—as some of my hon. Friends claim — for high rate taxpayers, surely 90 per cent. is too high for low income households. There should be a clear priority from a Conservative Chancellor in the next Parliament to reduce the marginal rate of tax and benefit loss that applies to low income households.

The history of this Government since 1979 shows that there have been some very welcome reductions in taxation, for example, the national insurance surcharge, action to increase thresholds by more than inflation and action to reduce the standard rate. However, I hope that in the next Parliament my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will concentrate his strategy on a particular group of people among whom the problems of high marginal rates are still very intense and a major disincentive to go to work or do an extra hour's overtime at work and which he has it in his capacity to improve.

Finally, as the hon. Member for Loughborough, it would be entirely wrong for me to let the Budget pass without welcoming the fact that the Governor of the Bank of England chose my constituency to make the speech described today as the funeral oration for sterling M3. From my humble position on the Back Benches, I have been encouraging that approach since 1979. It always causes me a certain wry amusement when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor refers to the governor's Loughborough lecture, but I am very glad that that lecture has been included in the text of the Budget, laying to rest an unfortunate aberration in monetary policy. I shall not develop the argument at length but, like the Governor of the Bank of England, and perhaps even my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, I hope that, having buried a monetary meter which was always inaccurate and never gave us the information that we needed, there will be a clearer statement in the next Parliament of an alternative approach to monetary policy which in my view should be based on membership of the European monetary system.

The general tone of the Budget is very welcome, however, and I especially welcome the fact that I am able to make this speech in support of it on the day on which unemployment fell by the largest monthly figure since records began.

8.59 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I shall be brief. The hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell) is wrong about unemployment. We acknowledge that there has been a fall in unemployment and we welcome it as a step in the right direction, but what type of fall has it been? What type of jobs have been created? Even more important, where are those jobs? They are certainly not in my constituency, although my constituents are greatly affected by unemployment. In 1982 unemployment was 2·73 million, in 1985 it was 3·05 million, in June 1986 it was 3·11 million and in January 1987 it was 3·16 million, so there has certainly been no fall in unemployment, and no jobs have been created in Yorkshire and Humberside. In south Yorkshire, unemployment is still 18·8 per cent. In my constituency of Barnsley it is 20·5 per cent.—one person in five—and the male unemployment rate is about 22 per cent. So when the Government say that employment has been created, I can only ask where, when and how, because it has certainly not been in my area. The number of people unemployed for more than 12 months in Yorkshire and Humberside is 132,791—an increase of 2·27 per cent. over the 1986 figure. I applaud any decrease in unemployment, but I have to ask where, when and how it has taken place.

This is a cynical Budget. The Government are pandering—unsuccessfully I hope—to people's tendency to say, "I'm all right Jack" and blow the 4 million unemployed, the low paid, the sick, the needy and the old. That is a deliberate ploy for the next election, whenever it comes. According to the Red Book figures, the Government have hedged their bets by keeping back the amount of money still available from the sale of this country's assets. It is a blatantly cynical Budget for an election period, but people are far better informed nowadays than they used to be and they will recognise the Budget for what it is. Those in work have children who are unemployed and parents who are pensioners, so they will take note of those factors and the Government's ploy will come unstuck.

When I saw a newspaper headline proclaiming that the Budget meant £7 in the pocket of the average worker, that looked pretty good until I discovered that the average worker in question earned £17,000 per year and lived in a £30,000 house. There will be no dancing in the streets of my constituency on that basis because those are certainly not average wages and house prices for the people whom I represent.

Many people will applaud the Government's proposals with regard to on-course betting, but clawing back the lost tax from gaming machines is a move in the wrong direction because it will take £250 from every working men's club in my area when they depend on income of that kind to keep going. If the Government had targeted amusement arcades, which should never have been allowed to grow up in the first place, I could have applauded that as it would be taking a hard look and making a real cut in teenage gambling. I do not know whether Conservative Members are aware of the Yorkshire Post campaign, but the Chancellor has missed a great opportunity to do something about this.

I hope that the Government will give serious attention to the mining industry. Over the past few years 70,000 jobs have been lost following the closure of a number of collieries, and there are more to close. The average age of those made redundant has become much lower and the operation of the redundancy scheme means that the enhanced payments have become much lower. The training period offered to redundant mineworkers is six weeks, which is too ridiculous for words. It should be based on that which prevails in the steel industry, which is two years.

In Yorkshire and Humberside we have the men, the women, the will, the way and everything else that it takes to recreate industrial activity in the area. Unfortunately, we do not have Government help and direction. In particular, the area which I represent needs to become a development area.

9.5 pm

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): The Budget was proposed in the context of a two-nation Britain. Its real significance is that it represents a decision to try to build an electoral majority in one half of the division instead of an attempt to heal the divisions. As with all previous Budgets since 1979, it is designed for the comfortable Britain.

My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) has said that he feels that he is living on a different planet from the one that is inhabited by Ministers. He was right to say that, for there are two different planets or worlds. The Government address themselves to the part of Britain that can afford to pay its way and has the services that it wants while Opposition Members address themselves to those who lack the essentials of life, the standard of living that they should have and the benefits that the other Britain enjoys.

The division in Britain shows itself in the smaller measures as well as the larger ones. For example, the personal equity plan was introduced in last year's Budget, and some of my hon. Friends will remember how. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

> "Although the scheme will be open to everyone, it is specially designed to encourage smaller savers, and particularly those who may never previously have invested in equities in their lives."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 178.]

In other words, the PEP was for the small investor or first-time investor. That was the pledge and that was the headline that appeared in the newspapers.

I have undertaken some research on PEPs to ascertain who has benefited from them. My survey has encompassed some of the larger plans, such as those run by Barclays Bank and the Midland Bank, Save and Prosper and Hill Samuel. It appears that about 75 per cent. to 90 per cent. of those in PEPs have stocks and shares already and that the average investment is £2,000, which is almost the limit of £2,400. More details are available about the Barclays scheme than the others. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken of it and it should be the most populist in terms of people's capitalism. However, the majority of those with Barclays PEPs have been lump-sum investors, and 80 per cent. of them have invested the full £2,400. Overall, 40 per cent. of those using the plans are either higher rate taxpayers or those paying capital gains tax in substantial amounts already. This means that the benefits to be gained from PEPs have been enjoyed mainly, as the Opposition warned last year, by those who already have capital gains tax commitments. In other words, it has been used principally as a tax-free shelter to those who are already better off. I make that point not to criticise personal equity plans but to show the priority that divides the two sides of the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow spoke about the difficulty facing one of his constituents who had had the prescriptions he used to use withdrawn because the drug was not on the Government drugs list. We had an announcement a couple of weeks ago that some £10 million was to be raised by increasing prescription charges. I estimate that on the personal equity plan tax shelters, those people already paying capital gains tax—in other words, those using PEP simply as a straight means of avoiding capital gains tax commitments—will benefit in this tax year by about £15 million to £20 million. That would be enough to pay for the sort of thing my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow was talking about.

There are differences not just in small measures but in the broader scope as well. When the Financial Secretary spoke yesterday he mentioned the wider share ownership survey that has been prepared by the stock exchange and the Treasury. I do not want to go into detail about that today. But let us assume in the Government's favour that 20 per cent. of the adult population has benefited from the privatisation measures.

That still leaves 80 per cent. of the population that is losing unfairly in two ways. First, they are losing in a way that reduces the money coming into the Exchequer, therefore, reducing the benefit that they could receive. They lose because there has been a policy—it must be a deliberate policy—of under-valuing the assets sold off in privatisation. The figures are too stark. On British Airways, British Gas and British Telecom alone the under-valuation on the first day of trading amounts to over £2,000 million. I am aware that when share issues come on the market there will always be a premium. People will always want a small premium in order to make the share issue go with a buzz. That is understandable. The average share issue premium for 1986 on major share issues was 7 per cent. On privatisation issues, the average premium on the first day of trading has been 77 per cent. I could understand the Government being wrong by a few per cent. but I cannot understand them being wrong by a factor of 11.

In that under-valuation, let no one think that the benefit has gone even to the 20 per cent. of the population; it has not. Some £350 million first-day profit was made by foreign institutions such as Japanese and American banks and so on. Indeed, it is interesting that when Japan privatised its telecommunications network a couple of weeks ago it did not allow any foreign participation. Yet we allow a windfall profit of hundreds of millions of pounds to be made by foreign speculators.

We lose in a different way. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) is absolutely right. There is a feeling, particularly on Government Benches — I dare say it has percolated through to the general population —that there are only winners in privatisation and no losers. They feel that it is a bonanza where everyone wins. But, when we privatise one of the assets such as gas, telecommunications or British Airways, we lose the income from that asset. The figures for the income we have lost from those assets, based on net dividend payments for the coming financial year — that is the fair basis on which to do it—are, for British Airways £43 million, for British Telecom £256 million and for British Gas £262 million. The total is over £560 million. We have lost that income and that is why we say that when the Government treat the sale of assets — as they do — as a deduction from running costs in Government accounts—as part of their revenue—that is not merely wrong in accounting terms; it is criminally irresponsible in terms of safeguarding the nation's assets.

Mr. Gow: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that when the last Labour Government sold shares in BP they treated the receipts from the sale of those shares in a way identical to the way in which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is treating receipts from sales of public assets?

Mr. Blair: The total of the BP share sale was a few hundred million pounds. The Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service dealt with the specific point that the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) rightly raises. The Committee said that that was fair enough if one was talking about a one-off programme or a few hundred million pounds. That must be right. But with this Government we are talking about privatisation that runs into tens of billions of pounds, and it cannot be right to treat the proceeds from capital assets simply as a deduction against running costs. That income could be used to pay for better pensions, better child benefit, a better National Health Service and better education. The income from the sale of those assets has been lost. It is a matter of choice.

Mr. Pike: The point that one must emphasise and that my hon. Friend is making, although I do not think that Conservative Members accept it, is that we do not lose that income for just one year but lose increasing amounts year after year.

Mr. Blair: My hon. Friend is right. That is why in the long term the sale of assets is such an incompetent way of raising money. In the course of the Budget debate the Government told us that there will be no new schemes or new programmes to assist the unemployed. The Chancellor says that the best hope for the unemployed is the Government's record on the economy. It is time that we looked at that record. In the past few days several bumper myths have been put about by the Chancellor and by Treasury Ministers about the British economy. The first is that we have some sort of glorious growth rate in the economy that is a marvel and the envy of the Western world.

In the 1986 edition of a set of statistics called the "United Kingdom National Accounts", a comparison is made between the growth rates of Britain at various times in the past few decades. In the 1950s the average growth rate was over 2 per cent., in the 1960s it was over 3 per cent., in the 1970s it was over 2 per cent., and in the 1980s it is less than 1·5 per cent. If one looks at the comparative growth figures for Britain and other European Community countries over the entire period of the Government's term of office, one sees that we have one of the worst growth rate records of any major industrial country.

One of the boasts that we heard from the Prime Minister the other day is that we have record exports every year. I was curious about that statistic and asked the Library staff to do some research. Since 1949 there have been only seven occasions when exports have not been at record volumes year on year. Five of those have been under a Tory Government, one was in the year when the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) became Chancellor of the Exchequer in a Labour Government and the last occasion on which it occurred was under the last Labour Government. The average growth in exports under the last Labour Government was about 5 per cent. The average growth in exports under this Government has been only 3 per cent.

[Mr. Blair]

The notion that we are living through some great export boom is farcical, and that is evident when the figures are examined. The important change in Britain over the past few years has not been the level of exports but the level of imports of manufactured goods. We are told by the Prime Minister that we need not worry about what has happened to traditional British manufacturing industry because the new technology industries will come on and provide growth and new hope and give manufacturing impetus to the economy. However, the deficit in manufactured trade is not just on the old traditional industries but on the new technologies too. Not merely have the Government failed to save our traditional industries; they have failed in the creation of new ones. At the present time manufacturing output is still below 1979 levels.

The only crumb of comfort that the Government can take from that picture is their allegation that manufacturing productivity has increased substantially. There may be many reasons why that has happened, but the most significant factor has been the shedding of manufacturing jobs. Also it is right to ascribe the most recent surge in manufacturing activity to the cyclical turn in output as employment lags behind the upturn in manufacturing trade—an upturn brought about by the lowering of the exchange rate, which the Government resisted.

A much better guide to the health of manufacturing is manufacturing output, because the total output determines whether Britain can pay its way. When we compare ourselves with other EC countries in that respect, we see that none has done worse than Britain. From 1979 to 1986, we have been at the bottom of the table. That is the measure of what has happened. When the Opposition argue about manufacturing industry it is not simply in the context of the loss of manufacturing employment; it is in the context of manufacturing as a wealth-generating base to the economy. Unless we build that wealth-generating base, discussion about the level of services or spending on services will be otiose, because we shall not have earned enough money to spend.

The Government say that, because of their prudent financial policies and especially because of the cut in borrowing, they can reduce interest rates. The right hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe) and the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell) said an eloquent elegy over the deathbed of monetarism earlier tonight, but it is as well to remember that monetarism was supposed to reduce interest rates. When the hon. Member for Eastbourne took a trip down monetarist memory lane, he tried to tell us that the Government were running into trouble on the money supply and that interest rates might have to be increased.

Mr. Leighton: He is a recidivist.

Mr. Blair: He should go for a long period of rehabilitation.

Even with the reduction during the past couple of weeks—we had to prod the Government into that—interest rates are still the highest of any of our major industrial competitors. Why do we have such high interest rates? Why are we starting to reduce them from that high level? Is it the case, as the Government have tried to say, that public expenditure is too high? From the Red Book, we discover that that is not the case. Indeed, the Government's reason for interest rates being high has nothing to do with public spending or public borrowing. As the hon. Member for Loughborough confirmed, the Government's reason is this:

"Private sector borrowing has been rising and is now over 10 per cent. of GDP. It has clearly contributed more than public borrowing to upward pressure on real interest rates."

The culprit is not public borrowing, but private borrowing.

The significance of that fact is that we are living through a boom in consumer expenditure which is dangerously out of control. Indeed, one need not be a monetarist to ascribe importance to the fact that the £2·9 billion increase in bank lending demonstrates the amount of consumer debt that is growing in the British economy.

Mr. Dorrell: Is the hon. Gentleman therefore advocating an increase in interest rates to choke off that increase in consumer credit?

Mr. Blair: No. The hon. Gentleman said that if there are high levels of personal debt and high personal borrowing, the Chancellor was right to cut Government borrowing to compensate. However, we have such high personal levels of borrowing because the Government have encouraged that level of personal consumption and debt. The worst thing that one could possibly do in such circumstances is to cut income tax, as that will fuel the consumer boom further. The real case against income tax cuts as the best economic policy for the macro-economy is not simply on the grounds that a reduction in unemployment would come better with increased public expenditure, a point made by many of my hon. Friends, but that all that income tax cuts do is fuel the consumer boom and put even greater strains on private borrowing. As the hon. Member for Loughborough said, that is the reason why the Chancellor felt that he had to cut public borrowing.

Mr. Dorrell: I am sorry to persist with the point, but the hon. Gentleman has expressed concern about the rate of consumer borrowing. He has rejected an increase in interest rates as the way to choke it off. How else does he propose to do it?

Mr. Blair: By ensuring that any room for manoeuvre that the Chancellor has is directed to planned public investment, not to a consumer boom through income tax cuts, which will simply make borrowing worse. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) said, tax cuts will go on imported consumer goods. Hon. Members do not need to take my word for that. It is thought by others as well. Before the Budget, a pamphlet was prepared by a body called the Tory Reform Group, of which some of my hon. Friends may have heard. It says:

"A cut in the real burden of income tax will result in significant extra personal expenditure on foreign goods. This will create new jobs for our competitors and widen the current account trade deficit in 1987, which will already be causing political damage. This is not the year to boost consumer spending."

The patrons of this Tory Reform Group include not merely several senior Conservative Members of Parliament but several Cabinet Ministers, including the Paymaster General. I agree with what he and his right hon. and hon. Friends say. The difficulty is that he seems somewhat schizophrenic. Part of him is a member of the Tory Reform Group and the other part is a Cabinet Minister. The worst thing that we can have is income tax cuts, which will fuel the consumer boom even more.

The recent interest rate cut may not be as long lived as industry, home owners and my hon. Friends will hope for. The Red Book gives a clue to the real state of the British economy as opposed to the state set out in the Chancellor's Budget. If one calculates back from the housing retail price index the Government's projections of what the interest rates will be in a year, one sees that at the very most the Government are planning for a 0·5 per cent. reduction. One should treat with a great deal of caution not merely whether the income tax cuts will last but whether the fall in interest rates will last.

The case made by my hon. Friends is clear. It is that income tax cuts are the worst thing that can be done for the economy and the least effective way to provide jobs. The Treasury model has been decried by the Paymaster General recently, but every round of the Treasury model shows that planned public expenditure is a much more effective way to produce jobs than cuts in income tax. The Paymaster General may decry models, but the figures in the Red Book, which cover practically every aspect of the economy, are done on the basis of Treasury models.

It is not simply Treasury models that tell us that income tax cuts are the least effective way of creating jobs. Common sense tells us that as well. Durham county council put forward a programme a few months ago on harnessing unemployed people in its area to the needs that required to be met in that area. It showed that, if one used unemployed people, long term and otherwise, and related the unemployed resources to the needs, money was saved in the long run because there was no need to pay unemployment benefit and again there was a benefit on taxes.

Hon. Members on the Government Benches say that our job creation programme is simply about providing jobs, not meeting needs. That is not so. We started in that programme from the point of view that every single job had to meet a specific need. There are literally millions of jobs to be done in the British economy. The Government's task is to put the two together, people's needs and the resources available in the form of unemployed people.

Two factors underlie the Government's judgment in this Budget. The first is a cynical belief that people will prefer cash in their hands to better public services—better education, better health, better training. In other words, the Government believe that the short-termism that afflict them afflicts also the British people. We dispute that. We also dispute the second premise of the Budget, that the divisions to which the Government are indifferent can be tolerated for another few years. These divisions are set up everywhere by the Government: between home owners and council house tenants, between those in BUPA and those who use the National Health Service, between share owners and those who have none, between the employed and the unemployed, between the comfortably off and the poor. It is a Budget about division that addresses itself simply to that one part of divided Britain.

No one can claim that the priorities of this Budget are about the lower, worse-off half of Britain. When it is described as a prudent Budget, prudent for whom? Prudence is a game that is played by the comfortable part of Britain while the other half stands outside with noses pressed against the window. The Government's tactical consideration is that there are enough on the inside to vote down those on the outside.

This was a Budget for a divided kingdom. It will be the duty of the Labour party on coming to office to reunite our kingdom.

9.32 pm

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): One thing on which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and I are agreed is that the closing speeches on the Thursday night of the Budget debate are one of the high points of the parliamentary year. It has been a vigorous debate and it is perfectly clear that at no stage did anyone have to be brought in from the highways and byways to speak. It is a pleasure to be debating opposite the hon. Gentleman, although I know that he will forgive me if I say that his pre-Budget headline of "The Bribes of March" was ill-advised on two counts. First, in the light of my right hon. Friend's eminently cautious Budget, it was a poor piece of forecasting and, secondly, at this moment in the history of the Labour party it seemed curious for a Member of the Labour Front Bench to draw attention, even indirectly, to the opening speeches of "Julius Caesar" and those memorable lines:

> "The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
> But in ourselves, that we are underlings."

The hon. Member was, however, in good company on the issue of forecasting in that his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) yesterday quoted the Labour party's favourite stockbrokers, Phillips and Drew, as judging that the > "markets are holding their breath for an early election and expects an immediate reversal of policy afterwards". — [Official Report, 18 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 954.]

What Mr. Bill Martin, the chief economist of Phillips and Drew, actually said yesterday in the aftermath of the Budget was:

> "Our earlier fears that policies would have to be thrown sharply into reverse post-election to cool the economy down have duly subsided. When tighter policies do start post-election they will be more akin to a touch on the brakes than a throwing out of the anchor."

That sober judgment is a broadside below the water line for the bizarre and unconvincing thesis that the leadership of the Opposition have been peddling—that the Budget is part of a "cut and run" strategy.

It is all of a piece with their soubriquet of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor as "lucky Lawson". Ever since Napoleon made luck one of the criteria for being a marshal the world has regarded luck as a blessing rather than a disadvantage. In any case it is only appropriate in the case of my right hon. Friend under one definition. My right hon. Friend's Budget is a culmination of years of sensible policy. The only ground for calling him lucky is under that definition of luck that says it occurs when planning meets opportunity.

I have been genuinely lucky under a wider definition. All of us bring to the House the impedimenta of our past careers. For my part, the 18 years before I joined the Government were spent entirely as an employer in a small business in the private sector, with all the rewards and tribulations that are involved in sustaining employment, in good times and in bad — but above all with a profound familiarity with the statutory paperwork with which small business men have to cope. I therefore count myself peculiarly fortunate, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe) said, to have been the Minister responsible to Parliament for

[Mr. Peter Brooke]

Customs and Excise at a time when my right hon. Friend felt able to announce such far-reaching reforms of VAT in the interests of small business.

Over a score of hon. Members on both sides of the House have welcomed my right hon. Friend's announcement about VAT and cash accounting even if the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was wholly mistaken yesterday in thinking that the Opposition were its progenitors in last year's Finance Bill. Of course, in addition my right hon. Friend announced an optional scheme of annual accounting for those businesses with a turnover of up to £250,000 so that they will need to make only one VAT return in a year instead of the four required at present. This will reduce the form-filling burden.

The Government have increased the VAT registration threshold to the limit allowed under Community law. There is much pressure to increase it further, but it is only fair to point out that there was strong opposition to our earlier proposal, which we have dropped, to require businesses with a turnover below the threshold — of which there are 250,000 — to deregister. Our collection system is cost-effective: £600 million of net VAT yield is collected from small businesses with a turnover of under £50,000 and the cost of collecting all VAT — the whole £23 billion — is only £200 million.

I am pleased to announce a further package of measures on Inland Revenue matters to help small firms and the self-employed. The aim is to offer further advice and guidance on topics where small firms say they most need it. There are three main areas. First, there will be help with decisions on employment status such as whether a person is employed or self-employed for tax and national insurance contriubution purposes. Secondly, there will be help for employers in the operation of PAYE and national insurance contributions. Thirdly, there will be help and guidance about the Inland Revenue's investigations of small traders' business accounts. There are further details in an Inland Revenue press notice which is being issued today.

Any steps that we can take to ease administrative burdens on business are important and worthwhile. This practical package of help and advice deserves a warm welcome from small firms and the self-employed. Entrepreneurial small businesses are very important for job creation. Tax reductions increase incentives and demand from the local economy. So much for the charge that this Budget has nothing to do with the unemployed.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary gave a trailer yesterday that I would expand tonight on profit-related pay, a subject eminently suited to today's debate. The key to continued strengthening of economic performance is increased adaptability and flexibility. Performance has been damaged for too long by trends towards increased rigidities throughout the system. Business cannot survive in that atmosphere. Whether we like it or not, the world is rapidly changing. If United Kingdom businesses are to prosper we must be able to respond quickly.

Major steps have already been taken, including deregulation. But major rigidities in the labour market, and in particular in pay determination, still exist. The pay of most employees is still little influenced by how well businesses are performing. This often means that the only way firms can adjust to difficult trading conditions is by redundancies, and the work force has no direct personal incentive to help generate, and then share in the results of, improved performance. Many of our more successful businesses have already realised the need to break out of that trap.

The right way forward is unlikely to be identical for all. There is an existing and continuing role for employee share schemes, but profit-related pay has a major part to play because it means that the work force automatically has a direct interest in helping businesses succeed. A measure of flexibility in total wages means that employees share the rewards of successful performance and receive some protection from the threat to continued employment when conditions are difficult. It will improve motivation, incentives and long-term rewards for all.

The proposal follows on from the Green Paper. The great majority of responses favoured such a move. All private sector employees, other than controlling directors, will be eligible for this new relief once they are included in a registered PRP scheme.

The essential requirements that schemes must satisfy to qualify for tax relief boil down to three points. First, there must be a clear relationship between PRP and profits. Secondly, the schemes must last for at least a year. Thirdly, PRP must be a minimum proportion of total pay, at least 5 per cent. if the prospect is that profits are unchanged.

Like any new proposal, it is bound to look complicated at first sight, but it is designed to operate as simply as possible. In some respects, details have been simplified since the Green Paper — for example, the registration requirement. As long as the basic requirements are met, there will be great flexibility in designing schemes to meet the needs of individual businesses. It can operate at company or sub-unit level and relate PRP to a share of profits or to year-on-year changes in profits. There is flexibility on the frequency of PRP payments, and freedom over the treatment of joiners and leavers.

Before PRP can be paid, schemes must be registered. Therefore, I urge early planning of schemes. A press release on key features is available now, and in a few weeks employers will be invited to place themselves on the Revenue mailing list for detailed guidance notes following the Finance Bill receiving Royal Assent. I encourage employers to act now to get the benefits as early as possible.

PRP schemes offer major advantages to employers, employees and to the economy at large, even without tax relief. The proposal to introduce this relief, for which there is no time limit, reflects the Government's wish to promote urgently needed flexibility. This is underlined by the fact that the relief which is now proposed — half of profit-related pay within specified limits — is double the rate envisaged in the Green Paper.

Even if PRP is only 5 per cent. the relief for a married man on average earnings is equivalent to 1p off the basic rate of income tax. If PRP is at 20 per cent., then, as the Chief Secretary said yesterday, the maximum amount eligible for relief will be equivalent to 4p off the basic rate.

I urge employers and employees to seize this opportunity to make a major contribution to the long-term strength and adaptability of their businesses and the economy at large.

Profit-related pay was one subject of which last year's Budget was a harbinger. Another scheme which comes to fruition this year, after being launched last year, is payroll giving. As the Minister responsible for pay in the Civil Service, I want to say a brief word about payroll giving in the Civil Service. In his 1986 Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced a new scheme for tax relief for payroll giving to charities. It enables employers to contract with a registered payroll-giving agency which will distribute employees' donations to the charities of their choice. Employees then receive tax relief on donations, up to a total of £120 a year.

Like many others, civil servants are keen to participate in this scheme, which benefits charities and the people who give to them. In December, my right hon. Friend announced that the Government, as employer, would participate. We are moving quickly to set up a scheme for the 216,000 people who are paid through the largest Civil Service payroll system, which is centred in Chessington.

On 11 March, the Inland Revenue published the names of the payroll agencies that are already registered. Within days the Treasury had written to all the organisations in England and Wales registered as payroll agencies, and to one other that has announced its intention to seek registration, asking whether they would be interested in tendering for the scheme that we plan to set up this summer. We look forward to their responses.

I shall turn now to the questions that I have been asked during the debate. One that was raised by the hon. Members for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), and for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) related to British Petroleum. I am happy to clarify that matter. As my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary announced in the House yesterday, the Government will sell their remaining holding of shares in BP, subject to market conditions, during the 1987-88 financial year. The proceeds will be paid in instalments, of which only the first will be due in 1987-88. The sale will be a further major contribution to our policy of encouraging wider share ownership and reducing Government involvement in the private sector.

I was asked about the Budget arithmetic. The Government announced their estimate of £5 billion a year from privatisation proceeds from 1987-88 onwards in the November autumn statement, and again in the January public expenditure White Paper. As the Red Book makes clear, the same figure was taken into account in the Budget in setting the PSBR for 1987-88 and in indicating the PSBR path for later years. The sale of BP shares will not add to this £5 billion a year estimate, but will help contribute to it. It has nothing to do with the future scope for tax cuts.

Mr. Blair: Can the Minister explain why the moment the Government announced the sale of their holding in BP the share price decreased sharply? Is not a reason the fact that it is appreciated that to sell the holding at one go, and partly paid, is a much less competent way of selling it than selling it in tranches, if it is to be sold?

Mr. Brooke: The behaviour and reaction of the market will be analysed, but, obviously, it does not relate to the specific announcement that I have just made.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth spoke about the low paid. I know that he moved from the Treasury to the DHSS and he will recall that the new social security system which will operate from April 1988 is based on net income. This will mean that rate cuts and allowance increases will in future have similar effects on people in the poverty and unemployment traps. He asked about public expenditure, but, as he knows, that comes at a different moment in the rhythm of the year. In response to his comments on pensions, the average annual rate of growth of income for pensioners has been significantly higher under the Government since 1979 than it was between 1974 and 1979. It is higher even on retirement pension plus income-related benefits. It is much higher on occupational pensions. What increases it in particular is the fact that there was a negative return to pensioners from investment income in the 1970s because of the disastrous effect of inflation.

My right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) asked about tobacco. There has been a 51 per cent. real increase in the duties on tobacco since we came to office in 1979, compared with a decrease in duty under the Labour Government. Manufacturers pleaded with us about the effect that our recent increases have been having on imported cigarettes. The hon. Member for Sedgefield was among those hon. Members who approached me and asked for a year off and such we gave to manufacturers. The presumption has always been that duties will be adjusted in line with the movement in prices from one year to the next—that is a medium-term judgment.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), who is not with us, referred to the 1 per cent. of restart members who get jobs. That is the percentage of those who get a job straight from the interview. The Department of Employment does not follow up each interviewee, but a large number get jobs subsequently. The programme is only a first start.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner) asked about the higher rates of tax and my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne took up the subject of the marginal rate of tax. I draw their attention to the remark of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the Financial Times on 5 January, that we may well need to bring our top rate down further in the next Parliament.

There were speeches by northern Members, including the hon. Members for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for St. Helens, South, tempered by a vigorous speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan), making a plea about the state of the north compared with the rest of the country. By chance I come to the debate as someone whose father in 1934 wrote a series of articles in The Times which are always described by historians of that period as having been the genesis of regional development policy. They related to the county of Durham where the constituency of the hon. Member for Sedgefield is located. Anyone who reads those articles would say they had been written about human beings in the manner that the hon. Member for Jarrow was discussing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) said that the prosperity that we are enjoying in this country is spreading regionally and provincially and he quoted a whole series of statistics about advertising for vacancies around the country. There is no question but that prosperity is moving through the country as the economy expands. Since 1985, in the north-east and north-west, 31 major hospital buildings have been put up, 25 are under construction and 26 have been approved.

Since April 1985 eight roads schemes costing £40 million have been completed in the north-east and north-west and 45 schemes costing £482 million are in the forward programe. My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) referred to the national insurance contribution. He has a new and unexpected ally in the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, who said on 29 April 1985:

"the Labour party has never believed that such changes to the cost of labour and employment could contribute to the solution of the central problem of the economy, which is the reduction in unemployment."

He also said:

"We have never believed that an adjustment in the national insurance contributions could be what the Chancellor regards as something synonymous with or comparable to a tax incentive which would in itself create more jobs."—[Official Report, 29 April 1985; Vol. 78, c. 35.]

The hon. Member for Burnley asked what happens when the privatised assets run out. That seems to be the same sort of rhetorical question that was asked earlier about what happens when the oil revenues run out. My right hon. Friend has demonstrated in the past 12 months with great vividness how strongly the economy can carry on even when oil revenues have been diminished. The hon. Member for Burnley also produced the curious suggestion that the Chancellor had kept the tax cut down to 2p so that he could reduce it further after the election. That suggestion is at somewhat puzzling variance, as were his other remarks, with the position that the Opposition Front Bench has been taking, that as soon as the election is over we shall be confronted by a crisis.

The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), in addition to his more general remarks about the north, returned to the subject of Bradford universities and the cuts of 1981. Since the cuts occurred in non-scientific and technological subjects in the universities that he quotes, that argument is becoming a little tired and, considering the vigour with which those universities have recovered, we can now put it behind us.

My hon. Friend the Member for Delyn asked a specific question about redundant Courtaulds workers. The proposal in the Budget is for tax relief to be available from 6 April for training provided by ex-employers as well as current employers. Ex-Courtaulds employees may qualify but that would depend on the particular circumstances. The scheme will be most useful when retraining can be offered before redundancy, or very quickly afterwards.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay), who joined my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell) in welcoming the falling unemployment, referred to gaming machines. The rise in duty there is simply taking indexation back to 1982, but I will look at what he said on alternative targets.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield referred to PEPs and recited various details about them. I think that after two and a half months it is a little early to be coming to firm conclusions about how that scheme is going. One recalls that it has taken 10 years, since the Finance Bill of 1978, to climb from the 30 companies that first started out with profit-sharing schemes that year to the total well in excess of 1,000 that we have today. In terms of Barclays' initial tranche, 23 per cent. were totally new shareholders. That is a remarkable statistic considering how much share ownership has grown over the last eight years, and the Inland Revenue survey suggests an average investment of £1,600.

I listened to the hon. Member for Sedgefield on the subject of privatisation and came to the conclusion that the way in which he was addressing himself to that subject was based on Marshal Foch's principle of attacking so that one did not have to defend. One of the questions to which the whole country is interested to learn the answer is what the Labour party proposes to do about those operations that have already been privatised.

I found the hon. Gentleman's argument curious because he criticised the Government for selling off assets that were income-producing when the Opposition constantly criticise the Government for the increase in net overseas assets and the income flow that the country receives from them. I thought that the reply that the hon. Gentleman gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne was curious. Essentially, he said that whether the principle was right or wrong would depend on the amount of money involved. Since the amount of money involved in the Labour Government sale was £564 million—of course it would be a much larger sum today than that—I did not find his argument wholly convincing.

The hon. Gentleman quoted the British growth rate as against others. We are claiming our relative performance against other economies. The United Kingdom economy has grown faster than that of any other major country in the European Community.

Mr. Blair rose——

Mr. Brooke: I will give way, but we are short of time.

Mr. Blair: If it is right to study comparative rates of growth—Britain and other comparable countries—is it not also right to judge inflation in those terms?

Mr. Prescott: Not tonight.

Mr. Brooke: In this instance I will take my cue from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and agree, "Not tonight".

With regard to the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Sedgefield, about productivity and output, it is our performance in productivity that has enabled us to achieve our economic growth. Since 1983 our export growth has been running at 5½ per cent. per annum, as against 3¼ per cent. under the Labour Government. Of central concern is what would be the effect on interest rates if Labour was, improbably, to gain power and brought in its suggested borrowing plans.

I owe an answer to the hon. Member for Colne Valley about corporation tax receipts. The receipts in 1986-87 are affected by investment in 1985 and not, as I believe the hon. Gentleman was alluding to, in 1986. As time moves on it is increasingly difficult to disentangle the effects of the 1984 reform from other factors influencing both profitability and corporation tax paid on those profits. The corporation tax reform that reduced the marginal rates was one of a number of measures to increase the efficiency, dynamism and well-being of the corporate sector. The increase in company profits speaks for itself. In the longer run, when the reform has worked its way through, it will mean a reduction in the tax burden borne by companies. The investment intentions survey suggests a 6 per cent. volume increase in investment in 1987 by the main industrial sectors.

We have been discussing practical matters today. I believe that the whole House will have read with interest the elegiac comments of Mr. Samuel Brittan about the speech made by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) yesterday. The right hon. Gentleman has just become the biographer of Baldwin, but in an earlier age he was the biographer of the first Earl of Oxford and Asquith. His speech yesterday was riddled with the doctrine "wait and see." Indeed he reminded me of A. J. Balfour's remarks about the first earl:

"his lucidity of style is a positive disadvantage when he has nothing to say."

If one adapts that to the right hon. Gentleman's speech and the alliance's attitude to income tax, it is clear that it is a disadvantage too when one wants to avoid saying something.

As the Walrus said:

"The time has come"—

I quote from the alliance's new pamphlet—

"To talk of many things: Of shoes—and ships—and sealing wax—Of cabbages—and kings—And why the sea is boiling hot—And whether pigs have wings."

But if one does not wish to talk about income tax, then "why the sea is boiling hot—And whether pigs have wings" is the epitome of the alliance's speculation. Unfortunately, not all of the right hon. Gentleman's supporters possess his adeptness.

If the alliance choose to talk of

"why the sea is boiling hot—And whether pigs have wings" the Government prefers the more mundane subject of "shoes—and ships—and sealing wax", the title of last year's bicentenary history of the Board of Trade.

Tonight I have one last announcement to make about the disclosure of importers' details. British industry is now well placed to compete effectively in both home and export markets. But one factor that will influence their success is the information available about their competitors in the market place. One particular suggestion, put forward cogently and most recently by the economic development committee for the knitting industry, has been that information should be made available from the records of Customs and Excise about the names and addresses of importers of individual products into the United Kingdom. Such a move would be consistent with the aim of facilitating the free flow of goods and information within the European internal market. The idea merits thorough examination, and officials will be consulting industry and commerce about such a move over coming months. Should the consultation suggest that the balance of advantage lies in favour of the extension of information currently made available, the necessary change in the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 could be introduced in a future Finance Bill. If it is subsequently decided to go ahead, the aim would be to legislate in the Finance Act 1988 for implementation at the start of 1989.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Occupational Pension Funds

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Brooke.]

10.1 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): There are many reasons why the House should not yet adjourn but should give consideration to the responsibilities of occupational pension fund trustees.

Here are some of the reasons: the changes in the tax treatment of pension funds in last year's Budget and in this; the reforms of the law, which offer great new opportunities for employers and employees to accumulate capital to provide for retirement in different ways; the spate of recent takeovers and company amalgamations in which pension funds are often conspicuously involved; and the very rapid growth in the value of the assets of the funds held in trust, coupled with the fall in current inflation and inflationary expectations. All these are creating a new context for pension fund managers or, as I prefer to call them, pension fund trustees.

The Occupational Pensions Board has been too economical, in my view, in the guidance that it has been giving lately to trustees in these conditions. The House should therefore speak clearly on the various questions which trustees now have to ask themselves, bearing in mind that approved occupational pension funds enjoy valuable tax concessions because they are considered to perform an important public service. The trustees have an obligation to act in a way that is genuinely in the public interest.

I would like to express my own opinions, which I hope my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will be prepared to endorse. I know that they are widely shared on both sides of the House. First, I would like to look at the public sector schemes, to see if they provide an example. The Civil Service scheme is a good scheme, firstly because it is very generous. I believe that its real cost to the taxpayer is some 17·5 per cent.—or even more—on top of public sector wages and salaries. Secondly, it is a good scheme because it is fully transferable over a very wide area of employment, for the whole length of the early leaver's service. In both these ways, it is still well ahead of the great majority of private sector schemes and sets an example that they ought to follow.

I personally dislike the fact that the Civil Service scheme is a final salary scheme, that is to say, a scheme which allocates benefits preferentially to the high-paid rather than to the low-paid. That is a feature of all final salary schemes. I find it objectionable. On principle, I prefer money purchase, and I hope that employers and pension fund trustees, in considering how to institute or to improve their schemes, will look favourably at the money purchase principle, at least for the core of the pension entitlement. A final salary scheme can possibly then be set up on top, as a frill at the edges of the conditions of employment, to attract high fliers or for some other purpose.

Another feature of the public sector schemes which I do not like is the availability of a tax-free lump sum. I am not ignoring the popularity and the advantages of a lump sum option, but I believe that it is now being exploited in a way which is not part of the real object of pension schemes, which is to provide a reliable annuity for members in retirement and for their closest dependants. I would therefore prefer to see the tax-free element in the lump sum entitlement phased out in respect of entitlement accruing in years of future service. However that may be, I would like the trustees to make the provision of income their priority, rather than lump sums. I believe that would also represent the view of the great majority of members.

I look forward to a time when private sector schemes will provide benefits as generous as can be obtained right up to the limits which prevent the tax advantages from being exploited unacceptably. That is the best way to prevent members from a humiliating decline in their standards of life after retirement or possibly lapsing into the need to apply for supplementary benefit.

The provision of better occupational pension annuities in the private sector is not just a matter for employers: it is very much a matter for the trustees as well in the large number of schemes which are currently technically over-funded in relation to their ascertainable commitments.

What should the trustees do—and what should they avoid — if they have a surplus in their fund? The Occupational Pensions Board looks favourably at an increase in the benefits, and that is surely right. In my opinion, the opportunities for trustees to improve pension benefits are not exhausted until they have done all of the following things.

First, they should have increased pensions in payment fully to uprate their real purchasing power to the point where they have lost nothing at all through inflation since the date of award. Very few schemes do that, although very many could now afford to do so.

Secondly, they should give full measure to those people who have left the scheme before the normal date of award in search of other employment or through early retirement to protect them from a decline in the purchasing power of their retained asset.

Thirdly, they should uprate the benefits to members currently in service as far as the employer is able to sustain such a commitment in the long term.

Next, they should pay over the full accrued value of the entitlement of the early leavers who ask for a transfer to a new fund into a personal scheme.

I defined in an amendment to the Finance Bill on Report on 17 July last year the way in which the transfer value should be ascertained. I said that it should be "the sum that would be required by the withdrawing member's scheme for the purpose of admitting a new member of the same age, sex and pensionable remuneration as the withdrawing member in order to credit him with the same number of years of pensionable service as the withdrawing member." — [Official Report, 17 July 1986; Vol 101, c. 1228.]

Of course, that formula would apply only in final salary schemes or other, as I think curiously misnamed, "defined benefit" schemes.

My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, in replying to the debate last year, undertook —if I recall correctly—to consult the DHSS about my recommendation. However, I think that he has not yet done so. In the meantime, few if any defined benefit schemes are paying transfer values which fully cover the whole of the early leaver's accrued entitlement and they ought to do that.

I made my maiden speech in 1968 on this subject and in 1969 I introduced a Protection of Pension Rights Bill, which would have given effect to the transferability of pension rights in full on very much the lines that I am recommending now. I suppose that, 20 years after I made that first move, we may now get near to what I have been fighting for all these years.

I would strongly endorse the view of the DHSS that pension schemes should be put on a strictly equal unisex basis. The simple way to achieve that result, bearing in mind that women live longer than men and may retire earlier, while men are much more likely to leave a surviving spouse, is to balance the spouse's benefit so as to produce an equal actuarial entitlement for men and women employees. Schemes which do not give equal treatment or do not give awards to surviving spouses adequately should hasten to amend their rules accordingly.

Those are some of the ways in which trustees can put funds which are surplus to current commitment to good use. I want to state two very clear opinions as to the nature of trustees' responsibilities in other situations. They should recognise that they are holding funds in trust for the members and other specified beneficiaries of the scheme. They should not, for instance, indulge in self-investment in the shares of the sponsoring employer, to an extent, I believe, greater than 1 per cent. The trustees have no obligation to return surplus funds to the sponsoring employer, because they are indeed trustees. They are not administrators with a divided loyalty and they are certainly not appointees with a primary loyalty to the employer. That is a matter which deserves to be clarified and made extremely explicit for the guidance of the many people who find themselves acting as trustees, but who are not certain of their responsibilities and status.

In my view, therefore, there is never any justification for making a return payment of money out of trust to the sponsoring employer or anyone else, except in the rare circumstance where the fund is greater than is needed to pay the maximum benefits permitted for approved schemes under the tax rules. The trustees must find another way. This is particularly relevant in takeover and merger situations. Secondly, they should regard the employer's contribution as a form of deferred pay which is due on top of current wages and salaries whether the fund is flush with cash or not. A contribution holiday for the employer is therefore difficult if not impossible to justify, because it constitutes a cut in wages. A contribution holiday for the employee is also unacceptable because it is just a way of encouraging the members to live on their capital.

The reason why schemes are overfunded is almost certainly in part that they are holding funds which have grown as big as they are because of the tax concessions. They should be held for the purpose for which the tax concessions were granted, remembering that part of the money belongs in effect to the taxpayer. That is money which is held in trust but which has accumulated because of the existence of very substantial tax advantages; it will be recovered for the benefit of taxpayers at the time when the pensions are paid out. The principle on which all these schemes are established is, "Save now, pay tax later:" That is an invaluable principle on which we should build. The schemes pay tax later when the benefits are put into award, and at that point the taxpayer recovers that share of the fund which was in effect the taxpayer's property all along.

In this connection, I should like to censure with particular emphasis the very bad suggestion by Philips that its employees should take a contribution holiday and that their wages and salaries should be adjusted accordingly. What is proposed is an utterly improper use of pension trust money and amounts to a barefaced attempt to take money out of the capital account and put it into the current account at the employees' expense. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will join hon. Members on both sides of the House who are shocked at this appalling proposal. I trust, too, that that great Dutch company will drop the idea immediately and that it will not be followed by any other company in Britain.

An unfortunate phrase in a recent Philips advertisement caught my eye in The Times of 12 March. It states:

"In today's financial jungle we have a number of unfair advantages".

A firm of the standing and reputation of Philips ought not to exploit its employees by making such a proposal. It may have the unfair advantage of a very satisfactorily funded pension scheme. It may also have a reputation as an excellent employer, I am sure it has. Nevertheless, the idea should not have been conceived and certainly should not have been proposed to the employees.

To make certain what the issues are in this and similar cases, the Occupational Pensions Board should immediately put out a guidance note to clarify the matter. I hope it will follow the general lines of the recommendations that I have made today.

10.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Nicholas Lyell): The concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) for the interests of members of occupational pension schemes and the protection of their rights is well established and ought to be better known, although it is widely known among those who understand these matters. He has fought a long and often valiant campaign to improve the lot of the early leaver. The Government have recognised the problems of members of occupational pension schemes who leave before pension age and have done much to remove those problems.

Today, my hon. Friend has drawn attention to the obligations of trustees in the comparatively new situation in which pension funds, though by no means all pension funds, are reported to be in surplus. He has expressed the desire that surpluses should be used to assist beneficiaries, both current and former employees, and the point is one with which I have sympathy. We must, however, set the issue in perspective. Looking back, say, over the period that my hon. Friend has been a Member of the House, one sees that the present situation has not always been the case.

A pension fund surplus can arise due to a number or combination of circumstances. In part it may be due to a decrease in long-term liabilities, or the financial markets may perform better than allowed for by the actuary when assessing the security of the scheme's funding. But markets may also under-perform—my hon. Friend remembers well the period of high inflation during the 1970s—and trustees have a responsibility to ensure that they have planned wisely to meet their obligations in the long term.

Pension schemes are, of course, voluntary arrangements set up by employers to provide benefits to employees. There are wide variations in the types and levels of benefit provided under different schemes. These reflect the employers' expectation of the long-term costs that they expect to be able to afford. A fund may elect to improve transfer values beyond what is required by legislation, or improve benefits generally. It must be borne in mind, however, that if these are long-term commitments with long-term cost implications beyond what the employer could in the long-term afford, they could undermine the security of all scheme members' prospective benefits.

It is clearly desirable that, in cases where a scheme is in surplus, surplus funds should be used to benefit scheme members. We believe it would be wrong to force this option on scheme administrators ahead of all others and regardless of the circumstances. Nevertheless, in many cases we would expect that benefit improvements, particularly increases to pensions already in the course of payment, would indeed be the favoured approach. And we would hope that, wherever the circumstances permit, surpluses should be used in this way.

My hon. Friend has mentioned a particular case involving suspension of contributions into a scheme. I shall not comment in detail on that case, but two points of general application should be made. First, a contribution holiday may, in certain circumstances, be a perfectly proper course of action. It is the case with most benefit-defined schemes that the benefits are financed from the proceeds of investing contributions paid by the employer and—in most cases—the employee throughout working life. The contribution rates are calculated on the basis of an actuarial assumption about a number of factors, including the relationship between the rate of return on the scheme investments and the growth of earnings. The actuary makes a new assessment at regular intervals and, if he finds in the light of experience or changed prospects that the scheme assets and liabilities are not in balance, he may well advise a change in the level of contribution so as to bring them into balance.

The second point is that the duties of the trustees of a pension scheme extend—I know that my hon. Friend will welcome this—to all the members of the scheme. This includes not just the current employees of the company but those retired members who are receiving pensions, and former employees still under pension age who have preserved pensions in the scheme.

My hon. Friend will know that the Government have, in recent years, looked very carefully at the question of whether trust law is a suitable framework for the operation of occupational pension schemes. The decision to set up an occupational pension scheme rests with the employer. While the views of employees and their representatives will no doubt have an influence, it is the employer who decides whether there shall be a scheme, who will be eligible for membership, and the rules under which it is to operate. To qualify for tax exemptions, however, the scheme must be set up under an irrevocable trust. That means that in practice virtually all schemes are set up under such a trust. I believe it would be helpful if I were at this point to set out some of the duties imposed by trust law.

Trust law places a general duty on trustees to act at all times in the best interests of all the members in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed and scheme rules. The trustees are therefore answerable to the members for any breach of that duty. The trustees have the duty of carrying out the terms of the trust, of acting prudently, reasonably, and in good faith, of paying the stipulated benefits, of exercising discretion over other payments and of keeping proper account. In addition, the establishment of a trust fund alienates the funds set aside for pension provision so that they are held separate from the employer's other assets.

If a member or group of members sued the trustees for any breach of trust, the civil sanction which would be available at the High Court would include court orders to secure compliance with the deed of trust, or the appointment of a judicial trustee or, as a last resort, the administration of the trust taken over by the court itself. I must stress that, for the most part, occupational pension schemes pay members their full entitlements under the scheme rules, and in many cases members' expectations about increases of pensions in payment are fully met. Where the trustees of a fund properly feel that they can do so, it is certainly a step that the Government welcome.

Scheme members obviously have a very direct interest in the way their schemes are managed. One of the most important ways in which they may be helped to ensure that trustees are acting in accordance with their obligations and in the best interests of all the members—a matter to which we attach the great importance—is to give them access to information about the way in which the scheme is run. It is in this area that the Government have recently introduced important new measures.

The Social Security Act 1985 and regulations made under it have introduced new requirements on pension schemes to disclose information to members. Broadly speaking, members and those who represent them must have access to the trust deed and scheme rules, and to an annual report which embraces the audited accounts, an actuarial valuation and an investment report, as well as information on the rights of individual members. This gives members and their professional advisers—I invite them all to take note—a real opportunity to scrutinise the degree of skill with which their scheme is being run and the way in which its proceeds are being, or if it be the case are not being, deployed for the fair and balanced benefit of the scheme's members as a whole. I invite all beneficiaries of such schemes to make full use of that opportunity.

The 1985 Act introduced two other important measures to improve the position of scheme members whose pensionable service ends before pension age. These were the revaluation of preserved pensions and the right to a transfer value. The legislation followed a report by the Occupational Pensions Board — "Improved Protection for the Occupational Pension Rights and Expectations of Early Leavers", Cmnd. 8271, published in June 1981— and two consultative documents issued by my Department.

Since 1975 members who leave occupational pension schemes after a minimum period of qualifying service must have a pension preserved for them until normal pension age. That preserved pension was often eroded by inflation and unless the scheme was prepared to allow a transfer to another scheme, the early leaver could do little about it. The improvements introduced in the 1985 Act require a measure of revaluation of preserved pensions in line with the rise in prices, up to a limit of 5 per cent. per annum compound. But the Government have gone further than that. I would not underestimate that, given a Government who believe in keeping inflation down.

It is now a requirement that those who leave a pension scheme after 1 January 1986 shall have the right to a transfer value. That transfer value must be the cash equivalent of the preserved benefits in the scheme, increased to take account of the projected revaluation. The effect of these provisions is that when a member leaves a pension scheme before pension age he has three options. He may leave his preserved pension in the scheme where it will be subject to revaluation, he may have a transfer payment to a new employer's scheme, or he may use the cash equivalent to purchase a deferred annuity with an approved insurance company of his choice.

What is more, the important provisions of the Social Security Act 1986 have to be taken into account. When these provisions come fully into effect, there will be a further option—that of putting the transfer value into a personal pension scheme. The provisions of the 1986 Act will allow employees to withdraw from an employer's scheme to take out a personal pension scheme which will be completely independent of any particular employment. This and other types of pension provision which will be encouraged by the 1986 Act, money-purchase schemes and industry-wide schemes, where early leaver problems do not arise, will be of particular value to those who change jobs frequently. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on Tuesday that from October all members of occupational schemes will be able to make additional voluntary contributions independently of their employer's scheme.

I realise that my hon. Friend thinks that these measures do not go far enough, and he has on more than one previous occasion proposed that a higher value should be placed on transfer payments than that attributable to the preserved benefits. But, as the Occupational Pensions Board said in its report, the choice between a transfer payment and preserved benefits should be financially neutral. Were it not to be so, those early leavers who were entitled to an enhanced transfer payment would have a considerable advantage over those who opted for a preserved benefit. Furthermore, unless the whole basis of funding the scheme were to be changed, it could act against the interests of those scheme members who remain in employment.

In this short debate, I have sought to make the Government's view on occupational pension schemes clear. We believe that it is important to retain the voluntary principle in occupational pensions provision: in relation to the employer who can provide arrangements that he thinks are right in the circumstances of his business and tailored to the needs of his work force, and in giving the individual greater choice in making the pensions arrangements which suit him. We believe that the provisions of trust law provide a framework which is flexible in the variety of arrangements that it will allow and effective in the protection that it affords properly informed members. We believe that the Social Security Acts 1985 and 1986 taken together represent a significant advance. My hon. Friend will recognise from what I have said that the occupational pension scheme is fully free to go far down the route that he would prescribe—and if such schemes, so many of which are very well run, should choose to do so they certainly have the Government's blessing. Where he and I might part company is only in this—that, although we would certainly encourage it, we would not think it right to compel it.

Sir Brandon Rhys-Williams: May I take the opportunity to thank my hon. and learned Friend, who has made an extremely helpful statement of the Government's position. It is gratifying to see how very much progress has been made in the interests of beneficiaries, particularly of early leavers. But, as my hon. Friend supposed, I believe that there is still a distance to go and I shall continue to press my points. I hope, too, that the Occupational Pensions Board will take note of this short debate and will make it very clear to the trustees of occupational pensions schemes where their duties lie.

BILL PRESENTED

PLANNING PERMISSION (DEMOLITION OF HOUSES)

Mr. Hugh Dykes presented a Bill to make it obligatory to apply for planning permission before demolishing a dwelling-house: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 1 May and to be printed. [Bill 20.]

Law and Order

9.35 am

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes the increasing emphasis on prevention in the fight against crime; believes that the development of closer links between the police, the community and industry has an important part to play in both the prevention and detection of crime, including industrial crime; and calls upon the Government to ensure that the range of sentences available to the courts is sufficient to enable them to deal effectively with those who commit crimes.

I am pleased to have drawn first place in the ballot. It is the first time in my eight years in the House that I have been so fortunate. This is a useful opportunity for me and other colleagues to look at this most important subject. The figures published this week on crime in the statistical document from the Home Office show that it is a subject that is most important to the House and the nation. Most colleagues were as horrified as I was to see the figures that show increases in crimes of all types. I was particularly concerned at the figures for offences against the person. There were 126,000 offences of violence against the person recorded in 1986—3 per cent. more than in 1985.

That constant increase in crimes against the person cannot be laid, as some Opposition Members have suggested, at the door of a simple set of Government policies. It must be illustrating huge changes in society's attitude and in people's attitude towards each other. I believe that there is a need for individuals, for people within a family group, for people and families within the community and for the community itself, in its relationship with the institutions, particularly the police, to take responsibility and to see the need for joint action if we are to see a reduction and improvement in that appalling and unhappy situation.

It would be too simple to try to give any one answer to the question — why have crimes increased? It is important to say at the start that one cannot simplify and say that a single matter such as unemployment is the whole reason for the increasing level of violence. The age of offenders and the number of offenders under working age shows clearly that, although unemployment may be one of the factors involved it is certainly not the only factor and cannot be claimed by anybody, other than somebody so simple-minded as to defy belief, to be the only cause for the increase in crime.

Having said how disturbed I am, I should say that the House will have the opportunity shortly during proceedings on the Criminal Justice Bill to debate a number of matters. This morning we should look not only at the problem but at some of the solutions. It disturbs me greatly that we do not have a deterrent in the form of capital punishment, which would be seen by deliberate, evil wrongdoers as a sufficient deterrent to prevent crimes. I would like to recall the words said to me by the Reverend Robert Bradford, who, before his murder at his advice bureau in Belfast, was a Member of this honourable House.

As an ordained Methodist minister his view and advice to me was that there were people of deliberate evil intent and that society had to accept the fact that some people were evil and would commit crimes capriciously and for evil reasons, and that they would be deterred if capital punishment was available to the courts. Since then, I have been firmly convinced that there are people who would be deterred. There are those who argue that crimes of passion and crimes that happen suddenly and not for evil intent will not be deterred by capital punishment, but some will.

Part of the problem is caused by the wrongdoer thinking that society will let him off and take a lenient attitude towards crime. This atmosphere, aided and abetted by the media, and by television in particular, must lead on some occasions to the potential wrongdoer concluding either that crime is not bad or that there is no real penalty against crime. In the letters column of the Daily Telegraph, a prison chaplain says that inmates had told him,

"No-one told us it was wrong."

Unless we stress in all our efforts, led by Government and institutions and fostered by the community and most important, by the family, that there is wrong and evil in certain acts, young people will not grow up to understand the nature of such acts. The ultimate act — that of murder — must surely attract a penalty which instils in the minds of those who might be considering such a crime such fear that they do not commit it.

I understand that we shall have an opportunity to debate this matter before long. I have signed the proposed amendment to the Criminal Justice Bill. I hope that we shall be able to vote on it. I shall vote, as I have on each occasion when the matter has been brought before the House, for the return of capital punishment. The amendment proposes that the death penalty should be available to the courts so that a person convicted by the unanimous verdict of a jury "of the premeditated killing of another person or of knowlingly and intentionally killing another person in a manner, or for a reason, or in circumstances which a reasonable person would consider to be evil, shall suffer death in the manner authorised by law."

I cannot stress enough how important that is in achieving more safety for our citizens. Murder is committed less often than other crimes such as violence, burglary and serious personal injury, but it is that most important example that sets the attitude and the perception of potential wrongdoers about the attitude of society to them. To relinquish the availability of the death penalty to the courts must, in the minds of many potential wrongdoers, indicate that society is kind and lenient and that it will condone crimes such as murder.

I shall now discuss other serious crimes. The figures show that offences against the person have risen by 3 per cent. to over 100,000 a year. That must give rise to great concern about people's attitudes to each other.

Many of us are anxious about the operation of the Bail Act. Serious crimes and murder have been committed by those who should have been in prison at the time and would have been, but for the operation of the Bail Act. They have been allowed their freedom as a result of that Act. I am not criticising the technical decisions by the judiciary. I understand that in most cases, including that which was resolved yesterday concerning the murder of PC Blakelock, the Bail Act is used correctly. However, the operation of the Act has caused huge concern in that and many other instances.

The police request that an individual about to be tried should not be allowed to be free on bail, but that person is granted bail and, whilst on bail, is able to commit other serious offences. I ask for a response from the Minister about the Government's attitude to a fundamental review of the operation of the Bail Act, so that courts are more responsive to requests from the police to keep an accused person in captivity. Such requests should lead to such captivity more often.

Society has a right to expect such crimes as rape to attract penalties that will act as a deterrent. I understand that, statistically, the penalties for rape have increased, but many people believe that penalties for such crimes are too light. In a recent rape case, the sentence imposed was thought to be too lenient and such is the power of our media that that was conveyed to every living room in the country. It resulted in a flood of letters to myself and others. One in a huge pile of letters from constituents says:

"I should like to ask you if some law could be passed on sentences for criminals who rape women."

Another says:

"I am furious about the way judges act in the courts."

Yet another says:

"Criminals must see the reactions of the courts as much as to say, 'Don't do it again, but you must serve two years or thereabouts if you did not mean to do it.'"

That is not my grammar but are the words used in heartfelt letters from constituents.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): In the light of genuine disquiet by the public about cases such as the Ealing vicarage rape case, has not the time come for the House seriously to consider giving to the prosecution the right to appeal against lenient sentences and to give to the Court of Appeal the right to increase sentences to meet the guidelines laid down for judges in the lower courts?

Mr. Mills: My hon. Friend has made the next part of my speech for me. He is right. My hon. Friend's learned knowledge makes him better able to put the point than me. Not to have a mechanism through which lenient sentences can be reviewed is most unhappy.

Another letter from a constituent, using better grammar, states:

"I wish to express my concern at the leniency of sentences passed by Mr. Justice Leonard at the Old Bailey on 2 February. Five years and three years respectively for rape seems inappropriately short when compared with the five years received for aggravated burglary. Natural justice has been ill served by the justices. I hope that you will use your voice in Parliament to make it plain that at least one of your constituents is unhappy about this leniency."

That is a well-written and well-constructed letter. It is just one of many that we received about lenient sentences. That may be just one case, but, because of the widespread nature of the publicity that such cases receive, it has a huge impact on society. Many wrongdoers or potential wrongdoers who plan to rape, when they see the leniency of sentences, must take the mental attitude that, if that is the way in which justice works in our country, that must be the way that society feels and, therefore, that there cannot be anything wrong in doing what he is about to do. That is the burning point.

If the courts' decisions, for whatever reason, are not to be seen by the public to be over-lenient in view of the tragic, awful, unwholesome and unpleasant consequences of rape, the penalties must be high, strict and seen as a real deterrent against crime. If, because of the nature of our judicial system, that will not always happen, it is important to have some mechanism so that wider retrial powers can be available to the Appeal Court. Our democratic society, in trying to be kind and helpful, allows the Appeal Court to reduce sentences.

It has always seemed to me as a layman to be quite odd that the Appeal Court cannot increase sentences. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary expressed some support for the idea. Indeed, I understand that a clause in a Bill that was amended in the House of Lords not so long ago would have given such powers of appeal. I urge the Minister to consider whether wider retrial powers should be part of the Government's future policy. Over-lenient sentences can be corrected by powers being made available to the Home Secretary or Ministers, or, far better, by the Appeal Court having the ability to increase over-lenient sentences in the same way as it can reduce sentences if it believes that it is justified. That is probably one of the most important parts of our debate and discussions today.

According to newspaper and police reports, it seems that, in our constituencies, old people are attacked, often for almost gratuitous reasons, and for very little gain if the intent is to steal money. The tragic attacks upon elderly lady pensioners aged 80—they obviously do not have many hundreds of pounds but only a few pence in their purses—can only mean an extension of the attitude that the weak and the feeble can be exploited and hurt. The only way in which a criminal can be brought to see sense and be deterred from carrying out his ghastly crimes is for him daily to see in the papers and to hear daily from friends and relatives that crime is punished in this country by penalties given by the courts that would make him shudder and think twice before committing crime. It is not just a matter for the courts. In essence, it is a matter for society, and the courts, in representing society's view and interpreting justice for society, must recognise that.

I ask the media — on some occasions they are friendly, on other occasions they are unfriendly, but they are always seen and heard by millions of people — to consider carefully the reports of a number of committees. I have in mind the Wyatt committee report. By and large, the media, in essence, provides the young in particular with immediate access to programmes that they will inevitably copy and will inevitably see as putting forward suggestions for lifestyle and propositions or ideas that they will inevitably — perhaps not always consciously — seek to copy. Although we all enjoy the great heroes of television, equally the purveying of violence can act on the minds of young people who wish not only to be heroes but to copy violence and be criminals.

In my constituency, I have experienced the lack of deterrence among young people in particular, who create social havoc when they carry out social crimes. It has led to a certain attitude, for example, at Chelmsley Wood, a council estate of about 18,000 homes in my constituency. It is a small area of a couple of square miles. The planners, in all their wisdom, decided that the great human race requires old and young people to relate to each other. That is absolutely right. It is a great objective. The only trouble is that the relationship between elderly, frail pensioners, some of whom are in wheelchairs, and agile youngsters on bicycles, motorbikes or even on foot, who rush around narrow walkways in crowded estates, often leads to friction. Many people in my constituency see me to complain about vandalism, and often vandalism with violence. A brick thrown through a window is almost commonplace. The solution is partly police patrolling—police presence—and the growing success of neighbourhood watch and crimewatch groups.

I now refer to the aspect of prevention. I spent rather longer than I intended on the other aspects. The debate has given me a rare opportunity to say some of the things that I would have liked to have said eight years ago.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The hon. Gentleman talked about some of his constituents who think that deterrence is important in the type of case that he described. I am sure that he must be aware that, at the last police consultative meeting in his area, nobody called for tougher sentences but for more police patrolling in the area and for a far greater provision of youth facilities. The hon. Gentleman's borough, which is a Conservative borough, has the lowest level of such facilities.

Mr. Mills: The first part of what the hon. Gentleman said forms the next part of my speech. I shall refer in some detail to the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I have full details. In fact, the police liaison committee is to meet this evening. I shall report to it if I am permitted to leave the debate, which, I suppose, could go on for as long as 10 or 20 hours today, in view of the importance of the subject. With a bit of luck, I may attend the meeting.

The solution to violence and vandalism is partly to do with police on the beat and partly to do with the relationship between the old and the young. On a number of occasions I have said to constituents, "Instead of shouting at the kids why don't you give them a few sweets and make friends with them?" It might seem to be rather odd, but in a few cases that extraordinary technique has worked. Sometimes I have acted as mediator. Perhaps my rather large feet in black shoes may have given rise to a suspicion among children that I was a plain clothes policeman. I have said to youngsters, "Do you realise that, by tormenting this old lady, you are causing her huge concern?" The youngsters are mainly mischievous, but some are not. I can think of two or three solutions that occurred by getting the people to know each other.

On such crowded estates, one of the terrifying problems is that people do no often know who are their neighbours. They may recognise their faces but they do not know them as friends. The prevention of crime is desperately important but the interrelationship of people to combat crimes is vital. That means that parents must take responsibility for the actions of their children. Families who live in streets or blocks of buildings must come together to form neighbourhood watch or crimewatch groups so that they can revive what was originally tribalism.

I am reminded of a young black friend, a solicitor from Zimbabwe, who said to me a couple of years ago that the problem in Europe is that we have lost tribalism. He said that within his tribe people would never be allowed to behave like that, that people were looked after by each other and that the tribal leader was not expected to look after them. He said that, although the members of his tribe are not blood relatives, they nevertheless relate to one another. Therefore, it is most important to encourage people, wherever possible, to form crimewatch and neighbourhood watch groups to help identify potential criminals, to inform the police and therefore help to deter criminals. These groups also help to rebuild the family and the community spirit, leading to cohesion and a feeling of togetherness. The action of these groups leads to criminals knowing that there are no easy pickings: that elderly and frail people cannot be picked off by them because they are being looked after by their neighbours and friends.

It is important that there should be a spirit of cohesion within our communities so that criminals are deterred from committing crime. It is also important that the police should be able to carry out the tasks that are given to them by society. To carry out those tasks they must be well motivated, by which I mean that they must be well paid, well led and well trained. Great strides have been made by this Government towards ensuring that police pay is adequate. The police provide an extremely high standard of training, leading to the creation of self-disciplined individuals who are capable of dealing with all aspects of crime. I have been out with my local police force in Chelmsley Wood. I admire their training and discipline and on occasions I have also admired their courage. We are not supposed to listen, I understand, on small radios to the radio broadcasts late on a Friday night in Birmingham, but if one does so one hears about various incidents. Recently two young constables had to face a riot of about 40 drunken youths at a pub, and one of them had to be taken to hospital with severe facial injuries.

I welcome the increase in the establishment of the police force nationally. There has been a welcome increase in the number of police officers in the west midlands recently, with an increase of 175 recruits, but it is vital that there should be a further increase in manpower. The matter has been discussed with the Home Secretary. I have written again to him and I have discussed it with the chief constable. I have also discussed it in some detail both with the police liaison committee in Chelmsley Wood and with police officers.

I pay tribute to the superintendent and the police force at Chelmsley Wood police station for their efforts, but it is clear that they have insufficient manpower resources and that, despite the increase in the police establishment, there are a number of problems. The additional posts that were approved by the Home Office in 1980 were in response to an application from the west midlands as a whole for an increase of 1,042 police officers. However, the increase in the police establishment, though welcome, has been offset by the reduction of police overtime in the authority's budget. That reduction is equivalent to 361 police officers.

Although the west midlands police force is now up to its authorised establishment of 6,684, it can be argued that the loss of overtime will lead to a reduction of between 200 and 300 police officers. That is part of the problem to which the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) referred. On one occasion the police liaison committee met at a police station that controls a huge area. Four or five police officers were on duty. That number was quite inadequate on a Friday night to deal with any problems that might have arisen. I know that police procedures mean that police can be brought in from Birmingham, Coventry, and elsewhere, but we are obviously insufficiently manned. Therefore, I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department to speak to his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and stress that I and other Members of Parliament, of all the political parties, strongly support the suggestion that there should be an increase in the police establishment in the west midlands.

Also I congratulate the police nationally—although I know more about the west midlands police—on the programme that will lead to police jobs being given to civilians, wherever possible, so that police officers may patrol our streets and undertake other important tasks. It is vital that the police establishment should be increased. Therefore I ask my hon. Friend to listen most sympathetically to what I am saying and also to Mr. Dear, the chief constable of the west midlands, who has requested an increase in the police force. It is vital that these requests should be acted upon quickly because the training programme is arduous. One of the problems in Chelmsley Wood is that although there has been an increase in the police establishment, police training takes two years.

Until a police officer is both trained and has gained experience, he cannot be left on his or her own. There was a period when the police were grossly under-established. The numbers might have looked reasonable, but many people had to be taken through the training process before they could become experienced police officers. Decisions must, therefore, be taken now if there is to be an increase in establishment before too long.

It is vital to look not just at statistics but at people's perceptions of the penalties for wrong doing. Those that hit the headlines are the lenient penalties. Therefore it is vital that there should be consistency and strictness in the penalties for crime and wrong doing. If the penalties are over-lenient, the Court of Appeal or the Home Secretary must have the power to review and, if necessary, to increase them. I look forward to debating and voting upon the clause, which I hope will be passed, that will lead to the return of capital punishment as a penalty for murder and other serious crimes.

You may have wondered, Mr. Deputy Speaker, why I included industrial crime, but I have been interested in this aspect of crime for a number of years. For a number of years I have advised the industrial anti-counterfeiting group, as well as leading groups of trade mark agents who are concerned about the loss to great British companies, due to industrial counterfeiting. We do not talk a great deal about industrial crime, but it is important that all hon. Members should be aware of this problem. Although industrial crime is an offence under the Trade Descriptions Act and can attract penalties, it is not a criminal offence. It has been estimated that more than 100,000 jobs are lost each year because people steal Great British designs, trade marks, names and products and many other products sold in Britain under different brand names. Billions of pounds are lost throughout Europe because of this criminal act.

Counterfeiters take products and replicate them down to the last shade of colour. They include bottles of whisky, perfume, watches and car parts. Safety considerations must be taken into account. Many counterfeited car parts such as brake linings and brake diaphragms are seriously defective. While appearing to be the same as the products that have been counterfeited, they are likely to fail and are thus highly dangerous.

It may be said that this is a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry. I am sure that my hon. Friend's Department has briefed him. I spoke to the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry yesterday and asked that he should be briefed. It is now a matter for the Home Office, whose officials are discussing it with a working group from the Department of Trade and Industry. Both Departments have received copies of the proposals of the anti-counterfeiting group. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree to make counterfeiting a criminal offence when the appropriate Bill comes along although he may not be able to do so now because the discussions are still taking place.

This serious offence is costing us hundreds of thousands of jobs and is losing British companies good, legitimate profits. But what penalties are available for the wicked criminals who are stealing our industrial property? Officials say that there are severe penalties, but what is actually happening? In a written answer a few months ago, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said:

"In 1985, the average fine imposed on offenders convicted under section 1 of the Trades Descriptions Act 1968 was £203".—[Official Report, 10 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 169.]

What a vicious penalty! We spoke earlier about stiff penalties and life sentences, and I called for the return of capital punishment. At the other end of the scale, the average fine for stealing intellectual property, which everyone admits is a serious crime, is £203. That is hardly confirmation of the argument that the law is acting justly or adequately. It is not acceptable for the Government to say that it is a matter for the courts that the penalties are available to the courts and they should use them. We are an Administration, and we have a serious problem which has been going on for years, but the penalties are derisory. Any counterfeiter worth his salt will simply build a small amount into his huge profits with which to pay the fine, and say, "Who cares? If it is only £203. Does it really matter?"

It is important that my hon. Friend should respond, either now or later, to the need for strong deterrent policies to deal with industrial and commercial crime. The criminals are in it for the money, and are getting away with the money, having lost the odd £200 if they are caught. A firm of investigators dealing with computer fraud has said that the average amount stolen in that way is 10 times the amount stolen in the average bank robbery. We all agree that bank robberies — particularly those involving violence—should attract strict penalties, but here we are saying that a similar act should attract a fine of £200. That is no deterrent whatever.

We speak of counterfeiting as a crime because it is recognised as such, not only in this country but worldwide, and in other countries is treated as such. Until it is specified as a separate criminal offence here, as it is in the United States, counterfeiting will increase and we shall be out of line with Europe and the United States. The Trade Mark Counterfeiting Act 1984 passed in the United States made counterfeiting a specific criminal offence attracting fines of up to millions of dollars or many years in gaol.

It may have been felt 10 or 15 years ago that there was no need to change the law because not much counterfeiting was taking place. I raise the matter today because many of my hon. Friends may not realise what a rapid increase has taken place in the past 10 years. It is estimated that some $60 billion of world trade is in counterfeit items. That is a particularly serious problem for the more sophisticated western democracies, because counterfeiters in developing countries find heavily branded and trade mark protected goods easier to copy. It is an almost inevitable cycle that, as countries develop an industrial capability, they will ask themselves whether they should spend millions of pounds on research and development, advertising, branding, marking and naming products, or whether they should counterfeit some well-known and popular product. Until we ensure domestically that the penalties are sufficiently tight, the practice will continue — not only in such countries as Taiwan, Korea, the Philippines and Hong Kong, but in all the developing countries. Many of their Governments have acted, but the commercial entrepreneurs will continue to commit the crime. Counterfeiters weigh up the profit against the risk of prosecution and punishment and often decide that the risk is worth taking. One well-known counterfeiter has done it time and time again, and, with the fine at £200, can we wonder? That is why it is so important for my hon. Friend and his Department to obtain a full report from the Director of Public Prosecutions to confirm the level of penalties.

We must act quickly. The action taken in the Criminal Justice Bill on conspiracy to defraud is welcome, but although it deals adequately with parts of the problem, it does not face the need to make counterfeiting a criminal act. As a convinced European, I feel that we should not be seen yet again to be reacting to a request from the European Commission by imposing stronger penalties. It is time that we got our act together and did what is right before being requested to do so.

In reply to a question asked by Dame Shelagh Roberts, the European Commission replied:

"The US Trade Mark Counterfeiting Act 1984 makes it a felony for a person to traffic or attempt to traffic in goods or services bearing a counterfeit trademark. As far as the Community is concerned, after the recent adoption by the Council on 1 December 1986 of Regulation (EEC) No. 3842/86"

—that is an excellent move—

"laying down measures to prohibit the release for free circulation of counterfeit goods, the Commission intends to examine the adoption of appropriate measures to combat the manufacturing of counterfeit goods and trade therein within the Community's frontiers.

This examination will, at the request of the Honourable Member, be extended to include the penal legislation of the Member States."

It is pretty clear from that answer to a Member of the European Parliament's question that the European Commission will look at our domestic penalties for those crimes. If one compares those penalties with other countries in Europe, one finds that a fine of £203, in practical terms, will hardly act as a deterrent. So rather than be pushed by Europe, surely we should act now. If the Minister cannot give me the answer yes today, I ask him to make sure that Home Office officials respond to Department of Trade and Industry officials, and give us a clear time scale so that we can achieve some advances on counterfeiting.

The R. v. Ayres case—House of Lords 1984—which created a loophole on conspiracy to defraud, involved some £5 million of Chanel perfume. The counterfeiters got off—I am not sure whether one should say scot-free or perfume-free — but they certainly got off free. I hope that my hon. Friend will confirm today that clause 12 of the Criminal Justice Bill will rectify that matter and ensure that the defence under conspiracy to defraud is now covered by his Department.

I should like to quote a few myths and facts on counterfeiting. Most hon. Members tend to think of it in terms of £5 notes or, if they are richer, £50 notes, or that it is a problem, with jeans, or, because they have read about the Chanel case, with perfume, or, because they have heard about the watch case, with watches. However,

[Mr. Mills]

I remind the House that all industries are vulnerable, including the manufacturers of car parts and drugs. In the pharmaceutical industry, the counterfeiting of drugs not only affects the jobs and profits in British companies, but it can be dangerous. Even if it is not dangerous, the drugs can be misapplied or misdirected. They might not even be the proper product. We are all simple and innocent when we buy from a reputable chemist a drug on prescription.

If the box looks right, we believe that the little pill inside, or the powder, is all right. But if it is counterfeit, it might not be. The chemist or pharmacist might be reputable, but goods might come in through his supplier that are not right.

When someone buys a well-known brand of brake linings or replaces the disc pads, he has full confidence that the next time he is, perhaps, driving to the House of Commons on the M1 and has to brake at 70 mph, the car will stop. But he might find that a counterfeit part has been sold, perhaps unwittingly, by the local garage or shop, and the car goes straight on, with the result that there is a terrible accident. Not only have the lads in Birmingham lost their jobs because somebody has stolen their design but the driver is endangered.

One of the myths is that such an incident happens only with goods produced abroad. The United Kingdom has always had domestic counterfeits manufacture, and now it is increasing. Exactly the same arguments apply as to other crimes—the penalties are not sufficient to prevent that counterfeiting. If the Minister says that the Department of Trade and Industry told him that under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 the penalties can be severe, my question is: if they are, why are they not being applied? It is exactly the same argument for other crimes. the figure of £203 given as the average in the Home Office answer shows that whether it is under the Trade Descriptions Act or not, courts could have recourse to stricter penalties, but they are not doing so.

Part of my motion was about the relationship between the community and the police. I talked about that in tremendous detail in relation to other crimes. It is most important to examine it in the context of industrial crime. As I said, we need more police. People will be sympathetic to the view that in Chelmsley Wood the police should be patrolling the beat, preventing violence and vandalism. But the time that the police have to investigate industrial crimes is limited. It is therefore important that there is a relationship between the trading standards departments, trading standards officers and the police. I have some interesting examples.

In the perfume case, the police involvement came about only because they stumbled across counterfeiting while they were doing another investigation. It is apparently a matter of policy that the police will normally decline to become involved in counterfeiting cases on the grounds that trading standards officers should deal with them in the absence of any substantive serious offence. Investigators' experience in anti-counterfeiting work confirmed that, while at local level the police are often helpful and co-operative, the policy that they have to enforce is that counterfeiting is a matter for the trading standards officers. The criminals know that. It is interesting that an investigator reported that while he was working under cover he was told that a consignment of 20,000 to 30,000 watches was about to be processed, and that there was no need to worry because the matter involved only trading standards. He was told, "The police don't want to know."

In 1986 a large quantity of counterfeit watches was seized by the police in Hatton Garden. The police found it difficult to believe that that was happening. They were anxious to bring charges, but it was apparent that there was no clear offence with which the man who was counterfeiting the watches could be charged. After some consideration, the charge of being equipped to cheat was brought under section 25 of the Theft Act 1968. I believe that the case is still to come before the court.

Another example is in the Manchester area. In early 1986, 100,000 bottles of counterfeit perfume were found. Apparently the packaging as well as the perfume had been obtained, and the counterfeiters were ready to put them together and make a profit. That was known to the police, but no action could be taken because no offence had been committed at that stage. Eventually the perfume was sold and retailed, and action was then taken. Had criminal action against the counterfeiters been possible at an early stage, the problem would have been prevented at the start.

We must recognise that trading standards officers are not seen by criminals to be the instruments of the law. The level of penalties is seen to be abysmal. We see Europe looking into the matter and being likely to suggest that we should have stronger penalties in the United Kingdom. That is vital. My hon. Friend the Minister and the Department of Trade and Industry will know that the Bill prepared by the Anti-Counterfeiting Group is available and could be made law at any time the Government should wish. I have been pressing and campaigning for it, and welcome the support of any colleagues on both sides of the House.

I hope that the Home Office will respond to the Department of Trade and Industry. I agree with the view expressed by the commercial interests, that the amount of time taken by the Home Office to consider its view on the level of penalties and respond to the request to make counterfeiting a specific offence is far too long. I have much correspondence, but I should not speak for much longer. I think that I have covered most of the points.

The motion has been a welcome opportunity. I have mentioned industrial crime as well as other crimes because it is a serious matter. I look for a detailed response. My last word is that no hon. Member can say today that the level of crime, which is rising, is due to one simple factor. One cannot say that one party or one type of political philosophy is responsible. There are great changes in society. They have taken place elsewhere. We have seen changes take place in America.

If we ignore the family, the individual and the community in the prevention of crime, we are ignoring the very basis of what was once so important to our community—the spirit of dependence on each other and the relationship with each other. By acting together, I am sure that we can start to stop those crimes. It is vital that we have penalties that will help to deter and prevent them.

10.29 am

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I must first offer my congratulations to the hon. Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) not only on his speech but also on the extremely appropriate timing of his choice of subject. We are debating law and order, crime, and the relationships between the police and the community this morning in the light of the tragic and disturbing crime figures that were issued earlier this week. That fact makes our debate peculiarly appropriate.

I want to take up first one of the final remarks made by the hon. Member. He said, rightly, that there was no one single cause of the rise in crime and no one single answer or party political answer. I hope that that message will get home to the Prime Minister. Twice this week at Prime Minister's Question time the Prime Minister shut her eyes to some—not all—of the root causes and the social upheavals that are scarring too many of our inner cities at the moment as part of the cause of the rise in crime.

We cannot ignore the rise in unemployment, the extent of poverty, the dereliction of our inner cities, the extent of homelessness and the lack of facilities for young people in particular. We cannot ignore those as inevitable factors leading to lawlessness and crime.

There are some areas in which really good work has been done. I will consider in a moment how they begin to roll back the tide of crime. When I claim that unemployment, lack of youth facilities, and poverty, are part of the root cause of crime. I do not say that as an excuse for those who take to crime. That is no excuse at all. However, we must understand the linkages between poverty, unemployment and crime if we are to begin to tackle the problems of crime effectively. We should be redoubling our determination to begin to tackle some of those underlying social problems.

There is not only an erroneous assumption on the part of the Prime Minister that unemployment has nothing whatsoever to do with the rise in crime; there is also an erroneous assumption on the Prime Minister's part that policing is in some way the only answer to rising crime. Time and again over the past three to four years, when we have been pressing the Prime Minister in the House on issues of law and order and rising crime, her only answer has been that her Government have spent more on the police, have recruited more police officers and have provided the police with more weapons.

Policing is part of the answer to rising crime. However, it is not the only answer. We must recognise the fact that policing must, if it is to be effective, be policing in the community and with the community. In that again the hon. Member for Meriden was absolutely correct. That means that a number of things must happen. I am sure that most hon. Members who talk to ordinary people about their fear of crime will agree that we must ensure that more police officers are on foot, on the beat going around the streets and estates in our constituencies.

When I raised with the Home Secretary at a meeting with London Labour Members a week ago the question of the extra complement that he has recently announced for the Metropolitan police — a very welcome extra complement—I asked specifically how many of the extra officers will actually end up on the beat in my constituency. Every time I talk to the local chief superintendent about the need for home beat patrolling around the estates in the southern parts of Islington, I am told that the police are terribly stretched for manpower and that it is difficult to devote the resources to home beat patrolling that should be there.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): Would the hon. Gentleman agree that part of encouraging the home beat officer on to the streets and to feel welcome in the community should involve him feeling that he has a welcome in London schools and that the schools should make every effort always to have an open door for their local home beat police officer?

Mr. Smith: I entirely agee that a sensible relationship between the police and schools is extremely important. I am pleased to say that the schools in my constituency have traditionally invited the police in to meet children and discuss their work. It is absolutely right that that should happen.

The report of the Comptroller and Auditor General about the funding and cost of the Metropolitan police published a year or so ago reveals some worrying figures. It shows that only 25 per cent. of police time is spent on patrol. That covers not just patrolling on foot but patrolling in cars as well. The conclusion that we must draw from that is that police time is not spent as well as it could be at the moment. We must get police officers, whose skilled job should be out on the streets relating to people, out of the police stations and away from the paper work. We must ensure that there are more civilians in the police stations carrying out the administrative tasks to release skilled policing work for the streets so that more officers can be on foot, patrolling the beat.

Another requirement for good policing is that the police must tackle the crimes that people want them to tackle. In Islington a year and a half ago, a thorough crime survey was carried out and 2,000 households within my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) were interviewed in depth about the priorities that they felt should attach to policing in the area. The figures that emerged from the survey make very interesting reading indeed.

Out of 17 types of offences ranging from burglary, racist attacks, vandalism and sexual assaults, householders were asked which five were, in their view, the crimes deserving the greatest police priority. For anyone taking a common-sense view of what people are worried about, and anyone talking to ordinary people about the things that they fear most about crime, the results of that survey should come as no surprise. Top of the list of priorities was robbery with violence in the street; second was sexual assaults on women; third was the use of heroin or hard drugs; fourth was burglary of people's houses; fifth was drunken driving; sixth was racist attacks; seventh was vandalism. The bottom of the list shows those offences which deserve priority in those people's eyes: such crimes as shop lifting, company fraud, prostitution, burglary of shops, theft of motor cars, rowdyism in the street and the use of cannabis. Although the people did not believe that those crimes should be ignored, they thought that they should have less priority than other, more important crimes.

Those priorities have been thrown up in many surveys, not just in Islington but in the Policy Studies Institute survey and the Merseyside crime survey. Interestingly, when those surveys have asked the police which are the most important crimes that they should be tackling, the answers ar not always the same. We must make sure that police priorities match the priorities of the people in areas which those officers must police.

The third point is that the police must work with local people. In my constituency, there has been great success in rolling back the tide of crime on some council estates. One example is the Barnsbury estate in the middle of my constituency. About three years ago, there was much vandalism on the estate. People were frightened to go out at night and some were terrified to go to the community centre, perhaps for the luncheon club, during the day.

At the initiative of the tenants, a meeting was set up between tenants, the police and the local authority to try to discover what was needed to improve crime prevention on the estate. The tenants told the police how they wanted their estate to be patrolled. They told the council what improvements were needed in lighting and in entry phones and what facilities should be made available. The transformation has been remarkable.

That is an example of the direction in which we should go. Local people should be able to sit down with the police and the public authorities to make sure that their neighbourhoods and estates are policed as they want them to be policed and that, simultaneously, the essential work of crime prevention to make those neighbourhoods safer and more secure is carried out.

Mr. Hind: Although I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, does he agree that in some areas, especially those with large ethnic communities, a larger proportion of police officers should be recruited from among those communities to build confidence between the community and the police? Is that not the way forward?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman will know from our discussions in the Committee that considered the Criminal Justice Bill that I do not always agree with everything he says, but on this occasion he is right. We must try to resolve the catch-22 problem that people from the ethnic minority communities, especially in London, are reluctant to join the police force because they regard it as not being interested in their concerns and as not containing many members of their communities. We must ensure that there are more black and Asian police officers on the streets, because that is one way of ensuring good policing in concert with the community, rather than rubbing up against the community.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): The hon. Gentleman says that we must build confidence in the police and good relations between the police and the community. Is he happy about the relations between police liaison committees in inner London and the police in the Metropolis? In some cases, that relationship is very bad. Outside London, is he happy about the relationship between some police committees and the police forces? how can those relations be improved?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman has, unusually perceptively, anticipated what I was about to say. On some occasions, criticism of the police is justified. I remind the House that, in June this year, several officers will be tried in connection with an assault three and a half to four years ago just off the Holloway road on five youngsters who are my constituents. As the matter is sub judice, I shall not discuss it in detail, but there was undoubtedly an incident that brought discredit on the police force and in the interests of good policing, it is important to resolve the matter.

There will be many more occasions when working closely with the police is jusitifed and necessary. It is important to get the balance right. I am pleased to say that, in Islington, the right balance has been struck. There is a police consultative committee on which I, representatives of the borough and many representatives of the community sit, and it does a constructive job. Relations between the local authority and the police are good. It does not always praise the police, but it works well with the police and has developed several initiatives and multi-agency projects on estates, including the provision of a victim examination suite for the victims of rape. some good work is being done in Islington between a local authority, which some Conservative Members wrongly try to characterise as being beyond the realms of reason, and the police who do the work on the streets.

In Brighton, the Labour authority, which, sadly, has been rate-capped by the Government, is working with the constabulary in crime prevention. There are many good examples of Labour-controlled authorities working closely with the police. It is not always an entirely adulatory relationship on either side — indeed, it should not be adulatory — but they are working well and constructively. That is the way forward. I would accept criticism from Conservative Members about some Labour authorities more easily if they also mentioned the constructive work that is being done.

Policing is not the only answer to crime. We should explore the many other solutions. I welcome the Government's new-found commitment to crime prevention, but we should consider the improvements that are desperately needed in most of our inner cities. For example, street lighting must be improved so that there are fewer dark corners and the streets are made safer, especially for women and elderly people. We need entryphones in blocks of flats on council estates. We need not just physical barriers, but caretakers, porters and concierges to ensure that there is a human presence controlling entry.

We need stronger doors for flats — at the moment such flats have flimsy doors that can be booted in all too easily. There should be window locks to prevent people gaining entry to carry out burglaries. There should be railings around basement areas to make access more difficult. There should be more youth facilities for young people so that they have something to do, especially during the evening, instead of simply hanging around street corners or gathering at the bottom of blocks of flats.

Those are the sort of things that are desperately needed and they would make a massive contribution to the prevention of crime in inner city areas.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: No, I have given way too often and I must get on.

What have the Government done in the past eight years about precisely those measures that would aid crime prevention? We inevitably come to the conclusion that they have been making it more rather than less difficult for local authorities to carry out their work.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Smith: I will give way reluctantly.

Mr. Nicholls: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Before he runs away completely with the idea that his party can claim credit for crime prevention and that the Conservatives are against such work, will he take the opportunity to dissociate himself from the remarks made by the chairman of Lambeth police committee, who said that he disapproved of neighbourhood watch schemes because they tended to divide the community? I believe that that is a more accurate reflection of his colleagues' views on crime prevention.

Mr. Smith: I knew that I should not have given way to the hon. Gentleman—his point is totally unrelated to the basic work of crime prevention. However, I shall answer. Many neighbourhood watch schemes do much good work, but, in my view, a neighbourhood watch scheme that simply calls on people within an area to keep a lookout for crime is not the best approach to crime prevention in that area. A neighbourhood watch scheme should also include an awareness of the physical needs of the area. It is also important that all authorities in the area—the local authority, social services and the police—assist in improving crime prevention in that area.

Many neighbourhood watch schemes have developed in that way; and I welcome that. However, some have not, and that is sad. To say that all neighbourhood watch schemes should be immediately welcomed is a simplistic approach. The neighbourhood watch scheme is potentially a good development, but it must encompass the entire physical fabric of an area as well as the residents' actions in that area. That is an important point and one which I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept.

We should consider the support that is given to local authorities to improve the physical fabric of their area. The Government's record is not a good one. My local authority, which is currently rate-capped, has struggled to find £150,000 in this financial year to upgrade street lighting in the area. I have been pressing the authority to devote as much of its resources as possible to that extremely important work. I would dearly love the authority to be able to double that figure, but that is impossible because of the Government's financial constraints upon that local authority.

We must consider the balance of the Government's priorities over the past eight years. The Government are now spending 30 per cent. more, in real terms, on the forces of crime control—the police, the courts and the judiciary. The Government are also spending 70 per cent. less, in real terms, on housing. Housing improvement in most of our inner-city areas represents the best way of preventing crime. That is the path the Government should follow.

The Government's priorities are entirely wrong. We need more crime prevention and we need more support from the Government for the essential crime prevention work that local authorities wish to carry out. If the Government put their money where their mouth is, we might see a dent in the horrible, appalling crime figures published earlier this week.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak after the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). Although he would not expect me to agree with certain of his concluding remarks I agreed with a great deal of the earlier part of his speech. I agree especially with his welcome to the motion put down for debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills). It is an extremely topical debate, and I believe that it is right to draw attention to the need for greater emphasis on crime prevention measures and for greater emphasis on the relationship between the police and the community.

Obviously, I agree with the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury that the crime figures produced this week are depressing, disappointing, serious and disturbing. At the beginning of his speech the hon. Gentleman said that he hoped that he would get across to the Prime Minister his message that the causes of crime are complex. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he addresses a similar message to the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and points out to him, in exactly the same way as he has attempted to point out to the Prime Minister, that the causes of crime are complex. It was ridiculous for the right hon. Gentleman to imply, as he attempted to do earlier this week, that, somehow or other, the crime figures were wholly the fault of the present Government.

Yesterday I looked back at the crime figures during the period that I have been a member of this House. Comparing the figures for 1964 with the present figures reveals a rise of about 350 per cent. In that period crime figures show a rise from just under 1,200,000 to about 3,800,000. The period between 1964 and 1987 has been divided almost equally between periods of Labour and Conservative Government. The 1986 figures are serious and disappointing but over the past 30 years recorded crime has been rising by about 6 per cent. a year.

We are all aware that recorded crime is not an accurate portrayal of the amount of actual crime. The figures for burglary leave no doubt—both sides of the House would agree on this—that reports of such crime have grown because of the wider use of insurance and because of people's' greater concern to report matters that they believe represent offences against their property. It is significant to note that of the reported burglary figures, 9 per cent. represent attempted burglary. Having said that, however, the rapid rise in crime over this period is serious, depressing and something to which the House must address itself.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): If I understand the case that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is making, does he not think it highly regrettable that, in 1979, before the election, the present Prime Minister tried to imply that the rising crime figures were the fault of the Labour Government and that her Government would be able to deal with the matter much more effectively. Does he not agree that the Prime Minister should withdraw those remarks? It would assist the position.

Mr. Carlisle: I do not agree that my right hon. Friend should withdraw those remarks. What my right hon. Friend said at that stage was true—I shall develop that argument later. My right hon. Friend intended that the Government should put greater emphasis on certain aspects of the fight against crime. Nevertheless, crime has continued to increase.

I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman's intervention has rather thrown me off the line that I was pursuing in my speech——

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Perhaps I can assist in bringing the right hon. and learned Gentleman back to the point that he was making, as that was the point that concerned me. He said that there was a higher incidence of reporting of crimes, especially burglary. A recent Harris opinion poll in Newham showed that only one in 20 instances of racial harassment was reported to the police, so in that context there is substantial under-reporting of a very serious crime.

Mr. Carlisle: No one doubts that there is a great area of hidden, unreported crime. It has always been accepted that recorded crime figures do not reflect the total incidence of crime. I was simply saying that over a 30-year period the willingness to report crime has increased, but the total volume of crime has also risen continuously throughout the period.

To respond to the comments of the former Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), we must recognise that there are no easy solutions to crime and that the Government's role in the fight against crime, though extremely important, is limited because, as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said, the causes of crime are extremely complex.

In my view, the role that the Government can and should play is threefold. First, they must ensure that adequate resources, power and manpower are available to the police. Secondly, they must ensure that the sentences available to the courts are adequate. Thirdly, they must ensure that adequate resources are put into the whole fight against crime, including not only the prison building programme but the probation service, social services, and so on.

To answer the question posed by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's comments in 1979, I believe that the Government have done well in those three limited areas and have increased resources in the way that I have described. I have seen and heard nothing from the Labour Front Bench to suggest that a Labour Government would have done better. Indeed, it is clear from many of their statements and attitudes that they would have given these matters lower priority. As the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said, there are more policemen about today than there were in 1979 — 15,700 more, if one includes ancillaries — and the powers available to the police have been strengthened over the period.

I firmly believe that the Government's reviews and the maximum penalties now available to the courts show that Parliament has carried out its duty to ensure that adequate penalties are available to the courts. It is vital to remember, however, that although it is Parliament's duty to ensure that the penalties available are adequate, the passing of individual sentences is a matter for the judiciary and not for Ministers. My hon. Friend the member for Meriden said at one stage that he favoured powers to allow the Home Secretary to review over-lenient sentences, but I am sure that that was a slip of the tongue as it would clearly be disastrous if the Executive ever became involved in sentencing.

I am becoming increasingly concerned at the constant calls from some areas of society for ever longer sentences and the frequent attempts to lay all the blame on the judiciary in individual cases. I am concerned about this, not just because it is wrong, but because it is counterproductive. I accept that part of the purpose of punishment is to deter people from committing crime, but calling for ever longer sentences gives the impression that the courts are weak on serious crime and pass derisory sentences for serious crimes of violence. I simply do not accept that. Perhaps I should declare an interest as one who practises in the criminal courts and sits as a Recorder. Statistics for the past two years show that the length of sentences is increasing and it is nonsense to suggest that crimes of violence are not treated seriously by the higher courts.

Those who constantly criticise the judiciary and claim that sentences are derisory undermine the deterrent effect of the courts. The allegation is often not just unfair to the individual member of the judiciary concerned, but it attacks the system and people's perception of it. My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden is right that perception is important. If people go around saying that one can get away with serious crime and nothing will happen, people will begin to believe it. In fact, the sentences passed by the higher courts for serious offences of violence are generally longer in this country than in any other European country and they are still increasing somewhat.

Mr. Hickmet: How important a role does my right hon. and learned Friend think that diminished respect for the rule of law or for the police plays in the amount of crime committed? Secondly, if judges are constantly attacked for their decisions and sentences, will this not further diminish respect for the rule of law and further promote crime?

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend has, in far more felicitous language, repeated the argument that I was trying to make. I make no political point about this, but we must remember that it is this House which lays down the law and sets the penalties, and that it was this House which passed the Bail Act. It is the responsibility of judges to exercise discretion within the powers given to them by Parliament and in accordance with the wishes expressed by Parliament. Sentencing is a very difficult task. I believe that in the vast majority of cases it is approached with responsibility by members of the judiciary, who rightly seek to reflect what they believe to be their responsibilities both to society and to the individual before them.

I end this part of my speech on a purely personal note. As a junior Minister in the Home Office, I was responsible for giving approval that led to the release of someone from Broadmoor — I shall not mention the name — who committed several further murders. Am I asked to take the responsibility for that decision? Should it rest on my conscience? I have heard that phrase used recently.

As one would, I went back and reconsidered the papers. I found that that decision had been reached after much care and thought, and after taking the best possible professional advice that one could receive. The scandal would have been to have rejected that advice and those recommendations, and to have used one's own hunch against all the evidence that was provided about that man's condition.

With hindsight, it was tragic that that man was ever released, and with hindsight it is easy to criticise the individuals concerned. However one must remember that the responsibility of those who sit in our courts is to use their experience and professionalism, on the basis of their knowledge at that time. I confirm the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) that continual criticism of the individuals involved in such cases undermines respect for the rule of the land.

I turn now to the resources that are available in the fight against crime. I refer to the prison building programme and to the other resources that are provided for fighting crime within society. I have no doubt that we all accept that those who commit serious crimes should go to prison and serve long sentences. We must have an adequate prison service that can deal with those whom the courts sentence.

We must keep the facts in perspective. In 1970, there were just under 40,000 people in prison. One of the first papers that I received as a junior Home Office Minister in 1970 was a Home Office projection of what was likely to happen to the prison population during the next decade and the next 20 years if no action was taken. If the pattern of the graph had continued, it was predicted that there would have been a far higher prison population than we in fact have today.

We did two things about that. We brought in the Criminal Justice Act 1982, which widened the opportunities for alternatives to imprisonment, especially the community service order and, under the late Mr. Reginald Maudling, we started a substantial prison-building programme. I regret to say that the incoming Labour Government killed that programme. Therefore, Opposition Members should not criticise the overcrowding that now exists.

The 1971 annual prison report stated:

"The Prison Department is now embarked on a very large building programme. The primary aim of the programme is to produce the large number of additional places needed in the system to meet the expected rise in the prison population during the 1970s and, so far as may be predictable, depending on the future size of the population, to reduce or eliminate overcrowding."

That building programme continued. I refer now to the 1975 annual prison report, which stated:

"The general strategy developed in 1970 of providing more adult training prisons and young offenders accommodation by building new purpose-built establishments, by adapting former service camps and by making additions to existing establishments, continued during 1975."

But in the next paragraph it said:

"As a result of the 1975 Public Expenditure Survey the estimated expenditure for the prison building programme for the years 1975/76 to 1978/79 was reduced by over £40 million. This has meant the indefinite deferment . . . "

The report refers to three major schemes that would have produced 1,600 new places by 1979, and to five further schemes that would have produced another 1,700 places. The ending of that prison building programme, started in 1970 when Mr. Maudling was Home Secretary, was largely responsible for the degree of overcrowding that we have in our prisons today.

In 1970, there were just under 40,000 people in prison. That figure dropped and only reached 40,000 again in 1975. From 1975—1984, it gradually increased. As I have already said, during the past two years it has suddenly and dramatically started to rise again.

There is a problem of overcrowding, and we must recognise that its only solution is an adequate prison building programme. We must approach crime on the basis that we must try to keep out of prison those who could be dealt with in other ways. However, one must have an adequate prison system to provide imprisonment for those whom society and the courts believe should go to prison.

Mr. Soley: The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that he has presented only half of the argument. He knows that the Government's projections show that, even with the full building programme, there will be acute overcrowding into the next century. He also knows that the Criminal Justice Act 1982 introduced the concept of executive release because they know that the only way in which they will keep down prison numbers is to use executive release. A far better way would be to use a conditional release scheme, similar to the one operating in Northern Ireland for non-serious non-violent offenders.

Mr. Carlisle: The hon. Gentleman has completely missed my point. Of course, the Government are aware that there is still serious overcrowding. That is the reason for the size of their building programme. However, if in 1975 the Labour Government had not substantially reduced the prison building programme, and the projected building programme that they inherited from the previous Conservative Government, there would have been considerably more places available now and the overcrowding would have been less. However, as it happens it would not have kept up with the total increase in the number of crimes. One accepts that.

The hon. Gentleman should also be aware that when people say, "Look how the prison population has increased", they should be aware that until 1984 the increase in the prison population was much less than the increase in the level of crime over those years because emphasis has been placed on other resources. I welcome and am glad not only that the Government have set about a major prison-building programme but welcome also the resources that they are putting into community service. Where possible, we can and must deal with non-violent criminals outside imprisonment.

I must not go on too long, but I should like to refer to the comments made by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury about the causes of crime. I have tried to relate my comments to the three areas in which the Government have a responsibility. The causes of crime are complex and I do not pretend to deny that the devil makes work for idle hands. But there is no significant evidence of a connection between crime and unemployment. As the hon. Gentleman said, it is important to tackle the problem of resources and to occupy young people's time. Surely the answer to his suggestion of a link between the rate of crime and unemployment is the fact that the highest rate of offending is among 15-year-olds. A reduction in truancy rates in schools would have the greatest impact on the amount of crime being committed.

Clearly, opportunities for crime have increased and a tremendous amount of crime is opportunistic.

Mr. Chris Smith: The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the statistic which is the Prime Minister's favourite refrain, namely, that the peak of crime appears to be around the 15-year-old age range. Does he accept that a child of that age will be affected if his parents are unemployed and by the prospect of unemployment on leaving school?

Mr. Carlisle: I thought that I had conceded to the hon. Gentleman that, generally, a lack of occupation, whether work or making use of facilities, can have an effect on the level of crime among people of all ages, especially the young. It is a fact that the peak year of crime is 15. A reduction in truancy may have the greatest effect of all on the volume of crime.

There are more opportunities for crime today. In many ways crime is a by-product of affluence, rather than of poverty. The only answer to opportunist crime is a greater emphasis on crime prevention. That is why I welcome the motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden and what the Government are doing. I believe that the neighbourhood watch is a good scheme and so, I believe, does the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. With great respect, he did not answer my hon. Friend's question because he did not want to, and I do not blame him for that. Neighbourhood watch involves the community in helping itself protect itself, and it discourages opportunistic crime.

There are other causes of crime. Clearly one must accept that probably the major cause is the breakdown of the traditional barriers against crime—what others in the community would feel about it. The degree of violence to which people are exposed in various ways today is a partial cause of crime, and the growth of drugs and of pornography are also causes of crime. I cannot believe that those powerful forces do not influence the minds of young people and of those who may be susceptible to committing crime. We must deal with those causes.

The last part of the motion refers to the importance of the relationship between the public and the police. It is vital that we restore respect and understanding for the police. As my hon. Friend said in an intervention, we must encourage the police to explain to children of school age what they do, so that the children realise the problems that the police face and the police are regarded as allies in providing a secure society rather than as enemies of the young. It is a great pity that certain quarters heap criticism on the police when direct encouragement should be given for a closer relationship between the police and the community.

That, together with the great initiative which the Prime Minister has taken over crime prevention in the seminar that she called and in the follow-up under the Home Secretary, provide our greatest hope for containing the level of crime. They are far more important than some of the solutions that are being offered these days.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) on giving the House a chance to discuss this important topic. The right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) stoutly defended the judiciary and said that it was wrong for us to condemn it for carrying out Parliament's orders. Nevertheless, it would be inappropriate for the House to disregard public disquiet, although I do not think that he was suggesting that. In this context the hon. Member for Meriden pointed to the use of the Bail Act 1976 in the case of the murder of PC Blakelock. The public are quite understandably worried about the way it has been used. I endorse his request for a review of the Bail Act.

I agree with the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) that there is no single cause of the complex problem of crime. I also agree that it is necessary to involve ethnic minorities more in the policing of our communities. He is also right that the police cannot be above criticism. There is a great need for a fully independent police complaints procedure. Too often the watchdog is over-identified with the burglar.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that forces at work within society create the climate for crime. I agree, and I believe that, in particular, television violence and real life violence have a complicated, but real relationship. Techniques of violence on television can often seem admirable to and be imitated by young people. Children are strongly affected by realistic events close to their world. We have not yet taken the intrusion of television into our lives fully into account.

For six years I taught disturbed children on Merseyside and I saw how violence on television created the wrong kind of images and anti-hero figures in their lives. Those children were often seriously and badly influenced by programmes. The impression should not be given on television that violence does not lead to injury, as it often is. Similarly, dangerous situations which children could easily imitate should be avoided.

In too many television programmes violence has become the norm and that has de-sensitised children. Some 700 pieces of published research show a link between watching violence on television and enhanced aggressiveness among viewers. Channel 4 provides a red triangle against programmes to warn viewers that the programme could contain distressing sequences. Perhaps, that could be emulated by other television stations.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the red triangle has increased the viewing of those programmes? Does he not think that it is a light-hearted gimmick and that it is having unintended consequences?

Mr. Alton: Some sections of the community are more inclined to watch those programmes as a result. However, most parents care what their children see and determine what their children watch. If they know that a programme will be unsuitable, I am sure that the average, responsible parent will switch off the television. I also accept the hon. Lady's implicit point that television producers should keep a careful eye on some of the material produced in our television programmes.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that a large part of the problem is not so much programmes where the impact of violence is obvious, but programmes where violence is sanitised, such as "The A-Team"? It does not carry a red triangle, is broadcast in the middle of the afternoon and is watched by many children. Violence there has no detrimental effect on the recipients of the violence and that is the problem.

Mr. Alton: As I said, violence on television often appears not to lead to personal injury or harm. Certainly, television producers should examine that carefully.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Alton: I shall give way once again, but I must then make progress.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman has raised an important point about which there is a great deal of public concern. Does he admit that two other factors are involved? Is not pressure from peer groups undermining parental decisions about programmes such as those that bear the red triangle? Secondly, do not television plots too often show violence as the resolution of a problem, whereas in real life we know that it is not?

Mr. Alton: Criminal techniques should not be used by television producers as a legitimate way of achieving objectives. Far too often that is the case in television programmes. Violence on television is simply a part of the complex picture that right hon. and hon. Members have been trying to paint during the course of the Debate. Clearly the problems of crime and the breakdown of law and order are not caused by only one factor.

I would not try to argue that television programmes are the only problem, but they are one factor that has not yet been discussed in the debate. The right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South referred to the staggering crime figures, which perhaps bear repetition and presentation in a different way.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) rose—

Mr. Alton: Many hon. Members have been trying to get into the debate; I do not want to hog all the time and must make progress.

Seven crimes are now committed every minute; a total of 3·8 million crimes a year. Since 1979 recorded crime has risen by a staggering 51 per cent. and there has been a rise of 97 per cent. during the same period in recorded cases of domestic burglary. One reason for that is that techniques for recording crime have been changed and improved. However, detection rate—another important indicator shows that two out of three burglars get away with their crime. That demonstrates that in some instances crime seems to pay.

There has also been a 127 per cent. increase in robberies and muggings. Simultaneously during the past seven years scenes have taken place that most people had thought gone for ever. Although the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South claimed that there had been a steady increase in crime during the past 30 years, the traumatic and violent events witnessed at St. Pauls, Toxteth and Brixton changed all our previous perceptions of one-nation harmony and of the police who had to uphold the law during those riots.

Nevertheless, those scenes do not seem to have shocked the Government out of their complacency towards the problems of policing and rising lawlessness. That complacency is best illustrated in the Tory manifesto of 1983, which, just two years after the riots of 1981, stated:

"Already street crime is being reduced and public confidence improved in some of the worst inner city areas."

Obviously, that manifesto was not widely read in Broadwater Farm. Figures can be repeated ad nauseam. Falling clear-up rates and the increased number of attacks on police men and women are further illustrations. Since 1981, 63 police officers have been killed on duty. There has been a massive rise in drug-related offences in contemporary Britain. The self-styled party of law and order has become the party of riot and disorder. The Government's response has been predictable and pathetic. There has been the short, sharp shock, "bring back hanging," the birch, the packing of prisons and the erosion of civil liberties. Such policies more and more resemble crisis management and their approach shows too much reaction and not enough imagination.

We face a choice. First, we can continue to allow things to drift. We can watch the police being spat on and despised in many communities. We can watch certain elements trying to paralyse the police by grabbing control of their day-to-day operations. We can watch the police shrink back to their garrisoned fortresses, only to venture out in armoured cars—in the future—with dogs, troops or guns. We can watch while the crime figures shoot through the roof—or we can do something about it.

As the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said, we must recognise that we need more police on the beat rather than behind the desk. We should recognise the social and economic causes of crime. More attention needs to be paid to crime prevention and the relationship between the police and the community must be strengthened. We need an approach more similar to that of "Dixon of Dock Green" than that of the 1960s television programme, "Z Cars." We need more police on the beat, the reopening of neighbourhood police stations and more police living in the communities that they police. However, there is more to the alliance policy than a call for more bobbies on the beat.

Since 1979 the number of police officers has increased, yet that has had no effect on the crime statistics. The recruitment of more police cannot, in itself, bring about a fall in crime figures. More importantly, the increase in establishment has largely been absorbed by special demands on police time: for example, the extra administration resulting from the police and criminal evidence legislation, the policing of riots, strikes and terrorism. There have also been day-to-day changes in the working week, with more time off and more desk-bound officers.

There is a need for an increased level in the establishment. Among other benefits, an increase in the number of police would allow more time to be spent on training. That would give young police men and women the opportunity to get to grips with the new and complex legislation passed by the House, and the special skills that are required to handle people in our multicultural, multiracial society. The increase in manpower should lead also to the reopening of neighbourhood police stations. It would mean that administrative staff could share the burdens of administration which result in police men being locked to their desks.

A survey on Merseyside showed that about 3 per cent. of the Merseyside police force is on the beat at any one time. On Merseyside, some 66 per cent. of police time is spent inside police stations. Merseyside has about 4,600 police officers, of whom 1,900 are allocated to patrol work, but on average a mere 185 divisional patrol officers will be on patrol at any one time. As some of these officers will be interviewing criminal suspects, attending court hearings or answering calls, the number of police officers on the street is reduced further to about 2·7 per cent. of the force. In other words, the greatest number of bobbies on the beat at any one time will be 126. That includes traffic and operational support divisions. That is a long way from the "Dixon of Dock Green" approach.

The public say that they want more police on the beat, but less than 3 per cent. of the local force is used for that purpose in my area. The public want more time spent on answering emergency calls, but only 3 per cent. of police time is used for that, compared with 6 per cent. for interviewing informants, witnesses and suspects. All told, some 56 per cent. of police time is spent inside police premises, and a quarter of it is spent on paperwork and administration. Surely it must be possible to reduce that percentage and to put the police back on to foot patrols.

There is a link between crime and economic conditions. My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) asked on Tuesday whether the Prime Minister rejected the old adage that the devil finds work for idle hands. The truth of that maxim is so self-evident that it does not require any academic research to support it.

Unemployment leads to despair, and that can lead a man to do many things. I often see young people hanging around on street corners with nothing to do and nowhere to go. Criminals misuse, abuse and take advantage of such people, dragging them into vice and crime and using them in burglaries and robberies. Moreover, the consumer boom serves to remind the have-nots of how little they have. It is no wonder that petty theft often leads to more serious offences. It was Winston Churchill—not exactly a poor man, and the grandson of a duke—who once said that to have a little freedom, one must have a little money. Many young people today are constantly beguiled by television advertisements for new pairs of jeans and other new products that they are told they must have to keep up with their contemporaries. If they cannot earn money honestly, it is not surprising that sometimes—albeit unforgivably — some of them turn to crime. Conservative Members must recognise the social roots of crime, and until we agree that people can be driven to crime by their circumstances, there will be no opportunity to raise the law and order debate on to a more constructive plain.

Mr. Hind: Apart from increasing the number of police officers, which is the Government's policy, and opening the neighbourhood police stations, what recipes does the alliance have for stemming the rising flow of crime?

Mr. Alton: I shall come on to some of those points later if the hon. Gentleman will bear with me. There are many positive initiatives on which we can agree across the Chamber.

Another factor that I recognise in my community to be a force in increasing crime is the powerful link between crime and drugs. On the streets of Liverpool and in other cities drug addiction bites deeper and deeper into the personalities of the addicts, who then steal more to finance their habit. The likelihood of people lapsing into crime is self-evident. The heroin addict steals to pay the pusher. I hope that the Government will bear this in mind, do more to help drug rehabilitation centres and recognise that they must tackle the heroin problem. Stopping the inflow of heroin is one way of protecting young people from coming under this evil and powerful pressure to turn to crime.

For too long there has been a knee-jerk reaction to crime. The emphasis has never been on the investigation of the social roots of crime. As The Guardian pointed out on Monday, crime is rising because "agencies and individuals who can have a preventive effect on crime are not pulling together."

The editorial rightly pointed the finger of blame at the Government, who are content to let mass unemployment continue as a way of life, councils which prefer to hinder the police, architects who design exposed and indefensible buildings, parents who fail to take an interest in the preoccupations of their teenage children, and householders who sit and moan rather than do anything positive to help. There are signs that the Home Office is beginning to recognise the need to turn its attention to prevention. It is a pity that eight years of rising crime, eight years of reaction and ranting, have been wasted. Let us now welcome the positive moves that the Government are making.

Prevention can be brought about only through co-operation. That brings me to the point about which the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) was asking me. It concerns the relationship between the police and the wider community. The neighbourhood watch scheme is proving successful. As well as reducing the incidence of burglary in areas operating the scheme, it has recreated a sense of mutual responsibility and care. This has to be extended. The police must recognise that the public have a genuine need, even a duty, to involve themselves in their work. I am talking not about political accountability but about the need for the police to embrace their community and for the community to respond by embracing the police.

I was dumbfounded when a colleague of mine, Councillor Gerry Scott in Liverpool, a justice of the peace, who tried to establish a neighbourhood watch scheme in his community and was successful in getting the co-operation of the police, was then threatened with prosecution by the local authority because he had put up carefully manufactured signs on the local lamp posts. We can do without such ludicrous responses. What is required is a more commonsense approach, and real encouragement of these effective neighbourhood watch schemes that involve the community. That is going back to the old Peelite idea of policing by consent.

Liaison committees, which have been mentioned in the debate, have done great work, and it is a shame that there have been attempts to scupper them. There is no excuse for councils such as Lambeth opposing them. Prevention panels that draw the community into decision-making on such subjects as the provision of safety measures to secure the homes of the elderly and of the designs of estates complement the work of police liaison committees. Local councils should work hand in hand with such committees.

The need for such community-based policing is so important that it must transcend formal committees and structures. The police should be welcomed back into our schools and into our voluntary organisations, especially those representing the ethnic minorities. The massive rise in petty crime means that the police cannot possibly do their job without the support of the community.

As well as neighbourhood watch schemes and liaison committees, the Home Office should also be supporting victim support schemes. In the area from which the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South and I come there is an effective victim support network, notable for the work of Mrs. Joan Jonker, whose name may be familiar to many hon. Members. We should be encouraging the growth of such victim support schemes. Often, the role of the victim is ignored in the law and order debate. Several years ago I brought before the House a Bill on victims of violence which attempted to redress that balance, and I hope that more attention will be given to that issue.

Political accountability is a vexed question. We in the alliance have no intention of imposing political control on the police. We have no desire or need to control operational decision-making. Those questions are rightly the preserve of the chief constables. However, wider strategic questions are not free from the oversight of those who are responsible for public policy. National policy guidelines are required and inspectors of constabulary should be given greater powers to report on the development of regional and national responses to crime. The Select Committee on Home Affairs should take an interest in regional and national aspects of policing. Guidelines should be issued by the Home Secretary to police authorities about responsibilities that are currently deemed to be beyond their control. Police accountability should be considered by a Royal Commission.

We must avoid a further knee-jerk reaction to the real problems thrown up by the latest crime figures. Britain has a police force of which it can be proud, but it can succeed only when it is in close collaboration with the community that it exists to preserve and protect. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Meriden for giving the House an opportunity to discuss these complex issues.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): Much has been made of the rising crime figures that we, along with other Western countries, have faced for over 30 years. The variables behind them have been discussed — the increase in police numbers and telephone use, the insistence of insurance companies that crimes are reported and so on. Another factor is the increase in motor vehicle ownership. Nearly a third of the crimes in London last year involved motor vehicles; that statistic helps to put some of the emotional but understandable arguments in their proper perspective.

Fear of crime and violent crime is widespread in the country, and in my constituency, although it is remarkably rare. Only one in 20, fortunately, of crimes are those against the person. In 1984, there were 1,400 murders in New York, which is more than double the number of murders we have annually here. For the most part, fortunately, violent crime is not common, although I agree that it is feared. The advice to most families should be, "Lock up your sons," not "Lock up your daughters," because young men are most often the victims of violent crime.

I am fortunate to represent an area that has the lowest recorded crime rate for any police area in the country. There is a high standard of policing and the police officers are well trained, well motivated and well respected by the community. There is an excellent crime prevention programme, with local seminars chaired by local public people co-ordinating local government officers, industry and commerce, the construction industry and many others against crime.

I welcome the motion from my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) and many of the themes that he has identified, above all the vital need to work with the community. Although I represent a Surrey constituency, before that I was closely involved in the difficulties of Brixton and Peckham over 10 years. The breakdown of relations between the community and the police meant that when difficulties arose, there were not the necessary mechanisms and channels of communication. I have visited my police liaison committee and have seen how much time and effort local police are prepared to spend in meeting local representatives and discussing priorities. Priorities may differ according to perspective but they are all important.

I welcome all that the Government have done since the Scarman report to promote and encourage police liaison committees. Recently I accompanied a police officer on his beat in Farnham. It is not an area in which there are major difficulties about law and order, but it was an experience during which I was able to see at first hand some of the equivocal responses that a police officer receives and his need for diplomacy and tact. Every situation that confronts him has to be handled sensitively. It certainly reminded me again of the importance of good training for our police forces.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) mentioned victim support schemes. Like him, I believe that this is a practical way in which we can have a partnership between the police and local volunteers which will, above all, give support to that far too often overlooked group in the criminal justice system. For generations, we hardly regarded the victim because we were so preoccupied with the crime and the criminal and the processes of law and order. The victim was too easily disregarded.

The Government can claim great credit for all that they have done to enhance the compensation powers of criminal courts and for generally highlighting the needs of the victim. The extra £9 million recently allocated to local victim support schemes is extremely welcome. There has been a remarkable growth in such schemes and there are now almost 300. I have one in my constituency, the Waverley victims' support scheme which has 35 trained volunteers. I have met them and seen the professionalism and the careful commitment that they give to this important work.

Many hon. Members spoke about neighbourhood watch schemes. There are now 18,000 such schemes, which are a working partnership between local citizens and the police, and a timely reminder that, no matter how many police officers there are, we cannot expect every house, every road and every motor vehicle to be observed and safe. Neighbourhood watch schemes rely on what people see from behind the net curtains and on those people being prepared to follow up and report and give information.

One of the most alarming aspects of the ghastly murder of Police Constable Blakelock was the intimidation of local people, who felt that they could not report or give information without recrimination. Encouraging neighbourhood watch schemes so that people understand their responsibility to have a sensible working partnership with the police is an important step forward.

Much has been made of the social causes of crime; we could debate those causes for ever. I should like to say something about the inner-city areas. What do hon. Members think is behind the great range of projects in inner cities if it is not precisely to draw attention to their needs? We have the urban programme, derelict land grants, housing improvement grants and the urban housing investment programme — many different schemes which encourage people in inner-city housing areas to feel a greater sense of involvement in their estates. Damage has been caused by the totalitarian nature of many inner-city areas, where there is a reluctance to sell council houses or to bring in private owners and private schemes for housing. Anyone who read the work on defensible space or the work by Alice Coleman on the need to feel a sense of ownership and involvement in the community and not just to have an alien sense that it all belongs to a local authority, will recognise that that is the way to reinvigorate our inner-cities.

The inner-city initiative by the Department of Employment encourages enterprise and initiative. People who care about law and order should do all that they can to support and welcome those programmes. The community programme schemes of crime prevention operate in many areas.

Why is it that the scheme for visiting the elderly by 15 people from the community programme in north Peckham, for example, has met nothing but resistance and a lack of co-operation from the local authority? Why are so many of the areas that complain most about their crime figures so reluctant to support and welcome open-handed Government in a great range of schemes? They seem to resent practical proposals like introducing tokens for gas and electricity meters. Such schemes are not rhetoric or ideology or marks of a class war: they are practical, sensible schemes about building up community spirit and about giving people the practical assistance that they want.

Work in our schools is most important. What is the purpose of the city technology colleges if it is not to give people a ray of hope, a vehicle of mobility which will help them to get on and improve their chances in life? What is the purpose of bringing parents on to school governing bodies if it is not to give them more of a say in the life of a school? What is the sense of blocking the door against police officers? The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) shows the acceptable face of the Labour party, but I am afraid that too many inner-London teachers show an unacceptable face in a lack of co-operation with police officers.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) talked about the link between truancy and crime. It has been well said that the peak age for criminal activity is 15. That is the time when such people are the responsibility of the school. I worked for 10 years trying to persuade youngsters in many of these areas to attend school regularly. That was before we had the difficulties of unemployment. How do they and their parents feel about teachers in inner-city areas who take strike action and shut the door in the faces of pupils? They may be making a point about their negotiating rights, but I should like to make a point on behalf of the many children for whom it is hard enough to attend school regularly. How do they feel about that rejection and about the teachers' denial of their responsibility?

Mr. Soley: Perhaps the hon. Lady would like to give a little thought and attention to why her Government have cut public expenditure of the type which would have solved many of the problems that she is talking about. Have the Government no responsibility in this? Apparently it is all the fault of teachers and other people somewhere else. What is the responsibility of the Government?

Mrs. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman well knows that his point is a travesty of my remarks. I have enumerated a long list of sensible and practical projects on housing, employment and education that are aimed strategically and not just globally. [Interruption.] I shall gladly give way to the hon. Gentleman if he wishes to intervene again.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Lady is misleading the House by saying that the Government have increased expenditure. They have decreased it right across the board. They take money away from the local authorities and then put a little bit back in certain specific projects and claim that they are doing something for crime prevention. Almost all the local authorities have had money for crime prevention and victim support schemes cut by millions, and the hon. Lady knows it.

Mrs. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman's party believes that the answer to everything is to hold all the power in the town hall. Labour has a totalitarian approach to these matters. I have enumerated a list of projects from different Departments. We need co-operation with the private sector and with local employers. Letting them have a say and a bit of autonomy and co-operating with the private sector in housing and not always thinking that the source of all action and all control must be in the town hall is the right way forward. In many of the inner-city areas there are great difficulties for the normal citizen. Are the actions of Brent and Lambeth and the words of their councillors a help to any of those citizens who deserve a better deal?

Mr. Hind: Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to look at early-day motion 784 that has been tabled by myself and several of my hon. Friends? Does my hon. Friend not agree that as long as teachers in our inner-London schools and city schools actively discourage the intervention of the police bringing in videos on molestation of children or by perverting good relationships between school children and the police, we are going to create barriers that will destroy good community relations whether in immigrant areas or white areas?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Quickly, please.

Mr. Hind: Perhaps my hon. Friend will look at the comments made by some of the teachers representing the Inner London Teachers Association condemning the police and accusing them of criminalising our community and youth. Does she not feel that such comments are a travesty and cause friction between the police and the communities rather than encouraging good policing methods?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that interventions are made only at the expense of the time for speeches of other hon. Members. That is something that I shall have to take into account when hon. Members seek to catch my eye.

Mrs. Bottomley: I appreciate the remarks made by my hon. Friend. However, I remind the House that not all teachers behave in the way of inner-London teachers. In my constituency there is a long tradition of mutual respect and co-operation between schools and the police. There is a danger that one can generalise from the particular to other areas.

I remind the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) that it was the Lambeth local authority which expelled the police community committee from the Town Hall because it endorsed the use of plastic bullets as a last resort. We are told today that during the difficulties of the Broadwater Farm estate, that was an option and a last resort that the police might legitimately and properly have used. There are many other examples. I prefer the response of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) who was much more open about the importance and the need to co-operate.

As I said, the peak age of crime is 15. There are fashions and trends in explaining criminal behaviour. Currently, unemployment and its relevance or otherwise is much debated. Over many years, we have discussed whether it was single-parent families or other social characteristics. I have always felt that many people who may have all the variables—they may be unemployed, disavantaged and a single parent—still keep their children on the straight and narrow, leading law-abiding lives. Harriet Wilson did some important work in Birmingham which demonstrated that parental commitment and supervision can get children over some of the difficulties they face. I find patronising the idea that because one has one or other social characterisics, almost inevitably one will go down the slippery slope. There are many parents from all walks of life and backgrounds who know the difference between right and wrong.

I urge the Under-Secretary of State, who is going to reply, to consider whether there could be a family consultation on family courts. The variable that has not been raised today affecting youngsters getting into trouble is the background of family break-up and disruption. We do not yet have a proper and adequate way of safeguarding the interests and the care and control of children whose parents are going through family disruption and divorce. This is often a key variable. In my time as a chairman of the juvenilee court, it was difficult to find children coming before the court who had not been through a most disrupted and disturbed family life. It is the breakdown of control at home, often leading to the lack of supervision, that predisposes youngsters to criminal activities. I urge the Under-Secretary of State to take that further.

I appreciate the remarks of those who have talked about the impact of television. I believe strongly, and have done for many years, that if independent television can earn its living by persuading people that what one sees on a commercial will influence people's behaviour, it cannot be argued that what one sees on programmes does not influence people's behaviour. For the most part people tend to leave when commercials are on the television, so one would have thought that their impact would not be so great.

One cannot sustain an argument that does not stress the impact of what one sees on programmes. It is no good saying that television is a window on the world. By the age of 16, the average American has seen 200,000 violent attacks and 50,000 attempted murders; that is watching an average of three hours television a day — which, regrettably, is where we are now.

I warmly endorse the remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South about the great danger in the light of the dreadful crime of the murder of Police Constable Blakelock. Others have talked about the deeply offensive sentencing in the Ealing rape case. There is an appalling danger that people will react to that emotion by demanding fiercer and higher sentences for all manner of crimes. The evidence is that we should go the other way.

We imprison a greater percentage of our civilian population than any European country except Turkey. We have full and crowded prisons. No one can challenge the Government's remarkable commitment to increased manpower and increased spending on the prison service. Since this Government came to power, the prison population has risen by 12 per cent., but the prison officer population has risen by 18 per cent. The onus is upon the Prison Officers Association to talk responsibly and constructively about the fresh start proposals.

We must continue to fight for public and judicial support for non-custodial sentences, but that is a slow and laborious process. Community service, probation and intermediate treatment orders are methods of punishing people legitimately but without incarcerating them. Imprisonment almost inevitably leads to a criminal or delinquent career. The peak age for offenders is 15. We must ensure that debates about law and order stress the importance of incarcerating violent offenders who are a danger to the public, as distinct from the group of other criminals who require the public's disapproval but should be dealt with by alternative methods.

It is clear that we all have a great concern for the need to maintain law and order. A prerequisite to a democratic society is that it establishes and maintains the rule of law. The Government have taken many steps forward in terms of resources and manpower to maintain law and order. Above all, we have in recent years identified the crucial role of the community and its responsibility to work with the police to ensure the long-term freedom and safety of our citizens.

12.7 pm

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): I am inclined to agree with the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) that prisons, in terms of criminals and officers, is a major growth industry in Britain today. The hon. Lady supported the views expressed by the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) about sentencing. The right hon. Gentleman rightly said that that must be left to the judiciary, without interference from the Executive. The hon. Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) made a sinister remark and I am glad that it has been corrected by other Conservative Members.

I particularly liked the speech by the right hon. and learned Member. It was more moderate, realistic and modest than some speeches made by Conservatives when in Opposition. They are more defensive now than they were then.

Lord Whitelaw, when he was Shadow Home Secretary in 1978, said that the blame for the crime rate should rest with the then Labour Government. In those days the Tories had very simple solutions. Lord Whitelaw said:

> "If boys and girls do not obtain jobs when they leave school, they feel that society has no need of them. If they feel that, they do not see any reason why they should take part in that society and comply with its rules." [Official Report, 27 February 1978, Vol. 945, c. 40.]

That is what the Conservative party said in the run-up to the 1979 election. My fundamental objection is that Conservative Members are asserting that it was as true in 1978 as it is now. We are discussing an extremely complex problem. It was not so complex then. It was all due to the wickedness and the softness of the Labour party and the Labour Government. We all know that the Prime Minister blamed us then. She is now seeking to blame people other than herself and her Government. The hon. Member for Surrey, South-West fell into that trap today. She blamed Lambeth, Ealing, Brent and other democratically elected Labour councils all over the country—anybody but the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) was quite right to remind her that if the money that had been spent on prisons had been spent on housing and the environment in inner cities, we would probably not have the crime rates that we have today. We live in an increasingly violent society, largely because of the social and economic deprivation of large sections of the community.

The Prime Minister and her Government have created a climate of selfishness and greed and have widened the gap between the rich and the poor. There is a suburb of London, not 10 miles from here, in which I have seen a frightening slogan which states, "Why work when you can rob?" That is the consequence of the Government's policies in dealing with education, housing and environmental problems. The Government boast that they have thrown hundreds of millions of pounds of taxpayers' money at the problem in terms of police pay, the number of police, prisons and so on. Of course, we would not deny them that boast. As crime figures and expenditure increase remorselessly, they seek to blame all kinds of people and organisations. The hon. Member for Meriden talked about reintroducing capital punishment. No doubt, he will vote for it. There is not a scintilla of evidence anywhere in the world that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder. Indeed, by and large, murders are not premeditated. They often occur within families. They are often caused by alchohol abuse and other matters that are not susceptible to the deterrent that the hon. Gentleman suggested.

Various arguments have been put about stiffer prison penalties. The right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South answered that point. The House decides the generality of the law. We create maximum penalties, but we quite properly leave the imposition of penalties to the discretion of the judiciary. Lord Whitelaw, when he was in Opposition, talked about simplified solutions and the short, sharp shock. What happened to that?

It was a crushing failure. It solved a political problem for the Tory party at the time. No doubt we shall hear more from Conservative Members when they get back into Opposition after the next election.

Last November the Government published a 50 page defence of their law and order record, called "Criminal Justice: A Working Paper". They carefully selected their statistics for the decade 1975 to 1985 and cleverly bridged the lifetime of the Labour Government and the first five years of their own Government. In that way they did not compare the figures for the lifetime of the Labour Government from 1974 to 1979 with the figures of the Conservative Government between 1979 and 1986. Last November's report omitted to say that in the categories of crime that are of most concern to ordinary people—robbery, theft and burglary—the rate of increase in the last six or seven years has been far greater than it was when the Labour Government were in power. For example, between 1974 and 1979 the number of robberies increased by about 50 per cent. Between 1979 and 1985 robberies doubled; they increased by 100 per cent. And they increased by another 9 per cent. in 1986.

There have also been great differences in the rate at which theft and burglary crimes have risen in the last six years. Between 1974 and 1979, the number of thefts increased by 20 per cent., but between 1979 and 1986 they increased by 60 per cent. There was a greater rise still in burglary crimes. Between 1974 and 1979, under a Labour Government, there was a 10 per cent. increase in the number of burglaries, but between 1979 and 1985 there was an 81 per cent. increase. And there was a further 7 per cent. increase in 1986.

Another point that has not yet been remarked on in this debate but which it is worth pointing out is that the Government pretend that the Conservative party is the party of law and order. Many Conservative Members are company directors and company shareholders. Companies are legally obliged to file annual accounts and annual reports with Company House. The House of Commons Library has this very morning provided for me the number of companies that have defaulted in their returns of both annual accounts and annual reports. They amount to over 230,000. More than one in four of companies in Britain are in breach of the law. These figures are subject to modification but they are basically in line. However, the number of prosecutions of those 230,000 companies is fewer than 5,000. Fewer than one in 50 of company law breakers are being prosecuted.

In proportion to their numbers, the greatest law breakers in our country sit on the Treasury Bench. In 1985 alone the figures show that the Secretary of State for the Environment was twice found guilty by the courts of breaking the law, that the Secretary of State for Social Services was found guilty three times of breaking the law and that the Secretaries of State for Employment and for Education and Science were each found guilty once. Therefore on at least seven occasions in 1985 Ministers of the Crown broke the law and were taken to court. However, in the five years of the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979 there were only four occasions on which Labour Ministers were taken to court. It was pointed out by Lord Denning that the Secretary of State for the Environment was taking powers in the Rate Support Grants Bill to exonerate himself from breaking the law. That was an amazing proposition. Then there is the enormous amount of City fraud—for example, the Guinness takeover and the Johnson Matthey Bankers scandal. All that comes from a Government who pretend to be the Government of law and order.

Now, in the run-up to the general election, early-day motion No. 735 calls for a national morality day. It is signed by five Conservative Members, led by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), who supports the South African Government — the most evil and immoral Government that the world has ever seen. The motion is signed by the hon. Gentleman, his wife—the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) — and three others.

That sort of thing makes us sick. I think that the Tory party can do even better: it should set up a committee to draw attention to the decline of our national morals and the consequent increase in crime. The chairman should be the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson); the vice-chairman should be the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn); the members should be the hon. Members for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) and for Winchester (Mr. Browne), and the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont); and the chief whip should be the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor). The morals of those Members of Parliament make the behaviour of tom cats appear almost respectable. For them to criticise us for being soft——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will want either to withdraw that remark or to rephrase it in a way that is more acceptable to the House.

Mr. Hamilton: I am not sure to which remark you refer, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is out of order to refer to hon. Members as having the morals of tom cats.

Mr. Hamilton: I did not say that, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I said that their morals made the behaviour of tom cats seem almost respectable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman understands the point that I am making.

Mr. Hamilton: Of course, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall withdraw anything that disturbs you, because you are a good friend of mine.

I am making a very simple point. We refuse to take any lectures from Conservative Members about morals, behaviour or attitudes to criminal activities. We know very well that the people who suffer the most from criminal behaviour are those whom we largely represent — ordinary working men and women. They are subjected to all kinds of deprivation and they now feel a sense of hopelessness. That cannot be divorced from the problem that we are discussing today — the remorseless increase in all types of crime.

It is no good taking the attitude that I suspect has been taken by one or two Conservative Members, and demanding revenge through increased penalties and harder and harder punishments. Those are not the answers to the problem. Most Labour Members believe the answer to be increased provision of housing, jobs and educational opportunities for the underprivileged. Such deprivation among the underprivileged, the feeling that they are not wanted and that they are somehow inferior to the people at the top, when they see the scandals and the vast amounts of wealth and profit that are being made illegally in the City; such a division in our society has created the violence that we are seeing increasingly, every day of the week.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I shall not refer to the vitriolic nonsense that has been offered to the House by the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton), but I should like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) on his initiative. It is not always appreciated outside the House how much quite work my hon. Friend does behind the scenes as a PPS for a Minister. It is not always easy for such a colleague to spend time making speeches in the House. Some credit should be given to my hon. Friend for that and for his initiative.

For anyone to deny that the Government have been other than an outstanding success in their handling of the economy and in most spheres of their activity in advancing the welfare of the people, would be absurd and mere party political nonsense. However, in the struggle against crime, one of the highest responsibilities of any Government, one must honestly admit that the Government have not been manifestly winning the battle. That has certainly not been due to lack of concern or inactivity because no Government in history could have been so preoccupied with legislation, administrative decision, the expenditure of money, the setting up of inquiries, and the involvement of the people, with almost desperate hyperactivity on law and order, in an effort to control the relentless rise in crime.

Therefore, we must ask what is going wrong. Why are we not winning? Are we doing the right things, and could we realistically do more?

It is some comfort to know that the rise in crime is not peculiar to Britain — it is happening in every industrialised, civilised country to a greater or lesser extent. With all the publicity of crimes of violence and the fear that media reports engender in the minds of the people, particularly the elderly, it is still nine or 10 times more likely that a person will be murdered in New York than in London. The rise in crime has not happened only during the Thatcher Government, which is another source of some comfort. There has been a steady rise of between 5 per cent. and 7 per cent. every year for the past 30 years. It may be some comfort to realise that the greater tendency to record or report crime, which comes from the wider use of the telephone, the more extensive insurance of property, and even the increase in the number of police, to some extent misleads us into supposing that the increase in the crime statistics is all due to the actual increase in crime. It is also some consolation to know, particularly as the Labour party is being party political about the matter, that violence against the person, which apparently has risen by one third since 1979, increased by one half under the previous Labour Government. So it would be mere party political claptrap to blame the Government for the rise in crime. Because it would be mere party political claptrap, we hear that allegation made, although with absolutely no conviction, by Opposition parties.

Are we doing enough, and are we doing enough of the right things? There are seven sorts of activity that any Government could engage in; seven steps by which crime could be reduced. First, a Government must encourage people in society to be more respectful of other people's rights — whether to property or to personal security. That is difficult for a Government to achieve, but a society that is more self-reliant and more self-responsible is likely to have more respect for others than if people are dependent on the nanny state for absolutely everything.

In response to that requirement, the Government have taken many steps on many fronts to hasten self-responsibility. We are bringing down the level of unemployment. There is a reduction in income tax, which allows people more readily to spend their own money in their own way and according to their own choice. There has been an introduction of trade union democracy and more people own shares and their own homes. We are trying to raise the standards of education in our schools and there is more parental involvement in education. People can choose private medicine and to some extent we have been doing nearly all that we can to reduce pornography and obscenity in our society. It is difficult to claim that a Government could do much more to make the climate of society better and encourage self-responsibility, though I will in a moment suggest further actions.

The second step in the reduction of crime would be to encourage the availability of crime prevention measures because 96 per cent. of crime is against property and much of that is opportunistic because we leave our car doors open and the windows of our homes unlocked.

The Government's response has been substantial. There are 15,000 more police officers and auxiliaries. We are returning policemen to the beat. The setting up of a crime prevention unit in the Home Office and a crime prevention centre at Stafford are useful steps in the prevention of crime and are anti-crime measures. There are 18,000 neighbourhood watch schemes which have resulted in fewer burglaries. Crime prevention projects are encouraged and paid for under the community programme. The Prime Minister's initiative, to which reference has already been made, has produced more publicity and money for inner-city areas, more discounts on insurance policies and better anti-theft standards in cars and so on. The Government have not been found wanting in taking the second step in the reduction of crime.

The third step that must be taken by any Government to reduce crime is to provide an adequate armoury of offences to deal with activities that ought to be stigmatised as criminal. The Government have introduced or simplified new legislation wherever necessary, for example, through the Video Recordings Act 1984. They have made an effort to fulfil some of the recommendations of the Roskill committee report on fraud in the Criminal Justice Bill, and have redefined riot, affray and violent disorder and introduced the new offence of disorderly conduct in the Public Order Act 1986. The Government have also supported my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury) in passing the Indecent Displays (Control) Act 1981. The Government have been very active with regard to the third step for the reduction of crime, which is the provision of an adequate armoury of offences.

The fourth step for the reduction of crime involves catching the offender. Again, Government action through having many more policemen detecting crime has been impressive. The Government have also passed the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which strengthens the powers of criminal investigation particularly through stop and search. The Public Order Act 1986 strengthens the powers to prevent street violence and to deal with violent picketing. The Government have provided more money for equipment and have encouraged better training of the police forces. The Government have improved the approach to rape victims and there is a proposal in the Criminal Justice Bill to remove an unnecessarily deterrent anomaly to the reporting of rape offences. The Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 has enabled the arrest and ultimate conviction of the Brighton bombers. Perhaps even more effective police action could have taken place if our police forces had been even smaller and more local than we have over the past few years encouraged them to be.

The fifth step necessary for the reduction of crime, the offender having been caught, is to convict him. Again, the Government have taken a whole range of steps to improve that position. The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 improves the powers of the police to investigate and interrogate. Tape-recorded interviews have been introduced in pilot schemes which are soon to become a national scheme. That will do more than almost anything else to speed up criminal trials, ensure that the guilty are convicted and that the innocent are not charged. We have seen more efficient use of court time, more courts, more judges and more consideration for victims, whether they be women victims of rape or victims of child abuse.

The Government have taken many steps to improve the chances of convicting genuine criminals, but it is no use catching them and convicting them if, at the end of the day, they are given a pat on the head and tuppence out of the poor box and are not properly punished. The Government have introduced the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986, which will deprive drug pushers of their ill-gotten gains. They have changed the parole system to ensure that those who murder prison officers or police officers do not get parole, or that those who commit offences which attract sentences of more than five years, or violent or drugs offences have reduced chances of parole.

I am not sure whether we should extend to life the sentences for people who are in possession of firearms; I have already told the Government that I am very lukewarm about that matter. There are improved regimes in detention centres. There is more use of non-custodial sentences, which have been effective, especially with community service orders. We have attached more conditions to probation orders and increased the number of probation officers. In that area, too, the Government have been almost frenetic in their activity.

I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Sir M. Carlisle) that too much criticism is directed at judges for imposing inadequate sentences and that that criticism is often misguided. After all, Parliament cannot influence or interfere with the judicial process of sentencing because that would be to corrupt the system. Sentences are getting longer, and Opposition Members are always complaining that those of us who call for stronger and more severe sentences are running counter to what is happening in the rest of the world. But the rule of our courts is that someone who commits a serious act of violence must go to prison and that someone who burgles a dwelling house can expect to go to prison. The trouble is that, hitherto, we have not provided enough decent prison places to which to send people. That often deters the judiciary from sending people to prison. Now we have the biggest prison-building programme of the century, with three new ones opened in 1985 and 17 on the way.

The seventh and final step which Governments must take requires genuine and positive concern for victims of crime. The Government have helped by setting up 279 victim support schemes. They are giving statutory effect to Criminal Injuries Compensation Board awards under the Criminal Justice Bill, and the Criminal Justice Act 1982 gave higher importance to the compensation of victims.

No one can fairly say that the Government have done little or nothing to curb the growth of crime along those seven routes which must be pursued by any Government. Yet still the crime rate swells, and we have not been winning. Can anyone do anything more?

I believe that the Government could do more to improve the climate of society and to widen sentencing powers. Although I agree that unemployment is not the root cause of lawlessness, as the Prime Minister said, because there was less crime when there was more unemployment and most crime is committed by juveniles who are not yet eligible for work, I believe that homelessness plays a significant role. We must deal with that, not by building more council houses, but by realising that there are more empty houses than there are homeless families and that the private rented sector has almost been eliminated and must be restored. The Government must make haste in their reform of the Rent Acts to get the homeless back into decent accommodation where there children will be less tempted to resort to crime.

The Government must show more awareness of the power of television. That power is so great that violence and sexual violence on television have become worrying factors influencing crime. As the broadcasting authorities have fallen down on their obligations to conform to their self-governing guidelines, is it not time that Parliament legislated to control television and broadcasting of violence along the lines suggested in the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth)?

I am sure that the climate of our society would improve and be less conducive to crime if those who have important roles to play in society — Members of Parliament, Ministers, Judges and teachers—were to act responsibly and give a better example. I do not accept what the hon. Member for Fife, Central had to say about the unlawful actions of the Government. That represents a terrible confusion. It is one thing to break the criminal law—everyone knows that that involves activities of moral turpitude, and the code of criminal law is clear—it is quite another to discover, in the civil sphere of law, that a Government have taken a decision that, subsequently a court, somewhere along the line, says is ultra vires. There is no comparison between those two kinds of unlawful behaviour — [Interruption.] If hon. Members on the Labour Benches laugh about that, it shows that they do not understand the matter.

I do not criticise judges for granting bail in proper cases. I do not believe that it is a wise proposal to refer cases to the Court of Appeal to consider the adequacy of sentences and I shall not support the Government in the Lobby when that matter is discussed in the House. However, some of the sentences imposed by some of the courts on some offenders are more of an encouragement to crime than a deterrent.

I believe that some hon. Members appear to support violence on the picket lines and violence against the police. That is an appalling example for us to give our children. Teachers who take industrial action or strike for more money while they pretend to care about children and their education are giving another shocking example to young people. It is shocking that, when they are offered a 25 per cent. increase, over 18 months, they continue to take industrial action—for no better reason than that their trade unions cannot agree among themselves as to what wage negotiation procedure to adopt—and thus make the Government, against their wishes, take steps to keep the education system going. I have no doubt that that type of action, taken by people to whom students and pupils are supposed to look up to, is such an awful example that it encourages rather than discourages crime.

The effect that a bad home life and bad teaching have upon crime is manifest from the statistics. It goes a long way to explain the alarming fact that the peak age for criminal activity is 15—children of school age. They are also at an age when they are most susceptible to what they see on television.

I believe that the Government could do more to deter crime by strengthening the deterrent effect of sentencing —by restoring capital punishment for the most evil types of murder and killing. When we had capital punishment, we did not have such a high incidence of murder. We did not have such a high incidence of crimes violence; in fact, we did not have such a high incidence of crime, full stop. Everybody was aware that there was a perimeter around human activity in society beyond which nobody could go. Everybody understood that society had a system of law and order which would be imposed. Everybody knew where they stood and had more respect for other people. Whatever the hon. Member for Fife, Central may say, there is no doubt in my mind that capital punishment would deter some offenders.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: There is no evidence.

Mr. Lawrence: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that, in the course of my career as a barrister, I frequently spoke to the sort of people who engaged in violent activity and they told me that they were deterred from taking weapons with them to carry out their violent crimes when they had the fear of the rope to contend with.

The vast majority of people in this country want capital punishment restored. I believe that the vast majority of people expect Parliament to do that and I believe that this Government should satisfy their wish. The restoration of capital punishment would represent a necessary last resort of punishment and deterrence in our criminal system.

There is more that we could do as individuals and there is also more that the Government could do. However, I believe that the Government have a good record and it would be utterly churlish to deny it. If the Government had not increased spending on law and order by 50 per cent., if they had not taken the measures that I have outlined—no doubt the Minister will remind us of them more fully when he comes to speak — the situation would be far worse.

It would be very much worse if law and order were starved of resources and the police utterly demoralised, as they were under the Labour Government. As I recall it, the police came close to strike action in 1977. It would also be very much worse if local authorities led by people such as Bernie Grant had political control over the police and if the Government were represented in Parliament by people who thought that it was right to indulge in violent picketing and opposed measures on the statute book directed towards the reduction of crime.

The Labour party has consistently, voted against the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act. The Opposition also voted against the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, the Public Order Act and many other manifestations of the Government's attempt to reduce lawlessness in our society. There is no doubt that the Government have done and will continue to do almost as much as they can to reduce crime and that the one step that would produce the greatest increase in crime would be the return of a Labour Government, with or without the support of the alliance.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The Opposition are delighted that the hon. Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) won the ballot and decided to debate this motion. My only anxiety was that when he disappeared from the Chamber for so long he had been taken to the Home Office by the Home Secretary and asked to explain why he was so intent on embarrassing the Government by debating law and order in a week which has seen the most appalling crime figures ever released by any Government, Labour, Tory or anything else. It is no wonder that the Conservatives are trotting out tired old speeches such as that of the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) who seems to believe that if he says the same thing often enough it will somehow become true. That is simply not so.

[Mr. Clive Soley]

The hon. Member for Meriden referred in his closing remarks to certain types of fraud and copying in some industries. That is an important and under-debated subject which deserves further attention, but it is not the issue before us today. In the earlier part of his speech, the hon. Gentleman made all the mistakes that the Government and the Conservatives generally make about law and order by assuming that simply throwing police officers at the problem will solve it and that trotting out words of support for the police will somehow cope with the consequences of the breakdown of law and order in this country. That is a strong phrase, but with riots in inner cities and country areas in relation to industrial disputes and in our prisons such as this country has not seen since the mid-19th century, we are coming so dangerously close to a real breakdown in law and order that unless the Government addresses the situation more seriously than they have done recently we shall be heading for trouble.

I was sorry to hear the hon. Member for Meriden align himself with those who wish to reintroduce capital punishment. I hope that he will consider the number of people convicted in the past five or 10 years for crimes of the type for which he would like capital punishment to be reintroduced. About one third of those cases are being reviewed or have already been reviewed and the defendants found to have been wrongly convicted. If the hon. Gentleman had his way, all those people would have been hanged.

In view of today's news, it is important to put on record how much we respect a lady such as Mrs. Blakelock who, having been through the most appalling time in recent months, has had the courage and humanity to say that she does not have hatred in her heart but pity and that she opposes the reintroduction of capital punishment.

Today in this debate, we should say how much our hearts and thoughts go out to Mrs. Blakelock and her family and to Cynthia Jarret's family. If we do that, in some small way we can add to the reconciliation that should be taking place. Therefore, I ask the hon. Member for Meriden to consider the stature of the people who can make comments such as those made by Mrs. Blakelock, before he joins in what I agree is the majority view in the United Kingdom that capital punishment should be reintroduced.

We are here as leaders and must answer to the people who elect us. We should duck out of our responsibilities if we did not look at the underlying arguments in considerable depth and know why we do not fall for those arguments, however persuasive they may seem on a superficial level.

Today we are debating the abysmal failure of the so-called law and order party to deal with the consequences of crime. The crime rate increased in 1986 by 7 per cent. In 1985 that figure was 3 per cent. There are seven crimes every minute and only one third are cleared up. Therefore, it is nonsense and pointless to talk about tougher deterrents. If criminals are not caught, deterrents cannot work; we cannot deter criminals because we cannot catch them.

The fundamental failure of the Government's policy is deeper than has been realised in much of the press. There has not only been an increase in the crime rate but a dramatic fall in the clear-up rate. We are used to the percentage clear-up rate falling. What is now unique and new is that the number of crimes that are cleared up is also falling. I challenge the Minister to inform the House of the last time that there was a fall in the number of cases cleared up. That is an important question, to which we need an answer today.

Deterrents cannot work if the criminals are not caught, nor can they work when people are so desperate that they pursue a particular course of action, or when they are so disturbed that they do not take account of the consequences of their actions. Other common factors are drugs and alcohol.

If one visits a court and talks to people who are either waiting for their case to be heard or who have come out of the court after their case, the first question that one often hears is "what will my sentence be? What will happen to me?" Even when they have been sentenced, they often do not know the full meaning of that sentence. How on earth can we believe that the argument about deterrence is effective? I shall return to that in relation to some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Meriden about his area.

The figures for burglary, robbery, murder and rape have risen dramatically. I accept that the figures for rape are distorted because the police have improved the way in which they handle such cases and publicity has led to a greater increase in the reporting of rape. I welcome that. I shall not make too much of the rape figures because they are difficult to identify fully.

In 1978 the clear-up rate was 42 per cent., which was dangerously low. However, now, under the party of law and order, it is 32 per cent., or less than one third of all crimes. That is the measure of the Government's failure. Crime has risen faster under the Tory Government than under any previous Government. There has not only been an increase in crime, but it has risen more rapidly than under any other Government. That is the imporant point. From 1979-86, theft increased by 40 per cent. Under the Labour Government, it had increased by 20 per cent. Robbery rose by a massive 140 per cent. under this Government, compared with the figure under the previous Labour Government. Burglary increased by 100 per cent., compared to only 20 per cent. under the Labour Government.

I do not want to make too much of what one party can and another cannot do on crime, but the Tory party chose to fight the 1979 and 1983 general elections with law and order as the major issue. It told the British public that it would get tough with crime and do something about it. That is why I stated those figures. It asked the British electorate to judge it on its performance on crime. By any standard the Tories have failed. As my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) so effectively pointed out, the Tories were quick to criticise the Labour Government. They display appalling double standards.

The Government have no right to be surprised about the increase in crime and they have every right to be ashamed. The problem is difficult for any Government and crime has been increasing under successive Governments and in countries similar to Britain. The charge against this Government is that they have made a difficult position far worse by their general policies.

The underlying problem for western countries is the change in the population structure, particularly the move back to the country from city areas, reversing a historical process which has continued for 200 years. That is having a dramatic effect, particularly on our inner city areas. Any Government must face that problem. Time prevents me from going into detail, but that movement has meant that previously well-structured, well-developed, close-knit communities, which used to protect themselves against crime have broken down.

The Government have exacerbated that problem by increasing unemployment, which has an effect on the crime rate, alienating large groups from the police and, most seriously, demoralising the police by pretending that the police have an answer to the crime problem when the police acknowledge much more readily than in 1979 that alone they cannot deal with crime. The most devastating way in which the Government have made the position worse is by cutting public expenditure which was used to prevent crime. The massive, dramatic cuts in services, from education, through housing to inner city grants, have made a difficult position infinitely worse.

The destruction of communities has produced a problem which in some areas is getting dangerously out of control. I shall give some examples of the Government's public expenditure cuts and their effect. This relates to some of the comments of the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), who, I know, has had to leave the debate.

Recently I watched the installation of special double glazing at Brighton. The council has installed strengthened windows, with extra locks. The windows can be left partly open but prevent an intruder from breaking in. They are a useful design. But the council cannot install any more because the Government have rate-capped it.

Edinburgh needs £11 million to provide hard doors, which cannot be easily kicked in, for flats and houses in high crime areas. The council have £10,000 available for that task and the Government have rate-capped it. As I pointed out in an intervention, in Meriden — the constituency of the hon. Gentleman who tabled the motion — people recently attending the police consultative committee asked, not for more deterrent sentences —indeed, that was not even mentioned—but for more police officers on the beat, and, above all, more facilities for young people. Why? The crime rate in Chelmsley Wood has increased by 73 per cent. since 1978. Yet, the hon. Gentleman wonders why he is in trouble with the Home Secretary for introducing a debate on law and order. The Conservative council in that area spends only half as much as nearby local authorities on youth facilities. That is the damning indictment of what the Government have done to crime prevention by cutting the spending of local authorities.

Nottingham could improve only 800 housing units this year, but needs to tackle 5,100. Renovation and repair involves introducing stronger doors, locks and windows, for example, and above all replacing windows around which the putty is giving out. We all know the scenario: run the chisel around the frame, take out the pane, put the hand through, slip the latch and the burglar is in. Alternatively, kick in the door because the panel is weak, grab the television and get out. Televisions and video sets sell quickly and cheaply. It happened to me only a few weeks ago — it took a brick to break through the double-glazed window. Sad to say, most people have had a similar experience.

Birmingham introduced a pilot concierge scheme for its tower blocks. In some of the run-down, vandalised tower blocks it is not enough to instal entryphone systems. They are vandalised too. A 24-hour caretaking system, known as the concierge system, is needed, and Birmingham would love to have one. It has introduced 12 such schemes, but it probably needs almost 200 to make the system effective. The Government have cut the money that goes to Birmingham and that has prevented it from implementing its plans.

Leicester is also planning a concierge system but the Government withdrew some of its housing subsidy. It has only £20,000 available for the system, compared with the £100,000 that is needed.

Last Tuesday, the Government had a golden opportunity to put many unemployed people into useful work in a way that would not have sucked in imports from overseas. They could have put them to work in high crime areas on crime prevention schemes of the type that I have described. However, the Government thought that that was not important enough to mention in the Budget. That shows how much the Government care about crime prevention.

The massive cuts in public expenditure are not the only reason for pointing the finger at the way in which the Government have made the problem so much worse. I have mentioned the board and lodging allowance, which forces young people into homelessness, but it was said this morning that there were plenty of empty houses around. Do not Conservative Members know that young people are leaving their homes in the north to come south looking for jobs? The jobs are here, but the houses are not. Do they not know about the distorted housing vacancy rate in the country?

Young people come south and find that they cannot stay in board and lodging for more than a few weeks before losing their supplementary benefit; so what do they do? A few turn to crime, but the real danger is that they will drift into homelessness through no wicked intent, and drugs and alcohol abuse provide a way of coping with stress.

These youngsters become more vulnerable to true homelessness, and, as the Home Office knows from its own research, there is a close link between crime, homelessness, and drug and alcohol abuse. The Government's policies, particularly on young people, have increased the chances of that happening to them.

Nursery education is an area on which money should be spent to bring us into line with the normal level of expenditure in Europe. Many young children who live in high-rise estates have to play indoors all day with their parents. Others are sent outside to play unsupervised in the streets, and many of them drift into scrawling graffiti, vandalism and crime. Those children could be catered for in a way that would take them away from crime. That was another opportunity that the Government passed up.

Hon. Members have argued about whether unemployment and crime are linked, and, of course, they are. What we cannot do is show a clear statistical link between a person being unemployed and committing a crime. That comes as no surprise. There is, however, a statistical link between joblessness, homelessness and going to prison: people in those categories have a greater chance of going to prison than others of similar background, committing the same offence, who have a job and a house in which to live. There is not a direct link, but, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday, and others such as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) have said today, the link is such that it is a measure of the breakdown in society.

[Mr. Clive Soley]

I regret that the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West has had to leave. She is a psychiatric social worker and must know from her training and work that in these situations a family that is just about coping with the problems of parenting and bringing up children — although perhaps the children are on the edges of law-breaking — when faced with unemployment and dramatically reduced income, is faced with a crisis.

The so-called party of law and order also likes to present itself as the party of the family. Despite that, it has done more to make it difficult for families at the margin to cope. Parenting can make all the difference between whether a youngster gets into trouble with the law, but if one makes it more difficult for a family that is already struggling to cope with social, emotional and economic problems, one will increase the chance of the children, or the parents, getting into trouble.

There are other similar analogies. The psychiatric breakdown rate for women is a mirror image of the rate for men who get into trouble with the law. In other words, the figures are reversed. Men are more likely to offend and women are more likely to get psychiatric problems. This happens as a result of economic and social strains and there is a link with unemployment and the way in which the Government have undermined our social fabric. When we talk about the country being torn in two by the Government, we are talking not only in terms of the north-south divide, but about the divide between those who live in deprived, run-down areas with far fewer opportunities, and those who live in better areas.

The hon. Member for Surrey, South-West said that she was lucky enough to live in the area with the lowest crime rate. I could not help saying to myself, "Does she not understand that that is something to do with the income levels and standard of services in that area?" One could probably take out half of the police force from Surrey, South-West without making much difference to the crime rate, unless, as my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central said, it was an increase in tax evasion and fraud. However, crimes that hurt people personally, such as burglary, street robberies, muggings and so on, all the crimes that frighten people, would not be affected.

Such a move in a high-crime area, where a community is already splintered, would make all the difference in the world. When the Government put all their hopes on the neighbourhood watch schemes and launched them with a great fanfare, saying that they would solve all the problems, the Labour party said something that we were attacked for saying. We now know from recent reports that we were right to say that while the neighbourhood watch schemes were a good enough idea, their benefit is greatly overstated. We know that they tend to displace crime from the areas where they are successful into the neighbouring areas.

The problem is that neighbourhood watch schemes will not work well in a high-crime area because the community is already splintered. The usefulness of such schemes is that they bring the community together, but one needs to do other things. One needs to have tenant associations, resident associations, youth clubs and other facilities in the neighbourhood watch area if it is to work properly. By putting all their eggs into that basket, the Government failed.

Let us look at the way in which the Tories have dealt with the police. They present themselves as the party of the police. There are more police officers. There is now one police officer to every 395 citizens—20 years ago, it was one to every 602 — but the crime rate has still gone through the roof. That policy of the Government is not working because, as I said at the start of my speech, there is no point in throwing police officers at the problem.

Police officers have a deterrent effect if they are on the streets and they make an important contribution in addressing the crime when it is committed. A recent survey shows that about 7 per cent. of a police officer's time is spent dealing either with the victim or a witness and that about 50 per cent. is spent in the police station on paperwork. We know from Home Office figures that 95 per cent. of all crimes are cleared up by witnesses giving evidence to the police. We can see why the police are getting into difficulty.

The hon. and learned Member for Burton said that the Labour party is opposed to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. That is quite correct. Let me bring in a supporter of the Labour party on that — the Police Foundation. That is an independent body which finds, in accordance with what we say, that the Act is bureaucratic and an administrative problem for the police. When the Royal Commission reported it said that we needed an Act which gave the police a clear definition of their powers and the citizen a clear definition of his rights. The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 does neither. It is blurred and is neither a clear statement of police powers nor of citizens' rights and has added to the burdens of the police force.

Public order has been discussed in the debate. What other Government, Tory or Labour, would have allowed a foreign citizen, Mr. Murdoch, to go on creating mayhem in our streets by refusing to negotiate?

No other Government, Labour or Tory, would have allowed that to happen. The Tory party talks about people demonstrating in the streets. What do the Tories want to do about that? Do they want to abolish the right to demonstrate? We have mass unemployment and economic distress and whether the Tories like it or not or whether I like it or not, people will demonstrate and express anger and fear about the loss of jobs. Unless we ban that right we shall have to do one of two things. We can do what the Government have done and use the police as the Tory party's private army to try to cope with the social and economic consequences of the Government's policies, or we can do what previous Labour and Tory Governments have done — get the employers and the work force into negotiations through organisations that previous Labour Governments successfully set up for that purpose.

The Tory party attacks Labour councillors. I do not mind when it criticises Labour councillors for something that they have said. As I did yesterday, I shall give another clear warning to the Tory party. When it says that a Labour party member or councillor or someone like that is undermining the law by expressing a view, it is really saying that those people are undermining the law because they are exercising their democratic rights. If somebody is undermining the law by breaking it, that is a different matter.

I want to fight this issue on the issue itself. I do not want to sink to the level of The Sun and the Daily Mail because there is no advantage in using the invective and the labels that they use. I warn the Tory party that if it wants us to take the gloves off we will do just that. Many people in the Tory party and at its edges give us ammunition to use if we have to use it. The Tories should keep to the issue. They may be in trouble on the issue of law and order, but, if we fight it on the issue itself, we will do our people a service.

There is a strong reason for having law and order as part of the political debate. I have never complained about it being part of the party political debate. It ought to be, because that is the way which we resolve issues in a democratic country. However, we should not accuse people of undermining the law when they are not actually breaking it or challenging it in the way that the Tory party has tried to suggest.

Let us look at some of the excellent schemes going on in London. Southwark has a mediation scheme for victims and Newham has co-operation between the police and the local authority on racial attacks. Haringey, Lambeth and other councils co-operate with the police on the recruitment of ethnic minorities to the police. All those things are happening, but we do not hear about them from the Tory party. All we hear from the Tories are attacks. In Islington there is the joint initiative on recruitment and safety on council estates. The Association of London Authorities, dominated by Labour but with some Conservative members, was commended by the Metropolitan police because we showed it how to do its accountancy in a way that resulted in a lowering of the rate for Londoners by, if I remember rightly, about 8 per cent. We hear nothing about that from the Conservative party.

If the Government go on attacking the various people who disagree with them, we should notice who the scapegoats are. The teachers and the Labour party are to blame as are certain councils and parents. Everyone is to blame except the Government.

There is one other thing we need to do. In certain areas of high crime rates we ought to look again at the special constabulary scheme. There is a real possibility that if we increase recruitment to that, perhaps with a commitment for guaranteed entry into the police force after, for example, a two-year period and subject to the person having met the minimum standards during that time, we could break through the barrier of recruitment in the inner cities. That is not just a problem with ethnic minorities. The hard fact is that 80 per cent. of the police officers who police London come from outside London and the figures are not that different in other city areas. Therefore, the special constabulary needs to be looked at again. It is already working well but we could make it work better.

If we have the debate at this level and not the debate that the Daily Mail and The Sun would like everybody to have, we can do a lot to improve the safety, happiness and security of the citizens of our country. If we deal with it in the way in which the Tory party has tried to deal with it from time to time, we will fail and we will be judged to have failed, quite rightly, by the people of this country.

1.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I wish to begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) on prompting such an important and interesting debate. He has raised a number of issues, some of a general character, some of a narrow character and all of them significant.

I shall begin by referring to the problem of industrial counterfeiting, a subject on which my hon. Friend has considerable experience and which he has made very much his own. My hon. Friend is right to stress the essentially fraudulent character of that activity. Industrial counterfeiting is certainly a form of fraud. He was also right to emphasise that industrial counterfeiting imposes a real burden on legitimate industry. In drawing attention to those things, he has done a great service to the House.

Many aspects of industrial counterfeiting are already caught by the existing law. For example, there are provisions in the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 and in the Theft Act 1968. There is the patent legislation and the common law tort of passing off and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden said, there is a provision in clause 12 of the Criminal Justice Bill which is designed to cure precisely the problem to which he referred.

My hon. Friend has rightly drawn attention to what may be a weakness in the law. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology is now in the process of consulting the prosecuting authorities so as to determine and identify any gaps that there may be in the existing legislation. I cannot pre-empt what he is going to say but I can tell my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend will approach the matter with considerable sympathy and will take account of the important points he made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden referred to sentencing. Some of the penalties imposed for industrial counterfeiting are low, but I think that he will recognise that the legislation that the House has passed provides for substantial sentences. For example, under section 1 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 there is a maximum penalty on indictment for an unlimited fine and for a term of two years' imprisonment. What the courts choose to impose is a matter for them. All that Parliament can do is to lay down the framework of law.

I entirely agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) in stressing the fundamental distinction between Parliament's role and that of the judiciary. Although I accept that there is a great deal in what my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden said about industrial counterfeiting, it is wrong to suppose that the law does not already take what he said into account. Certainly the Government will approach the matter in the context of what my hon. Friend so usefully said.

I turn to the more general question of crime. The crime figures are of profound concern to the House and to the country. I agree with what my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South said about these matters. We are deeply concerned about rising crime and about the decline in clear up rates. However, if we are not to mislead our constituents or to delude ourselves, it is essential that we try to place the figures in proper perspective and to understand the facts that lie behind the figures.

It is an undoubted fact that recorded crime is increasing. For 1986, the increase in recorded crime was 7 per cent. This is an increase which, though larger than that for 1985, is very much in line with the annual increases which have occurred since 1955. Figures show that recorded crime increased at an average rate of 6 per cent. between 1980 and 1986, which is very much the same as the annual long-term rate of increase since 1955.

To keep the matter in perspective, I must make some further points. Not all classes of crime have risen at the same rate. Offences of violence against the person increased in 1986 by only 3 per cent. There was, indeed, a small increase in the clear-up rate for violent offences.

[Mr. Douglas Hogg]

It is also important to look closer at the nature of offences committed. That is because the fear of crime, though real and understandable, is not perhaps a true reflection of the character of crimes committed.

Most crimes are crimes against property and do not involve violence. Theft accounts for more than half of all notifiable offences. Crimes of violence against the person account for only 3 per cent. of notifiable crimes and I am glad to say that the elderly are the least likely to be the victims. The worst types of crime—homicide, offences endangering life, and rape—account for less than one third of one per cent. of all offences.

Statistics can be presented in a variety of ways. A burglary a minute sounds, and is, alarming, but that statistic implies a burglary only once in 35 years for the average person of 16 years of age. Such a person could expect a robbery once every 450 years and an assault resulting in injury once a century. Britain remains one of the safest countries in the world. Moroever—this point has been touched on by other hon. Members—it is a bizarre paradox that the more police we have and the more efficient and sensitive their methods, the more the public will report to them the offences of which they have become aware.

Mr. Alton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hogg: I shall give way in a moment.

Thus we shall have a rise in recorded crime.

Mr. Alton: The people listening to the debate might be somewhat mystified by the statistics that the hon. Gentleman has given. Surely he would accept that to give that kind of average figure belies a certain complacency in the inner city areas. I was burgled three times in one year. That is not a unfamiliar experience for people living in inner-city areas.

Mr. Hogg: First, it is essential that we present the facts fairly and clearly. That is what I sought to do. Secondly, it is simply unacceptable for the hon. Gentleman, who voted against the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 to criticise the Government's record on law and order.

Let us consider the raw facts. Today, the clear-up rate is about 5 per cent. down on that for 1985. However, the raw figures do not reveal the whole story. Thus, for example, there is a high clear-up rate for serious crimes of violence. The rate of clear-up for homicide is around 92 per cent. The rate of clear-up for offences against the person and sexual offences is around 70 per cent. Moreover, it is interesting to note that, in the last quarter of 1986, there was evidence of a recovery in the clear-up rate. What is the cause of the decline of the clear-up rate? I shall suggest some causes.

First, there has been a change in the crime profile for 1986. About one quarter of the overall fall in detection rates can be attributed to a change in the composition of recorded offences. Thus, for example, there has been a fall of 12 per cent. in the number of recorded cases of shoplifting. Shoplifting is a self-detecting crime. If one knows of a case of shoplifting, one almost certainly knows the offender. As a consequence, the fall in the number of recorded shoplifting offences has greatly reduced the proportion of clear-ups. That has been associated with a larger than average increase in the recorded number of thefts of and from cars, which also have a particularly low level of clear-up. That goes a long way to explain the decline in the clear-up rate.

We need to face two other important points. First, the introduction of the Crown prosecution service may have had a temporary impact on the figures. The introduction of the Crown prosecution service has been almost universally acclaimed — certainly in the House. Its introduction may have had an impact on the clear-up rates because we have brought new people, new procedures and new methods into play. It would not be in the least surprising if, for a short time, that had an effect on clear-up rates. But it goes further than that.

Parliament has decided — in my view, rightly — to introduce a range of measures designed to enhance civil liberties and to protect the offender against injustice. Those measures have been widely acclaimed and were certainly supported in part by Opposition Members.

Those measures could have had an impact on clear-up rates. For example, the right of an offender to have his solicitor present early in an investigation was called for by Opposition Members. But solicitors say to their clients, "Don't you say anything to the police." That leads to a fall in the clear-up rate. Another example is the requirement that is imposed on the police to take verbatim contemporary notes. That was called for by the Opposition, but undoubtedly it reduces the flow and the style of the interview.

Mr. Soley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hogg: No, not at the moment.

Yet another example is the restriction that is placed on the time that police officers can hold an offender for questioning. That has an effect on the clear-up rate and that, too, was called for by the Opposition. To some extent, these problems may bed down and resolve themselves.

Mr. Soley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hogg: No, not at the moment. We have embarked on a comprehensive programme that is designed to introduce the tape recording of interviews. There are certain features that will militate against that programme, but measures that are designed to improve civil liberties may have a price. It is unacceptable for the Labour party to call for such measures and then to say that it is not ready to pay that price.

Mr. Soley: This is the most complacent speech that I have ever heard on a Friday. The hon. Gentleman's example concerning civil liberties is particularly bad. I said that the Police and Criminal Evidence Act is a problem for the police, and the examples that the hon. Gentleman has chosen are precisely those that I gave. The Royal Commission wanted an absolute right for an offender to see a solicitor. The Government — only after pressure from the Opposition — introduced a limited right that makes it difficult for the citizen to know what his rights are and also makes it difficult for the police to know whether or not they have got it right. Therefore, the amount of time that police officers have to spend working out that and similar problems relating to the code of conduct, is ridiculously long.

Mr. Hogg: In his convoluted and difficult-to-understand manner, the hon. Gentleman is saying that he supports measures that would have an even more disastrous effect on the clear-up rate. I should not have thought that even he would want to advocate such measures.

That takes me to another matter—the Labour party. I should like to make it clear that neither the country nor Parliament will be lectured by the Labour party on law and order policies. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) is an expert in weasel words, an example of which he gave this morning when he referred to Wapping, and he made the curious suggestion that he was going to take off the gloves. Was that a reference to the question that he asked my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday, for which he was called to order by Mr. Speaker and rebuked—a curiously humiliating experience for a Front Bench Spokesman, even of the Labour party?

Despite that, I do not point the finger at the hon. Member for Hammersmith; he is by no means as bad as might be made out. But what the hon. Members for Hammersmith and for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) must realise is that in far too many cases far too many people who hold responsible positions in the Labour party have associated themselves with actions that have tended to destroy the cohesive nature of society and that have done real damage to the police service and to the concept of public order.

Mr. Soley: Name some.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman says, "Name some." I intend to do so. I would not allow this opportunity to pass without naming some. I begin by naming Mr. Livingstone, the prospective Labour candidate for Brent, East. He argued that two convicted IRA bombers should not be extradited from the Netherlands, and described them as political refugees. Let me also name Linda Bellos, who I understand is the Labour leader of Lambeth. She has accused the police of deliberately creating tension in Brixton. She said "The people of Brixton only want peace, but I think that the police are bent on war." A third example is Mr. Bernie Grant, the Labour leader of Haringey council and prospective parliamentary candidate for Tottenham, North. He justified the murder of PC Blakelock and the riot that preceded it by saying, "The police got a bloody good hiding."

Mr. Soley rose——

Mr. Hogg: No, I will not give way.

Mr. Grant compounded the offence on the radio this morning. He now knows the circumstances of that murder, but did he apologise? Oh, no. He tried to justify his remarks, saying, "They were a useful safety valve."

Mr. Soley rose——

Mr. Hogg: No, I will not give way.

Mr. Soley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is entirely wrong for the Minister to name a person and quote what he said outside the House, and to do so inaccurately, when that person is not in a position to correct the statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): It is for the Minister to decide whether he will give way.

Mr. Hogg: There was nothing inaccurate about any of the remarks that I quoted. The Labour party may be embarrassed and anxious to conceal the facts, but the House will hear them, and nothing that the hon. Member for Hammersmith does can stop it from doing so.

Let us examine some of the actions and policies of the Labour party. There are the frequent appearances of leading Labour supporters on picket lines when they know, or ought to know, that violence is likely. There is also the decision of the Labour-dominated Lambeth borough council to expel police consultative group members from the town hall—and for why? Because that group endorsed the use of baton rounds as "weapons of last resort". But most bizarre of all is the decision of the Labour-controlled Haringey council to issue 25,000 of what it is pleased to call "bust passes" to school children in the borough, advising them not to co-operate with the police should they be stopped or questioned by them. If I had the time, I could give a myriad other examples.

Before I leave the subject, let me refer to a few Labour party publications. Happily, Labour is not slow to publish its views. For example, Police Watch, which is published in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) with public money, is full of virulently anti-police material. Let us take, for instance, "How to make a complaint against the police", published by the London strategic policy unit, a Labour-controlled body. It begins:

> "Police misconduct ranges from the relatively minor incident such as rudeness, to dishonesty, racial prejudice, assault and causing death."

It goes on in that vein. There are also endless violently anti-police cartoons published in this document. I also have a picture, published by the Forest ward Labour party, showing a policeman holding a sledgehammer and grabbing a coloured man,—a virulent attack on the police.

What kind of party are we dealing with? The truth is, as we have come to realise, that far too many people within the Labour party are unfit to exercise any high authority in such matters. As the hon. Member for Hammersmith has been foolish enough to talk about the police, I shall talk about the Labour party's policy on the police in 1977 and 1978. At that time the police were 10,000 men below establishment. In December 1977 and 1978, there was an average deficiency of 8·5 per cent. on police establishment. Lord Edmund-Davies reported that police officers were grossly underpaid and that the police were deserting the force in droves. The fact that the Labour party is seeking to pretend that it is either willing or able to fund an adequate police service is simply to fly in the face of history.

I now refer to the very positive action that the Government have adopted—[Laughter.] I recommend that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, whom I rather like, should be careful because sometimes he does himself an injustice by treating serious matters frivolously.

Firstly, we have greatly increased the police service and the resources that are devoted to it. The facts are impressive. Total strength in England and Wales now stands at 122,100 men, which is the highest figure ever achieved. Since May 1979, total manpower available to the police service in England and Wales has increased by 16,391 men. In 1987-88 we expect to spend on the police service about 50 per cent. more in real terms than was spent in 1978-79. That is an achievement for which the Government can claim full credit.

[Mr. Hogg]

The progress will continue. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary stressed in May 1986, over the next three years or so we plan to recruit an additional 3,200 police officers and over 2,000 civilians. No other party could or would have attempted to bring about that transformation in the police service.

The second aspect of Government policy has been to ensure that the courts and the police have more than adequate powers to punish the offender. Frequently the Labour party, and sometimes its erstwhile supporters on Liberal Benches, has voted against the measures designed to enhance police and court powers, but fortunately the Conservative view prevailed.

Let me give some examples. We have created new offences, for example in the Public Order Act 1986. We have established higher maximum sentences for serious crime — for example, life for attempted rape and for carrying a firearm in the course of committing an offence. We have given, and we are now extending, the powers that the courts have to confiscate the proceeds of crime from convicted criminals. We are setting up the serious fraud office to challenge and contain serious incidents of fraud. In the Criminal Justice Bill we have done much to improve the procedure of the criminal courts and their ability to handle serious criminal cases.

My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden rightly referred to serious offences, particularly homicide. He said that there is to be a full debate on that subject later this month. It would be wrong for me to try to preclude that debate by expressing views now, but I am sure that my hon. Friend would be the first to recognise that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has made it wholly plain that for serious cases of murder, the murder of prison officers, the murder of police officers, murder in the course of committing a robbery, the sadistic or sexual murder of children and so on, there will be no early release of people so convicted. My hon. Friend will know that it is the Home Secretary's policy to ensure that people convicted of that class of offence will serve at least 20 years and may never emerge. That is the Government's policy.

As other hon. Members have said, the struggle against crime cannot be fought exclusively by the formal institutions of society. Nor should we neglect the policies that are designed to prevent crime. Much of crime is indeed preventable. Some 25 per cent. of burglaries are entirely opportunistic, in the sense that properties are not secured. Some 20 per cent. or so of vehicles are wholly unprotected and their doors are left unlocked. Therefore, we have recognised that we should place enormous emphasis on crime prevention. We have brought forward the most coherent crime prevention programme ever contemplated by any Government. We are in the process of fashioning a partnership in this war against crime. It is a partnership between the formal institutions of society, the Government, the police, the public utilities and local authorities on the one hand, and on the other, the multitude of individuals and organisations which form our society.

As a Government, we believe in arousing public awareness of what can and should be done to protect individual property. Hence our greatly expanded programme of crime prevention advertising. We believe in identifying practical crime prevention programmes and projects. Hence, for example, the standing conference on crime prevention and its working parties, which have come forward with reports containing suggestions of much practical worth.

We believe in local action and close co-operation between local communities and the police. hence the explosion in the number of neighbourhood watch schemes that are doing so much to reduce the fear of crime and, at the same time, are enhancing the security of local residents.

We believe in using public money to improve the security of buildings to reduce their vulnerability to the criminal, and that relates to a point raised by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. Thus, in 1987-88, we anticipate spending some £32 million within the community programme so as to finance some 7,000 places committed to crime prevention schemes, notably improving the security of homes lived in by the elderly and disadvantaged.

Some £30 million is likely to be spent in 1987-88 by the Department of the Environment on crime prevention measures that form part of the Department's urban programme. Some £7·5 million is likely to be spent by the Department of Transport to improve security on the London underground system. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury called for entryphones, improved lighting, concierges, railings, window locks, facilities for the young, and stronger doors. All of those are already being provided within projects for which the Government, or agencies supported by the Government, are responsible.

Mr. Soley: No they are not.

Mr. Hogg: There is no point in the hon. Member saying, "No." That simply shows ignorance. I am recounting the facts. He may not like them, he may not know about them, but let him regard this as an instructive experience.

Finally, I want to return to my main theme. Of course there is a problem of growing crime. That problem exists in almost every country. It has developed consistently and persistently for more than 30 years. There is no single solution. The causes of crime are rooted deep in society and will be difficult to eradicate. However, with total confidence I can claim that this Government's policies are much more likely to be effective than those on offer elsewhere. Those who assert the contrary are certainly deceiving the country, are probably deluding themselves, and most assuredly will not be believed.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau, Gwent): I have listened to almost every word of this extremely interesting debate. Although I did not agree with every passage in the Minister's speech, that was the only exception in a most constructive discussion. I hope that the Government will study the proposals that have come from many quarters.

I hope that the debate will also influence the comments that the Prime Minister may make on the subject. I intervened in the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) to explain our criticisms of the Prime Minister in relation to this matter. The more that he and the Minister argue that there has been a consistent increase in violent and other crimes, the more that is a damaging attack on what the Prime Minister said in 1979, when she gave no recognition of the steady increase in crime in Britain and abroad. In her aggressive, demagogic manner she tried to pretend that the increase in crime before 1979 was due to the Labour Government. She heaped all the abuse upon us and, indeed, did something similar in 1983. As her remarks on the subject attract such little criticism in most newspapers, no attention has been paid to them.

After the steady increase of crime during the entire period in which the right hon. Lady has been Prime Minister, and recalling her prophecies of how she would deal with the problems much better than the Labour Government could, I hope that it is not too much to ask for a little humility from the Prime Minister and that before she speaks on the subject again she will listen to the views of those who have tried to study the real causes of crime in their communities and the real causes of the dangers that were discussed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), to which the Minister and other members of the Government have not applied their minds. That is the danger of the disease of riot spreading in a big way.

Hundreds of years ago, riots broke out and historians spent years afterwards examining the causes. Does anyone imagine that, in five, 10 or 20 years' time historians examining the causes of the disturbances in London, Birmingham or Bristol will come to the conclusion that mass unemployment on a scale unknown since the end of the war and unemployment among young people on a scale that we have never known had no effect on the rates of crime? Of course, they will not come to that conclusion. No Opposition Member says that unemployment is the sole cause, but it is a major factor in the background.

The Under-Secretary of State talked of crime prevention as the cause to which we should all give allegiance and the course which we should follow. I strongly support what he said. I thought for a moment that he would go on to quote the motion which I tabled, but which we shall be unable to debate, which reads:

"That this House expresses its disgust and alarm at the crisis in British universities arising from the parsimony and philistinism of Her Majesty's Government; calls for strong resistence from all universities and polytechnics and colleges throughout the country against the effects of indiscriminate monetarism; and cites in particular one development requiring immediate remedy, the curtailment in the purchase of books for schools, public libraries and the universities themselves."

Does anyone claim that those matters have no connection with crime?

Good schools and good universities are places where young people can learn how to play their full part in the community throughout the rest of their lives. Those are the most necessary requirements for dealing with crime prevention, as described by the Minister a few moments ago.

On all the matters connected with crime prevention the Government have shown something worse than delinquency — they have flown in the face of the recommendations and warnings from all the scholastic authorities. The Government have an utterly disreputable record with regard to universities, schools and their attempt to sustain places where we could combat this appalling rise in crime. A rise that has been greater than anything known for generations.

After six or seven years of, what I believe is called "Thatcher-Lawson prosperity" we have the worst crime rate in history. After six or seven years of "Thatcher-Lawson prosperity" we have unemployment of a still horrific and historic scale.

Mr. Lawrence: It is falling.

Mr. Foot: Even if that level continues to fall for the next few years at the present rate it will not approach the level of unemployment that the Prime Minister inherited when she came to office in 1979. The present unemployment level remains of historic proportion.

After six or seven years of "Thatcher-Lawson prosperity" we have the worst threatened scientific brain drain in modern times. If anyone has any doubt about that they should study the headline in The Daily Telegraph today—I am sure that the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) will confirm it—

"Universities fear greatest ever brain drain"

We should have the brains in this country to assist us to deal with these problems. However, the report from a highly-respected, independent scientific body has said that the universities fear the loss of their scientists.

After six or seven years of "Thatcher-Lawson prosperity" morale in our universities is at rock bottom. If anyone thinks that is an exaggeration they should read yesterday's debate in the other place. That debate was initiated by Lord Swann. He described not only the effects on our universities, but the effects on our society if this type of deterioration is permitted. Nobody could read that debate without being ashamed about what is being done and about how the massive cuts in expenditure for universities have imposed a separate, but common, problem on pretty well all universities. I would be very surprised if anyone told me that has had no influence whatever on the level of crime in this country.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): To keep tentatively in order may I point out that the crime rate in Cambridge has fallen in the past year. I fully share the right hon. Gentleman's concern about the decision of the Science and Engineering research council. Does the right hon. Gentleman also agree that the reason for the problem is that although we have increased university salaries by £167 million, we must do more?

Mr. Foot: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, as he speaks with great knowledge about these matters. He has illustrated what the Government should do to deal with the problem.

If the Government intended to deal fairly with the universities when they, belatedly, agreed to the increase in salaries they should also have agreed an extra amount that could be afforded to enable those salaries to be paid without causing other deprivations. It is not possible for anyone to read the debate in the other place without reaching the conclusion that a serious burden has been imposed on our universities—no policy could be more absurd.

Any Government who had considered the dangers of mass unemployment and the social consequences of allowing it to continue year after year would have realised that to prevent the crime wave extending across the whole country they must ensure that more young people have the chance to go to good schools and to go on to university. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) would agree with that, but he knows better than anyone else that the Government have approved a policy of putting such pressure on universities that the whole programme for the extension of university education will be curtailed, but every university will suffer in terms of variety of courses and facilities. That is the Government's policy as explained by Lord Swann and others yesterday. No one can suggest that such a policy will not have social consequences in the very areas that we are discussing today.

We should have regular debates on crime when there is a Conservative Administration because such debates illustrate some of the consequences of their neglect of other areas. Morale in the universities is at its lowest in modern times and this is strictly relevant to the subject under debate. The situation has taken different forms in different areas. Oxford, for example, has recently seen the effects of the massive cuts. The same is true in Northern Ireland. I visited the university of Northern Ireland the other day. There is record unemployment in Northern Ireland and various sectarian organisations are seeking to drag young people into various forms of crime. Yet it is Government policy to cut the money available to the universities there. Queen's university provides a splendid service to the whole of Ireland, as does the university at Coleraine. I invite hon. Members to visit either of those universities. People there spoke of the consequences to be expected if cuts continue to be imposed.

Special considerations apply in Northern Ireland and I hope that the whole House is concerned about the situation there. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who is Opposition Front Bench spokesman in this debate, has a special interest in the matter. We all know that to deal with crime and social problems in Northern Ireland we must encourage those institutions that set their faces against all forms of sectarian violence. Yet the universities and museums face constant cuts when they are the very institutions that should be encouraged if young people are to have the chance of obtaining proper training and a decent livelihood. In some respects—this is scarcely credible, but the figures show that it is true — university allowances and book provision in Northern Ireland face greater cuts than in other parts of the United Kingdom.

All these matters are strictly relevant to today's debate. It is a shame and a scandal that after seven years of so-called economic advance the Government are still squeezing the very institutions that have the best chance of providing a common bond between north and south.

There are only two institutions in Northern Ireland—one cannot include the Church—which try to overcome the sectarian madness and horror. Nobody can deny that trade unions do their job. They try to deal with and to face the problem where it hurts. The universities also have a good reputation in this area. However, this Government have rewarded the universities in the North with cuts and, in some repsects, they have been cut even more than other universities.

Mr. Rhodes James: The right hon. Gentleman must realise that this Government saved the university of Coleraine. My contribution to that was one of the most important things that I have ever done. I am grateful to my right hon. Friends for having rejected the Chilver report and saved Coleraine. If one is to take an example of the Government's alleged attack on higher education, the right hon. Gentleman has chosen the worst example.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will continue to relate his remarks to the debate, which is about law and order.

Mr. Foot: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will have been following closely how exactly I have related my comments to the debate. I am most gratified by your commendation. The hon. Member for Cambridge, has been in absolute conformity with the other matters that we are discussing. He naturally interrupts because he had a special part in ensuring that Coleraine should be preserved. I congratulate him on that. However, he should go there now, talk to people and listen to what they have to say about the cuts. He should talk first to the principals, the dons and the tutors because they have a case. He should talk to the students who also have to face cuts.

One of the reasons why more people will be potential criminals is that student grants are being cut to such an extent that there will be fewer students. I do not know whether other hon. Members have understood the matter, but it seems common sense that more people go to university, take longer courses and enjoy ease in the way in which they carry through their scholastic affairs, one would make a big contribution towards dealing with crime.

One of the things that is most odious in this House—in this Parliament there is strong competition on this—is that some hon. Members—I do not refer to the hon. Member for Cambridge, who has always fought for his university and constituency in such matters — but to other hon. Members, some of whom sit on the Front Bench, have been the beneficiaries of our university education system but are responsible for the heavy cuts that are being proposed. Those cuts will mean that fewer of the coming generation will be able to go to university or to choose the varied courses that should be available to them. That is an outrage which should be brought home to each of those hon. Members specifically.

The same applies, only more so, to the Open University. When we are facing heavy unemployment and when the crime rate is rising on an unprecedented scale, I should have thought that the obvious and easiest thing for the Government to do—it would not be very costly—would be to ensure that more people can take up an Open University course. Quite a number of people in my constituency, who have been thrown out of the steelworks, or who have lost jobs in other places at the age of 30 or 40 have taken advantage of Open University courses. People of all ages, including younger people, can apply. It is a great credit to those, such as Jennie Lee, who established the Open University, that today more university places are provided by the Open University than by pretty well all the other universities put together. Surely a Government who want to deal with these social problems can learn the lesson and say, "We shall encourage that." Instead, the Government have discouraged it and forced an increase in fees for the Open University. That has meant that many thousands of people who would have qualified for Open University courses in 1986, 1987 and 1988 are being denied the opportunity. That is a deep offence against the individuals concerned and against society.

If anybody tries to contest what I am saying and thinks that I am exaggerating, let him read what the House of Lords had to say and answer those who spoke on behalf of all universities. Their comments confirm everything that I have said.

The curtailment of the provision of books in our schools, libraries and universities is a national scandal. When we try to raise that with the Government, they brush it aside and will not face facts, but certain people know the facts. Publishers who are interested in selling their books know the facts and have the figures. Some figures published in the past few days confirm that in this so-called prosperous country of ours less money is being spent on books for libraries, universities and schools. I would have thought that when those facts were brought to the attention of any Government, they would put it right.

Both the crime rate and the injury to our education system that the Government are prepared to tolerate are due to the type of society that the Government seek to sustain. The Government seek to breed a seedy, shoddy, moneygrabbing, insider-trading mentality which helps to purvey the spirit in which many other activities are conducted in our community.

References have been made to the effect of television. The nature of it is sometimes mistaken. If increasing numbers of men and women, denied the right to work and to decent jobs, sit before television sets and hear the values that are spilt out night after night, it has an effect: it enforces, enlarges and illustrates the division in our society more than anything else. I hope that the Government will look at those matters afresh.

The Government have inflicted that injury on our young people and have permitted the crime wave to rise on a scale that was never conceived of previously. Certainly, it was not conceived of by the Prime Minister and those in 1979 and 1983 who pretended that they had the best ways of dealing with crime. The Government's policies are injuring many other areas, such as those I have illustrated, especially the universities.

The Government are injuring something that is more precious than North sea oil and more precious even than the huge mass of manufacturing industries that they have driven out of business. They injure something that the universities seek to protect, but deny the universities the circumstances, possibilities and means of doing so. By far our most valuable asset is the English language, even reckoned in purely commercial terms. Over the past 30 years the most beneficent conquest that the world has ever seen is our possession of the English language which has enabled us to open doors and perform feats in the post-war world which would not have been available to us previously. Although it is our greatest treasure the Government have gone to every university — Cardiff, London, Oxford, Cambridge, and Coleraine — and said, "You must make cuts and we don't care if you have to cut English teaching." We have never understood what that was about.

There are multitudes of reasons why the Government should be thrown out with contempt. One is the fact that they promised to check the crime wave, but have allowed it to rise to a level unprecedented in our history. Another is the way in which, despite all their pious exclamations, they have injured an entire new generation. That generation has been hit harder in some parts of the country than in others, but the country's unity and effectiveness have been injured by the Government's policies.

If we did not have many good reasons for kicking out the Government, we have heard several today.

2.17 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) in opening our debate expressed the arguments in favour of the courts having the right to impose capital punishment. I am sure that, on both sides of the House, he is respected for his sincerity and consistency on that issue. I would like to take the opportunity, briefly of expressing another point of view.

I concede that some people contemplating murder will be deterred by the risk that it might lead to capital punishment; but let me deal, if I may, with some of the other arguments. The first is one that was suggested this morning, that is, that public opinion requires a return to capital punishment so hon. Members must vote for it whether their consciences agree with it or not. That is a totally wrong conception of the responsibilities of hon. Members.

If one chose 650 people in our country at random, the majority, at first unthinkingly, might express themselves in favour of the reintroduction of hanging. But if they gave the subject as much study as many hon. Members have done, sometimes over a period of years in debate after debate, I believe that they would then vote very much as the House has voted time and again.

Secondly, I should like to comment on the pressure on hon. Members of party opinion inside the House, in constituency associations or by other means. Hon. Members should have the humility to concede on many issues of the day that their party colleagues know better than they do themselves; but, on a matter of life and death, each hon. Member is entitled to insist on a totally free vote. On such a matter, where a human life or perhaps a number of lives may depend on the outcome of our vote, it would be a crime, and, indeed, itself a form of calculated killing, if any single hon. Member were to put his parliamentary career or electoral advantage ahead of his conscience.

On the last occasion, the House decided to consider murder as part of a terrorist campaign as a separate issue. Some Members who opposed capital punishment for other crimes were prepared to vote in favour of it as a punishment for terrorism. I recognise that some people engaged in terrorist activities would be deterred by the risk of capital punishment, but I think that others would become even more detemined, particularly where religious fanaticism is the guiding motive.

How do I, personally, approach the matter? I have a strong personal conviction that taking human life, except in combat or in self-defence, is wholly wrong. Calculated killing of another human being is totally inadmissible, whether for motives of greed or jealousy or for revenge, whether racial, personal or judicial. Killing in cold blood is wrong: two wrongs do not make a right.

I should like also to say a few words about the subject of corporal punishment, which is often linked with the claim that we should be returning to capital punishment, as well. Most men of my age, in the course of their education, became accustomed to corporal punishment, It was often very severe, and sometimes quite undeserved; but we regarded it as a matter of course.

But in the army I had the privilege of serving in a regiment with very high morale. Nobody had to flog us to win our loyalty and co-operation, instantaneous obedience and life-long commitment to the ideals of the regiment.

[Sir Brandon Rhys Williams]

Discipline was imposed in another way. I have now concluded that the return of corporal punishment would be undesirable in schools and unacceptable, and probably on balance counter-productive, for adults.

I believe that we should be striving to establish in Britain a sense of belonging to a community with rules of mutual respect amd support, and of obedience to law, which are wholly in accordance with our personal ideals as citizens. That is a job for all of us as citizens. I welcome neighbourhood watch as an example of a helpful initiative which should be warmly welcomed on both sides of the House.

In dealing with the growth in crime, I think that the House should recognise the dangers of creating a secondary community. We are indeed in danger of doing that — of creating a subculture within the nation. We made the mistake of segregating people in council estates and that, I think, is evidenced in the crime figures. I think, too, that we are making a mistake by our over-reliance on means-tested benefits for the relief of need. The Government quite rightly advertise the work ethos and recommend thrift for every citizen as the source of their self-respect. It is quite wrong that these principles should be undermined for the millions of our people who are regularly dependent on supplementary benefit—or other means-tested benefits — in order to maintain a decent standard of life. We now have 14 million people who are dependent in one way or another on means-tested benefits. They are bound to see themselves as second-rate citizens economically and therefore they are likely in the end to drop out of the moral consensus as well. I think that we have to recognise that that is an element in the problems that we are seeing.

I think, too, that the House should recognise the dangers of our failure to integrate the immigrant communities. In Kensington I am happy to say that we have very long familiarity with people from other races and I would like to claim Kensington as a racism-free zone. But more often than I am prepared to condone I have seen examples, I regret to say, of prejudice, lack of consideration and even of sheer bloody-mindedness on the part of officials responsible to the Home Secretary for dealing with immigrants and visitors.

I realise the difficulties of their work. I do not oppose the policy of restricting the numbers of immigrants to this country. But we have read with horror of the way in which administrators in the southern states of America before the civil war used to take it as a matter of course that they were entitled to separate parents and children and to break up the marriages of established couples in the subordinate population. Sadly, I have to tell the House that this can and does still happen in Kensington.

Some years ago I was also troubled by the evidence that the Home Office was too lax in its control of the conduct of the Metropolitan police, particularly in regard to the treatment of suspects and people held under arrest. There are still grounds for anxiety in this respect, but not I believe in Kensington, where the attitude of senior police officers appears to me to be exemplary. Their influence on the junior ranks has made for a very demonstrable improvement and a much better relationship with minority groups in recent times. Perhaps if the same degree of attention had been given in other parts of the country to relationships between the public authorities and the immigrant communities as is given in Kensington, there might have been fewer tragic and outrageous incidents.

The figures of crime are increasing and there is a very widespread public demand for better protection, particularly in regard to street violence and rape. These are matters where the return of capital punishment would, in my opinion, be irrelevant. I strongly support the request from the Metropolitan police for an increase in their establishment, and I would like there to be more local accommodation for police officers so that they did not have to start and end their working time with long and tiring journeys.

There is also a strong public demand for longer prison sentences. We already have a very large prison population and there is not much evidence that a prison sentence, short or long, has a really deterrent or curative effect in very many cases.

In the course of my time as a Member of Parliament I have visited, I think, all the London prisons and more than one prison outside. Quite candidly, I am not surprised that imprisonment does not have the desired effect. Longer prison sentences would seem to me to be very likely to be counter-productive in many cases. I think that members of the prison service whom I have met, many of whom are extremely sincere and responsible people, do not know precisely what it is they are supposed to be doing. We should give the prison service clear guidance as to whether its role is punitive or curative.

I accept that prisoners should never be deprived of hope or self-respect, but that does not imply that a stay in prison should be like a long holiday in a very low-grade hotel. I believe that a prison sentence should be divided clearly into a primary and secondary period and that the courts should be entitled to specify the minimum length of the primary sentence. The purpose of the primary sentence should be punitive, deterrent and strictly corrective. It should involve clockwork routine and instant obedience in an austere though never degrading environment—on the contrary, there should be the strongest emphasis on hygiene and personal cleanliness. That of course is almost impossible in some of our extant institutions.

It should be normal, when prisoners have completed the primary sentence imposed by the courts, to be able to bring this part of their sentence to an end by their own conduct and response to discipline. The secondary prison sentence should constitute a well-planned course of personal improvement, involving the learning of useful skills, academic study and attention to physical and mental health. I am convinced that if we made better use of prison terms imposed by the courts, we would not need to lengthen them. There is a need for the Home Office to provide a clear lead to the prison service which for many years it has not given, as to the purpose of a prison sentence.

Mr. Soley: It is nice to hear the increasingly rare but very welcome humane and civilised voice of the Conservative party. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in the prisons we ought to be working towards a code of minimum standards in order to ensure the sort of things that he describes?

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Yes. I hope that Home Office officials will listen to what the hon. Gentleman has said in that respect. I notice that they have not stayed to listen to our speeches just now.

The House owes a debt to my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden for giving us the opportunity at this highly topical moment to discuss these issues. Hon. Members who have spoken on both sides have spoken with absolute sincerity and the Home Office now should pay particular note to the course of the debate. I am grateful and should like to express my appreciation to my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden for initiating this debate.

Mr. Iain Mills: I am grateful for this opportunity to speak for the second time. Obviously, in the time remaining I cannot respond to all the many kind and some unkind comments. Instead I shall make a few short remarks.

It is a pity that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who led for the Opposition, did not take the opportunity to consider this issue on a more fundamental basis. His point about local authority expenditure ignored the fact that many of the councils about which he spoke have the simple recourse, as is done elsewhere, of cutting some of the programmes that some of their ratepayers find offensive. The money saved could then be spent on the important subject of protecting tower blocks. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, the installation in Solihull and certainly in Chelmsley Wood of entry phones and secure systems, although not perfect, is a great step forward. I thank all hon. Members who have taken part in the debate for their kind words. We had excellent contributions from hon. Members in all parts of the House.

I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the increasing emphasis on prevention in the fight against crime; believes that the development of closer links between the police, the community and industry has an important part to play in both the prevention and detection of crime, including industrial crime; and calls upon the Government to ensure that the range of sentences available to the courts is sufficient to enable them to deal effectively with those who commit crimes.

House of Commons Members' Fund

2.30 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I beg to move,

That in pursuance of the provisions of section 3 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948 and of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981 the maximum annual amounts of the periodical payments which may be made out of the House of Commons Members' Fund under the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, as amended, and the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 of the said Act of 1981 shall be varied as from 1st April 1987 as follows:

(a) for paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the said Act of 1939, as amended, there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

'1. The annual amount of any periodical payment made to any person by virtue of his past membership of the House of Commons shall not exceed £2,451 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £4,512 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to length of service and need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,728 or such sum as, in their opinion, will bring his income up to £6,789 per annum, whichever is the less';

(b) for paragraph 2 of that Schedule there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

'2. The annual amount of any periodical payment to any person by virtue of her being a widow of a past Member of the House of Commons shall not exceed £1,227 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £3,288 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to her husband's length of service or to her need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,361 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £4,422 per annum, whichever is the less';

(c) in paragraph 2A of that Schedule, for the words 'the annual amount of any periodical payment' to the end of the paragraph there shall be substituted the following words:

'the annual amount of any periodical payment made to any such widower shall not exceed £1,227 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £3,288 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to his wife's length of service or to his needs, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,361 or such sums as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £4,422 per annum, whichever is the less';

(d) in section 2(1) of the said Act of 1981, for the words from the beginning to the end of paragraph (b) there shall be substituted the following words:

'the annual rate of any payments made under secton 1 shall be—

(a) £1,428 if the payments are made to a past Member; and

(b) £714 if the payments are made to the widow or widower of a past Member'.

The motion stands in my name and those of right hon. and hon. Members, on both sides of the House, who share with me the responsibility, as trustees, of administering the House of Commons Members' Fund. The purpose of the resolution is to provide for an increase in the present levels of grants and payments which may be made under the Members' Fund legislation. These were last revised in December 1985, and the proposal we are making now is that they should be increased from 1 April 1987 by approximately 4 per cent. in line with the increases approved for public service and state retirement pensions in July 1986 and in April this year.

Unlike those of us who now enjoy superannuation benefits as of right, former colleagues who left the House before 1964, and their widows and widowers, have no pension entitlement. Many of them are living in considerably reduced and straitened circumstances, more especially former Members and their dependants who are now of advanced years, but the help that my fellow trustees and I are able to provide from the Members fund is, as the House knows, extremely modest.

A particular problem is that the whereabouts of our former colleagues or their widows or widowers is not always known to us. Thus, I should be most grateful if right hon. and hon. Members could get in touch with me, should they know of any former Members or their dependants who are in need of our help.

I need not detain the House at any length today, as the provisions for which we seek approval are set out in detail in the resolution on the Order Paper. These may be briefly summarised as follows: sub-paragraph 1*(a)* deals with the provision for grants to ex-Members. Here, it is proposed to increase the basic annual grant to £2,451, subject to an income limit, including the grant, of £4,512. In the case of ex-Members with longer service who are in need, the grant may be increased to a maximum of £4,728, subject to an income limit of £6,789.

Sub-paragraphs 1*(b)* and 1*(c)* deal with the provision of grants to widows and widowers of ex-Members. It is proposed to increase the basic annual grant to £1,227, subject to an income limit, including the grant, of £3,288. Similarly, in the case of widows or widowers of ex-Members who had longer service and where there is need, the grant may be increased to a maximum of £2,361, subject to an income limit of £4,422.

Sub-paragraph 1*(d)* refers to the "as-of-right payments" from the Members fund to ex-Members who had 10 years' service before October 1964, and to widows and widowers of such Members, provided for by the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981. It is proposed to increase those annual payments to £1,428 in the case of ex-Members, and to £714 in the case of widows or widowers.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): Can the right hon. Gentleman tell the House how many former Members of the House and widows receive discretionary grants? Can the right hon. Gentleman also advise the House how many recipients there are of the "as-of-right payments" under the 1981 Act?

Mr. Morris: The number of recipients of discretionary grants under the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, as amended, are: ex-Members, five, widows, eight, and there are eight hardship cases under section 4 of the 1948 Act, giving a total of 21. In the case of the 1981 Act, the number of recipients of "as-of-right payments", at present, are: ex-Members 51 and widows 34, giving a total of 85. The additional annual cost of the increase that we propose is estimated to amount to £5,300. I commend the resolution to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT 1986 (AMENDMENT) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Not moved.

REGISTERED ESTABLISHMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.
Order for Third Reading read
Bill read the Third time, and passed.

OPPOSITION BUDGETS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Not moved.

Abortions (Monitoring)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

2.36 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): The House may know of my concern about abortion. I made my maiden speech on abortion during proceedings on the "Corrie" Bill. I did so because my socialism is built on respect for the dignity and sanctity attached to human life. I was required to leave the Chamber by Mr. Speaker during proceedings on the Canada Bill when I objected to the new constitutional arrangements which, in my view, had implications for abortion legislation in Canada.

I am not alone in expressing such views. They are the views of many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne), who is in the Chamber today. Many people in the Labour party feel as strongly as I do about these matters. There are people throughout the world who subscribe to these views.

The Government should take note of the resolution passed at Zagreb during the recent conference of the International Right to Life Federation. The resolution stated:

"This fourth World conference of the International Right to Life Federation held in Zagreb, Yugoslavia this year condemns the present abortion policy of the United Kingdom as one of the most barbaric in the world. Delegates representing 15 nations deplore the Abortion Act 1967 and draw the attention of the British Government to the fact that it is the only law in Europe accepting social abortion beyond the 20th week of pregnancy, in consequence of which thousands of expectant mothers from overseas are encouraged to go to Britain by abortion racketeers for late social abortions, which carry enormously increased risks to women and are in breach of laws in their own countries. The conference calls on the right honourable Mrs. Thatcher and her Government to allow Parliament the time to amend the law giving greater protection to unborn children and mothers and ending this dishonourable trade in human misery."

The monitoring of the abortion law in the United Kingdom has always been of concern to me, if not the statistical basis on which the Department disseminates information, certainly the criminal negligence of the Government, in turning a blind eye to the operation of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929. The Act is explicit. It states in section 1 that the killing of a child capable of being born alive and before it has an existence independent of the mother is an act of child destruction.

The 28-week limit was born in the belief that such gestational age was prima facie proof of capability of being born alive. Nevertheless, science has moved on and we now know that a baby of 18 to 21 weeks is most certainly capable of being born alive, albeit that at this stage in medicine it is too small to survive. We also know that from 18 weeks, as any gynaecologist can confirm, babies if born or aborted by hysterotomy, shows real and discernible signs of life.

It was primarily this consideration that motivated Mr. C in the case of Mr. C v. Miss S. Acting as a third party, Mr. C sought to secure protection of a baby capable of being born alive. Miss S's pregnancy had reached the 20th week and as far as Mr. C was concerned deserved the legal protection provided by law under the Infant Life (Preservation) Act. He called in aid article 23 of the World Health Organisation constitution which was adopted by the World Health Assembly in 1976 and which defined live birth as "expulsion or extraction from its mother of a product of conception irrespective of the duration of the pregnancy which after such separation oreathes or shows any other evidence of life such as beating of the heart, pulsation of the umbilical cord or definite movement of voluntary muscle, whether or not the umbilical cord had been cut or the placenta is attached. Each product of such a birth is considered liveborn."

Mr. C further called in aid the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953 which in clause 41 defines a stillborn child as a child

"which did not at any time after being completely expelled from its mother breathe or show any other sign of life."

Thus, a foetus born showing any signs of life must under the Act be registered as a live birth.

A child may die shortly after birth, as it most certainly would at only 18 or 20 weeks gestation. Nevertheless, the law of the land states that a foetus must be registered as a live birth. Someone might ask why abortions are carried out in this country up to and beyond 28 weeks. The answer is the presumption written into the 1929 Act that evidence that a woman had at any material time been pregnant for a period of 28 weeks or more shall be prima facie proof that she was at that time pregnant of a child capable of being born alive.

As I have mentioned, medicine has moved on. Whereas in 1929 it was miraculous for a 28-week foetus to survive, according to Dr. P.M. Dunn from the department of child health in Southmead hospital, Bristol, in a paper submitted in 1985 to the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, in 1984, 72 per cent. of all live born infants of 22 to 27 weeks gestation born at the Bristol maternity hospital survived. Only two years earlier, in 1982, the survival rate for the same group had been 43 per cent., in 1981 29 per cent. In Bristol things are really happening.

The information gleaned from the monitoring of the figures in Bristol places a new responsibility upon the Minister to review the operations of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act. The Lane committee recommendations of 1974 seem, on reflection, enlightened and far-sighted when we consider them 13 years later. The committee admitted that, despite taking a liberal position on abortion, the taking of a 28-week gestational period as prima facie proof of capability of being born alive was unreasonably late. It recommended that there should be an upper limit on abortion of 24 weeks and that thereafter every effort should be made to preserve the life of the child. If the Lane committee were to consider and recommend on these matters today, it would recommend a new limit of 20 weeks.

How can we secure a more vigilant application of the law in the light of scientific advance? According to monitoring by the Department, in 1985, 1,628 babies were aborted at 22 and 23 weeks, seven of which were to save the mother's life, and 494 abortions were carried out at 24 weeks plus, only five of which were carried out to save the mother's life. In the latest years for which we have figures, 1,531 unborn children of 24 weeks and over have been aborted, and in only 22 cases could the operation be justified under existing law, particularly as the most avid abortionists at the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists admit that all of these children are capable of being born alive and surviving. What action has been taken by the Minister to initiate prosecutions in the other 1,509 cases of child destruction?

[Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours]

In addition, babies of 22 and 23 weeks are aborted, which, quite clearly from the evidence that we have from Bristol, were capable not only of being born alive but of surviving. Over three years, a total of 4,572 abortions were carried out, of which only 13 were performed to save the mother's life. They are the best figures that I have been able to glean. I am sure that the Minister will be quick to correct me if I am wrong and, certainly, to comment on them. What action has been taken in the 4,559 cases in which doctors have flagrantly broken the law, and broken it repeatedly?

In a series of written answers on 10 and 12 December, the Minister referred to the fact that the Government had circulated to all regional health authorities a copy of a report that they had encouraged the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists to produce on the subject of foetal viability and clinical practice. The report studied the implementation of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act and pointed out that many late abortions are blatantly in breach of the law. Yet nowhere in the report is it stated that doctors should carry out such late abortions only to save mothers' lives. Nowhere in the report is it declared that criminal proceedings might be brought against doctors who break the law. The report takes a decidedly schizophrenic approach, urging that the "gestational age after which a foetus is considered viable should be changed from the present limit of 28 weeks to 24 weeks gestation."

The report goes on to state that:

"in accordance with the WHO recommendation a record should be kept of all babies born alive or dead at 22 weeks gestational age, or, if born earlier, weighing 500g or more."

However, the figures that are quoted in the report to justify 24 weeks are for 1982. Science has moved on since then. The figures for Bristol in 1984 are quoted nowhere, but they show that the period of 24 weeks is already out of date.

The Government's senior medical officer, Dr. W J Modle, was a participant in the symposium on pre-term labour and its consequences, at which proceedings the Bristol paper by Professor Dunn was originally presented. Therefore, he must have known about the evidence of the survival rate of babies in that area. He was also an observer on the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists committee that published the report on foetal viability and clinical practice, the report that the Minister so proudly told us had been circulated to all regional health authorities. How does the Minister justify the failure of Dr. Modle to ensure that this report was an accurate and comprehensive document, giving the latest data available to ensure that those in authority were fully and properly informed? Can the Minister explain why she has failed to send with such a document the instruction that late abortions are completely unlawful?

No other country in Europe allows abortions from 20 weeks, as we do for social reasons. That brings me to a further point. I am told quite categorically by nurses working in National Health Service hospitals where abortions are performed that a goodly number of the abortions are not NHS abortions, as they are listed in the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys monitors. Therefore, although they are performed on NHS premises —and listed as such quite correctly by the OPCS—many of those abortions are carried out in pay beds. Not only do I know of this from nurses who are working in the NHS, but reference has been made to it over the years by doctors working in the private sector as a response to criticism for their charges. What steps has the Minister ever taken to check on the number of abortions in the NHS that are carried out in pay beds and those performed as NHS operations? Surely that is of particular importance when a law such as the Infant Life (Preservation) Act is being broken scores of times each month quite openly.

I have always felt very strongly about this matter. I have not come here today to make an ashamedly anti-abortion speech. That has not been my objective. I shall save that for another occasion. I have come today to make a plea that the Minister should ensure that the Infant Life (Preservation) Act is implemented, taking into account the latest scientific advances. We cannot fudge these matters. Those who follow the law in detail just wonder why the Government insist on turning a blind eye to the implementation of the Act. I hope that in her reply the Minister will answer that specific question.

2.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): As is the normal courtesy, I should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on his success in Mr. Speaker's ballot. As he has just demonstrated, abortion is a subject about which people have very strong views that are sincerely held, and often widely differing, but Governments traditionally have adopted a neutral stance and free votes have been allowed in this House and elsewhere on these subjects.

Let me put on record some of the latest statistics. In 1985, the total number of abortions performed was 171,873, of which 65,176 were performed in the National Health Service on residents. In 1986, the equivalent figures were 129,131, and 49,433 in the first three quarters of 1986. The rates per 1,000 resident women in the quarter ended September—the most recent figures that I have—are 2·92, which suggests that the rate of abortion may be dropping in this country, as the previous full year's figure was 12·97. I hope that that may indeed be the case.

The number of terminations in the case of women under 16 has also shown something of a trend. In 1985, there were 4,002 such terminations and the rate per 1,000 among women of 14 and 15 years of age was 5·41. In the first quarter of 1986, there were 1,028 such terminations; in the June quarter there were 980; and in the September quarter there were 900. Therefore the most recent figure gives us a rate per 1,000 women aged 14 and 15 of 1·22. Again that is a drop on the previous year.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the gestation period is also one of the statistics that is collected. In 1986—in the first three quarters only—of the 110,000 abortions performed on resident women in this country, nearly 100,000 were performed at the gestation age of 12 weeks or less. Therefore, the vast majority are done on pregnancies in the early weeks of the woman's time. The total number of terminations in the first three quarters of 1986 on babies of a gestation period of 25 weeks and over was 19. Therefore, I caution the hon. Gentleman when he talks about 24 weeks or over 24 weeks—[Interruption.] I said, "25 weeks and over". The rule that I mentioned says, "over 24 weeks", so I take it in exactly the same way. There is a difference between talking about at 24 weeks and over 24 weeks. There is a distinction. It is also worth pointing out—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree—that gestation may be a matter of rather fine judgment, particularly before a termination takes place.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Bristol study in which a 70 per cent. survival rate was reported for babies born alive at gestations between 22 and 27 weeks. I have no doubt about that, but I suggest that those figures were heavily skewed towards the later age. In fairness, the figures should be disaggregated. There is a danger that the hon. Gentleman might give the wrong impression, with statements such as, "70 per cent. of babies born at 22 weeks will survive." The hon. Gentleman knows that such a statement is not true.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Lady said that the figures were slanted towards the figure of 27——

Mrs. Currie: I did not say "slanted". I said "skewed".

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Do I presume that the hon. Lady accepts that 22-week foetuses are surviving and can survive? If the hon. Lady accepts that, does she not then accept that she has a duty to look at the statistics to ensure that in every one of the cases where there is a potential for survival, which must run into hundreds each year, every effort is made to see that the foetus survives and is not aborted?

Mrs. Currie: We monitor the figures all the time. The word "skewed" is a statistical term, which I am sure the hon. Gentleman will realise. I do not want to imply any bias in that.

The hon. Gentleman should be aware that if figures are to be useful and are to form part of an intelligent discussion, it is probably better if they are disaggregated appropriately. The figures that he quoted in the booklet that he mentioned clearly show that there might be a 70 per cent. survival rate of babies born alive at the later stage in that age range.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Can they survive at 22 weeks?

Mrs. Currie: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue.

It is worth putting on record the number of deaths following legal abortion in England and Wales. In 1969 there were still 17 women who died following abortion, but in the years since 1973, the number has never been more than a single figure. In 1985 only two women died following legal abortion. Clearly, the change in the law has helped some people quite considerably.

The hon. Gentleman asked me to say how the Government have been monitoring the Abortion Act 1967 and ensuring that its provisions are properly applied. I am glad to do so. Compliance with the Abortion Act and the assurances that have been developed in the 20 years since that legislation are monitored in three broad ways—first, inspection; secondly, notification; and thirdly, investigation of complaints and allegations of abuse.

I refer first to inspection. All private sector nursing homes and clinics approved under the Abortion Act are subject to periodic unannounced inspections by the Dept's medical, nursing and investigative officers. A thorough check of business and administrative arrangements is made, and patients' notes and medical records are carefully examined. In the public sector, individual health authorities take the responsibility for the way in which abortion services are provided in their own area, just as they do for other forms of medical care.

As for notification, operating practitioners are required to notify the chief medical officer, within seven days, of each abortion that they perform. Forms are scrutinised by staff authorised by the chief medical officer to ensure that they do not show any contravention of the abortion law.

The Department investigates rigorously any specific complaints or allegations of abuse, as it did on the matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) at Question Time last Tuesday. Appropriate action is taken to deal with any irregularities that are discovered. In the extreme, that might well involve a reference to the director of Public Prosecutions or the withrawal of the Secretary of State's approval, or both.

The hon. Gentleman asked: how can we secure a more vigilant application of the law in the light of scientific advance? We feel that we have not just done that, but have gone further. The control of late abortions is a typical example of the way in which the assurances required by the Secretary of State can be varied to take account of new situations and medical developments.

Medical developments now make possible, as the hon. Member for Workington rightly stated, the survival of some infants born before 28 weeks. In 1985 the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, in a report requested by the Government on foetal viability and clinical practice, recommended that the age after which a foetus is considered viable should be changed from 28 weeks to 24 weeks. In the private sector the DHSS initially agreed a voluntary limit of 24 weeks. Subsequently, in February 1986, that was made a condition of approval. On inspection visits all cases over 20 weeks are now carefully monitored and we are satisfied that those arangements are working. The Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists has also sent out the document to all its members, who must comply with it.

The age has effectively been reduced in the light of medical science. It was argued in debates recently in another place that we should see how the voluntary arrangement works before proceeding further.

With regard to the comments made by the hon. Member for Workington about the leaflet that referred to breaking the law, the Royal college was extremely careful to explain that that is not what the leaflet was about. The college was so concerned that it included the following statement in italics:

"The Committee, recognising the complexity of the present legislation relating to fetal viability, did not address themselves in detail to the legal issue, but concentrated on clinical considerations."

The college then stated:

"For this reason they did not attempt to define viability in terms that would be legally acceptable but have described it as it is used by clinicians, for example, when maturity is a important factor in deciding whether or not to deliver a preterm fetus from an unfavourable intrauterine environment. It is our view that in the clinical sense of the word the fetus is viable when there is good evidence that survival is a reasonable possibility, given the availability of what is currently regarded as the best of neonatal care."

We do not share the hon. Gentleman's view that the law has been broken in the way that he described. As far as I am aware, there have been no successful prosecutions under the existing legislation—either public or private prosecutions — in recent years. Broadly speaking, practice has changed in the light of scientific knowledge.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a large number of late abortions and mentioned the figures for the three latest years. I must stress that the three latest years that he was able to use were 1983, 1984 and 1985. They were all years before the changes I have just described. I have therefore taken into account the points that he made.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister give way on that brief point?

Mrs. Currie: I want to respond to one or two of the points that the hon. Gentleman has made.

I urge the hon. Gentleman not to attack people like Dr. Modle. That was a most disgraceful attack. Dr. Modle is a member of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists and is a most distinguished public servant. The hon. Gentleman's remarks contradict all the conventions of the House. I am prepared to restate that the responsibility for the action of our officials rests with Ministers. I am glad to state our full confidence in Dr. Modle and his staff and we are very fortunate to have him.

The hon. Gentleman raised the point about notification and pay beds. The notification of an abortion shows the location where it was carried out. If it was carried out in a National Health Service hospital that is shown in the statistics. I am satisfied that that is a sensible approach. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will continue to disagree about that.

The hon. Gentleman knows that the Oxford students' case was taken to appeal and the Court of Appeal held that on the evidence that a foetus of 18 to 21 weeks was incapable even of breathing, it was not a child capable of being born alive within the meaning of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929. The court left open the question whether the prospective putative father had locus standi to bring proceedings or whether the child could bring proceedings. The father applied to the House of Lords for leave to appeal on the question whether an unborn child of 18 to 21 weeks' gestation was capable of being born alive. That was refused.

The hon. Gentleman may call in evidence the words and arguments of the plaintiff in that case, Mr. C., and question the actions of the judges concerned. However, I understand from the transcript that the judges proceeded as they did at the request of counsel for both sides, mainly because of the urgency of the case.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Not both sides.

Mrs. Currie: That is my information. The transcript shows that the parties proceeded on that basis with the understanding of counsel on both sides.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is wrong.

Mrs. Currie: We have no option but to respect the law as it stands and as it is restated in case law. As there was no further action on the locus standi, Mrs. Justice Heilbron's ruling in the High Court remains in force. She held that there was not a sufficient basis for the father's claim that the abortion of the foetus amounted to a threatened crime under the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929.

We can make progress by avoiding the need for late abortions in the first place. The hon. Gentleman will know that health authorities have been encouraged to improve administrative referral systems. Ministers have already announced plans for three family planning pregnancy counselling projects for young people, which might help to reduce delay. A submission has been placed before my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton), the Minister for Health, and we are expecting an announcement soon.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman shares with me the feeling that we wish to see abortions not being necessary at all. A woman's right to choose exists before conception as well as after it.

The hon. Gentleman has said that there are many in the Labour party who feel as he does. I am sure that he will accept that this is not a party-political issue and that feelings run deep in all the main political parties. Should he need proof of that, he might do no worse than read the speeches of Lord Houghton of Sowerby in the debates on the Bishop of Birmingham's Bill in another place. It is clear that there were strong feelings against amending the law in the way that the hon. Gentleman would wish.

Abortion, fertility and its treatment, the use of embryos and embryonic material and related topics are most difficult issues and have been matters of public debate for some years. They have been aired and explored recently in the various documents including the Warnock report. The consultative document following that report, which takes up some of the other issues as well, is available for consultation and is likely to result in legislation. The Government have promised that certain alternative clauses will be prepared and that there will be a free vote. We have already declared our support for the Bishop of Birmingham's Bill, and that view still stands.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May I take the Minister back to the question that I asked her earlier? Does she accept that a foetus of 22 weeks can survive? That is all that I want to know. Does she accept that?

Mrs. Currie: I accept that the vast majority of foetuses at that age of gestation cannot now be born alive at all and cannot survive.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: But some can.

Mrs. Currie: I have no doubt—

Mr. Campbell-Savours: A minority can survive.

Mrs. Currie: I have no doubt that, even if it is not possible today, it may be possible in the near future.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister referred to the "vast majority".

Mrs. Currie: I have no strong feelings—

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Come on!

Mrs. Currie: It would help if the hon. Gentleman were willing to listen to what I have to say.

I have no doubt that if it is not possible now it will shortly be possible. The advances that are possible in medical science are such that the age of viability is likely to continue to fall. That is the age at which a baby may be born alive and viable. That is why the wording of the Act is as it is, and that is why we shall continue to monitor the statistics as they come.

The hon. Gentleman may look pleased with himself, but age does not alter or make any easier the arguments, the discussions and the care that has to be taken to ensure the welfare of mother and baby and of all the staff concerned. It is not an argument in which we wish to score points, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would wish to agree with that.

Much of the hon. Gentleman's argument has been based on the notion—he used the term—of "abortion on social grounds" or for social reasons. He knows that that is not legal in this country, though I believe that it is used as a form of contraception in one or two countries. We would find that unacceptable here and the law is specific. All abortions are tragedies for all concerned and especially, perhaps, for women. I welcome this opportunity to explore the issues again briefly.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes past Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ethnic Monitoring

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the numbers of entrants to the Privy Council Office from the ethnic minorities in the years 1985-86 and 1986-87; if he will also list the monitoring procedures used to ascertain the percentage of the work force represented by ethnic minorities and their patterns of promotion; and what are his methods of recruitment of minorities into the Department.

Mr. Biffen: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 6 March 1987, at column 704, providing the latest available information on entrants to the Cabinet Office, which includes my office.

London Newspapers

Mr. Dubs asked the Lord Privy Seal how many copies of (a) the Standard and (b) the London Daily News are bought each day for the use of hon. Members.

Mr. Biffen: Up to now 168 copies of the Standard, 24 copies of the London Daily News and 5 copies of the Evening News have been purchased by the Serjeant at Arms' Department for the use of Members. From 9 March the number of London Daily News to be taken is being increased to 39. These numbers are subject to review in the light of demand.

In addition, the Library takes each day two copies of the mid-day edition and four copies of the 6 pm edition of the Standard, and two copies of the first edition and four copies of the last edition of the London Daily News.

Taxis

Mr. Heffer asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list in the Official Report the names of hon. and right hon. Members who, prior to the resolution of the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) of 17 February concerning taxis at the Members' Entrance, made representations to the Committee for a change in the arrangements; how many representations for the rescission of that resolution have been made since 17 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: Five representations from hon. or right hon. Members are recorded on file as having been made prior to 17 February 1987. Other less formal complaints have been made orally to members of the Services Committee from time to time. It is not customary to identify individual complainants.

Since 17 February, four representations have been received urging reconsideration of the Service Committee's resolution, two of which have come from hon. Members, including one from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton himself. I have referred these representations in the first instance to the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee.

Cleaning Contracts

Mr. Skinner asked the Lord Privy Seal whether the Services Committee was consulted prior to the award of new cleaning contracts for the Palace of Westminster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: No. This is a matter for the Property Services Agency.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prison Population

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present number of prisoners in prison in Northern Ireland who are serving sentences after having been convicted by the evidence of convicted terrorists or informants.

Mr. Scott: It is our understanding that no one is in prison in Northern Ireland who has been convicted solely on the evidence of a former accomplice.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many broadleaved woodlands have been notified as areas of special scientific interest in Northern Ireland; and how many tree preservation orders exist covering areas of broadleaved woodland, rather than individual trees.

Mr. Needham: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the latest estimates of the extent of (a) forest service and (b) privately owned broadleaved woodlands in Northern Ireland; and when those estimates were made.

Mr. Needham: It is estimated that there are 1,100 hectares of pure broadleaved woodland on forest service land and a further 4,100 hectares of mixed broadleaf-conifer plantations. This estimate was made in 1986.

It is estimated that there are 7,000 hectares of privately owned pure broadleaved woodland and a further 2,400 hectares of mixed broadleaf-conifer plantations. This estimate was made in 1987.

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much broadleaved woodland has been felled in Northern Ireland in each year since 1980; and what proportions of this have been (a) restocked with broadleaves, (b) planted with conifers, (c) converted to agriculture and (d) lost to road, urban or industrial development.

Mr. Needham: The following areas of broadleaved woodland have been felled on forest service land in Northern Ireland.

	hectares
1981	5·9
1982	0·5
1983	1·4

	hectares
1984	4·2
1985	5·7
1986	5·9

All of the above areas were restocked with broadleaves, none was planted with pure conifers, none converted to agriculture or lost to roads etc.

The Department does not keep similar records in respect of the private sector.

WALES

National Museum of Wales

33. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of the level of attendance at the national museum of Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) on 19 January 1987, at column 418.

Angling Clubs (Compensation Scheme)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will introduce a compensation scheme to recompense angling clubs for restocking costs arising from the Chernobyl disaster and for the loss of amenity suffered by these clubs.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The levels of radioactivity in fish as a result of the Chernobyl accident are such that considerations of restocking, loss of amenity or compensation do not arise.

Fish (Radioactivity)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has recieved on the need to restock Llyn Conwy with trout free from radioactivity.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will arrange for a general survey to be undertaken on a regular basis of all lakes in Wales to discover the levels of radioactivity in fish; and if he will publish a list of those lakes where this has already been undertaken.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A regular programme of monitoring for radioactivity in the aquatic environment is already undertaken around nuclear installations, the results of which are published annually in the aquatic environment monitoring report and placed in the Library of the House. Monitoring may be extended where particular circumstances so require as, for example, in the aftermath of the Chernobyl accident when the programme was extended to include other lakes and rivers in the areas of high deposition. The relevant lakes in Wales were Alwen, Cwmstraddlyn, Bodlyn, Conwy, Cwmorthin, Trawsfynydd and Vyrnwy.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the radioactivity levels detected in trout taken from (a) Llyn Conwy, (b) Llyn Cwmorthin and (c) Llyn Alwen over the past six months giving in each case the levels of caesium 134 and caesium 137 in these samples.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The average levels of Caesium 134 and Caesium 137 recorded in brown trout in the lakes referred to over the past six months are given in the following table:

Location	Level (Bq/Kg)		Date collected
	Cs—134	Cs—137
Llyn Conwy	238	530	26 September 1986
	194	455	5 December 1986
	194	490	9 December 1986
Llyn Cwmorthin	30	79	9 September 1986
	68	170	28 November 1986
Llyn Alwen	41	104	4 September 1986
	66	147	15 September 1986
	45	79	18 September 1986
	65	145	8 November 1986
	97	227	11 November 1986

Assessment of the activity in these fish, coupled with likely consumption rates, indicates that they do not constitute a significant source of radiation exposure to members of the public.

National Childminding Association

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what financial assistance his Department is giving in the current financial year to the National Childminding Association in Wales; what provisions he has made for such assistance in the coming financial year 1987-88; and whether any longer term commitment has been given by his Department.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A grant of £15,000 has been approved in 1986-87. Further grant aid will be considered in the light of progress on the first year's development work.

Health Authorities (Clerks)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many clerks have been appointed by health authorities in Wales on short-term contracts during 1986-87 to examine hospital waiting lists and to report progress to his Department.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is not available in the form requested.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department is monitoring health authorities' reviews of hospital waiting lists so as to assess the extent to which reductions are achieved by increases in efficiency in treating more patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In addition to the information already being received quarterly on waiting lists and patient throughput, district health authorities in Wales have been asked to supply monthly information to the Welsh Office showing throughput of patients on their most problematic waiting lists.

Dairy Farms (Inspections)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has had from farmers' unions in Wales concerning Her Majesty's Government's plan to charge dairy farmers £90 per visit for inspections under the Milk and Dairy Regulations; what is his estimate of the cost of implementing this measure; and what is the estimated annual sum to be raised by the £90 visit fee in an average year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The farming unions in Wales have made many representations to me concerning the charges which are being introduced for work under the Milk and Dairies Regulations. The total cost of this work in England and Wales is approximately £2 million, and we expect to recover this by charging £90 for a dairy farm visit —£80 for producers with less than 20 cows—and £22 for a sampling/testing visit.

Play Board

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has met Play Board to discuss the arrangements for changes in the national children's play service; what plans he has to ensure that the service will continue; what cash amounts he has dispensed annually to Play Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Play Board—the Association for Children's Play and Recreation Ltd — is funded primarily by the Department of the Environment, and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State —the Minister with responsibilities for sport—has held discussions with Play Board and other bodies concerned with children's play. The Welsh arm of Play Board received grant contributions of £50,000 provided via the Sports Council for Wales in 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87. The arrangements for funding the development of children's play in Wales are under review.

Engineering Industry

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many workers in Wales are in the engineering industry in 1986 as compared with 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In the metal goods, engineering and vehicles sector—division 3 of the 1980 Standard Industrial Classification — the estimated number of employees in employment in September 1986 was 70,000. The corresponding figure for September 1979 was 122,000. These statistics do not include the self-employed.

Skill Shortages

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what efforts he is making to establish the extent of skills shortages in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: A wide range of information about skills shortages is already available from reports, surveys and other sources. The Manpower Services Commission has recently set up the skills unit to bring this information together, and to facilitate the use made of it and further research.

Engineering (Skills Training)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he plans to meet the Engineering Industry Training Board and to meet employers' associations in Wales to encourage skills training.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My ministerial colleagues and I meet a great many employers and trainers from all parts of industry in the course of our day-to-day work and the need for skills training often figures in our discussions. I have no plan at present to meet the Engineering Industry Training Board or employers' associations in Wales.

Health Services (Privatisation)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish details of the progress made by health authorities in putting their domestic, catering and laundry services out to tender in the manner of the reply of 24 November 1986, Official Report, columns 23-6.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Since my reply of 24 November, the Department has been informed that a further domestic services contract has been let in-house by Powys health authority for the Mid Wales and Bronllys hospitals and district headquarters, with estimated savings of some £36,000 per annum.

Private In-patient Care

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made by his Department in its follow-up action on the statutory auditor's report about debts from providing private in-patient care.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Following the statutory audit review of private medical practice, the Department required district health authorities in Wales to review their systems for the identification, recording and collection of private patient income and take any necessary remedial action. Nearly all health authorities in Wales have satisfactorily completed these reviews. District health authorities have also been required to inform the Department of the steps they have taken to identify income owing to the NHS as a result of treatment not being properly charged for, and of the measures taken to effect recovery. Where the income cannot be collected, authorities have been advised to record the unrecovered income as a loss and to bring it to account in their annual accounts losses statement. As I indicated in my reply to the hon. Gentleman on 24 November 1986, at columns 19-21, the statutory auditor's reports on invidual authorities will not be cleared until all outstanding points have been satisfactorily resolved.

Patient Care

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide final figures for expenditure on (a) contractual arrangements for patient care and (b) income and debt incurred under sections 65 and 66 of the National Health Service Act 1977 given on a provisional basis in his answers of 24 November 1986, Official Report, columns 21-22 and 28.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The figures previously provided were taken from the annual accounts of health authorities. Although the statutory auditor has completed his audit of the individual authority accounts, the Comptroller and Auditor General has yet to finalise his audit of the summarised accounts prior to his report to Parliament. There have been no amendments to the figures previously provided, but, pending the submission to Parliament of the summarised accounts, the figures should still be regarded as provisional.

EEC Butter and Beef (Distribution)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much EEC butter and beef, by weight and estimated value, has been distributed and remains to be distributed and under what methods and principles, in each of the eight counties of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Procurement of these products from appropriate sources, and distribution to individuals is being undertaken by charitable organisations. They are making the necessary local arrangements. Products must be distributed free of charge to the most needy for their own use. These include those on supplementary benefit and family income supplement; and other groups of people who are either homeless, living in hostels, attending feeding centres, receiving meals-on-wheels or very disadvantaged in other ways.

Figures of the amounts and value of produce distributed in particular geographical areas are not available.

Schools (Welsh Language)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of schools in Wales, at each level, in each of the counties of Wales which teach in the medium of Welsh; what is his estimate of the number of pupils in such schools by county; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information on the number of primary schools which have a class or classes where some or all of the teaching is through the medium of Welsh is given in the following table:

Number of schools

	Clwyd	Dyfed	Gwent	Gwynedd	Mid Glamorgan	Powys	South Glamorgan	West Glamorgan
A. Schools having classes where Welsh is the sole or main medium of instruction	38	107	6	134	28	18	8	16
B. Schools having classes where some of the teaching is through the medium of Welsh	33	130	—	53	4	9	6	7

Note: At September 1985. The mode of instruction in primary schools varies widely according to linguistic background and a school may have classes in more than one category. However, each school appears once only in this Table, under the appropriate heading. Thus a school entered in line B as having classes where some of the teaching is through the medium of Welsh, does not have any classes where Welsh is the sole or main medium of teaching (line A).

Information on the number of all pupils attending the schools shown in the above table are not readily available.

However, figures in the following table indicate the number of pupils in classes where some or all of the teaching is through the medium of Welsh:

Number of pupils[1]

	Clwyd	Dyfed	Gwent	Gwynedd	Mid Glamorgan	Powys	South Glamorgan	West Glamorgan
Pupils in classes where Welsh is the sole or main medium of instruction	3,514	5,418	519	10,616	5,038	810	1,510	1,943
Number of pupils in classes where some of the teaching is through the medium of Welsh	2,733	8,482	—	6,671	524	498	797	774

[1] At September 1985.

Comparable data on pupil numbers receiving instruction through the medium of Welsh is not available for secondary schools.

The number of secondary schools using Welsh as a medium for teaching in years I to V, however, is as follows:

Number of schools[1]

	Clwyd	Dyfed	Gwent	Gwynedd	Mid Glamorgan	Powys	South Glamorgan	West Glamorgan
Welsh used as a medium for teaching:

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) primary school children and (b) secondary school students attend Welsh-medium schools, or units, in each local education authority area in Wales; what proportion of the total they represent in each case; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1977.

Mr. Wyn Roberts [pursuant to his reply, 27 February, c. 452]: The information on pupils attending designated bilingual schools is given in the following tables:

	Clwyd	Dyfed	Gwent	Gwynedd	Mid Glamorgan	Powys	South Glamorgan	West Glamorgan

The figures in the previous tables do not include pupils attending schools in mainly Welsh speaking areas where the main medium of instruction is Welsh, nor do they include pupils receiving instruction through the medium of Welsh in units or classes within schools which are not designated as bilingual. From September 1985, however, information has been collected on pupil numbers in primary school classes where some or all of the teaching is through the medium of Welsh. These figures are given in the table. Comparable data on pupil numbers receiving instruction through the medium of Welsh is not available for secondary schools.

TRANSPORT

Ethnic Monitoring

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the numbers of entrants to his Department from the ethnic minorities in the years 1985-86, and 1986-87; if he will also list the monitoring procedures used to ascertain the percentage of the work force represented by ethnic minorities and their patterns of promotion; and what are his methods of recruitment of minorities into the Department.

Mr. Moore: The ethnic origins of new entrants have been surveyed since 1 October 1985. The latest available information for my Department for the period from then to 1 March 1987 is as follows:

	Number
Total new entrants	1,576
Ethnic origins
— white	1,105
— black/asian	45
— non-respondents	426

A phased programme of departmental surveys of the ethnic origin of non-industrial civil servants by means of voluntary self-classification is being conducted. By the end of 1986 all non-industrial staff in the county of Avon, the north-west, the east and west midlands, London, the south-east and East Anglia had been surveyed. All remaining staff will be surveyed by 1988. Consideration is being given to ways of using the data on the ethnic origin of staff-in-post to monitor promotion.

All departmental recruitment is conducted on the basis of fair and open competition and selection is on merit. I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Privy Council Office on 20 February 1987 at columns 880-81 reporting the arrangements being made to encourage people from the ethnic minorities to apply to the Civil Service.

London Underground (Automated Ticketing)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of London Regional Transport, he will discuss with him progress in introducing a totally automated ticketing system for the London underground; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department received regular progress reports on the Underground ticketing system. These indicate that the project will be completed by the end of next year, on time and within the approved budget of £135 million (end 1984 prices). Full replacement of ticket machines throughout the network will speed up ticket issue and reduce queueing, as well as improving staff security and accounting facilities. Automatic ticket-checking gates in the central area will further reduce costs and fraud. The investment will make a substantial contribution to creating a modern and efficient railway in the capital.

Bus Deregulation

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the effect of bus deregulation on the coverage and frequency of services in rural and suburban areas during early morning, evening and Sundays.

Mr. David Mitchell: The level of services has been broadly maintained over the country as a whole, and most local authorities have successfully provided support for these services which they consider necessary on social grounds. Naturally in some cases they have withdrawn support for low priority services carrying few passengers on good housekeeping grounds.

A56 Chester Road

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what point on the improved A56 Chester road is the nearest point to Nos. 1-12 Longford close; and how far is the distance between those two locations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The improvement to the A56 Chester road, Stretford, completed in June 1975, which has now led to further offers of noise insulation, finished just south of the junction with Davyhulme road east. The distance from that point to the nearest point on the flats Nos. 1-12 Longford close is 310 m.

I shall write again to the hon. Gentleman.

Highway Code

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will summarise in the Official Report the main changes in the revised highway code; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have sent a copy of the highway code and a summary of the changes to each Member of Parliament.

The main changes are:

—new advice on drinking and driving;
—additional advice on the safety of children in cars;
—stronger emphasis on the needs and problems of vulnerable road users; pedestrians, cyclists and motorcyclists;
—information about speed limits;
—additional advice on car security;
—new advice on the use of car telephones.

Kingmoor Motor Transport Sheds, Carlisle

Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received an application from British Rail for the proposed sale of Kingmoor motor transport sheds, Carlisle, to a private company; and whether he seeks to discover the extent as to whether existing consultation procedures have been carried out when dealing with such applications.

Mr. David Mitchell: No; nor would he expect to involve himself in matters of this nature which are the responsibility of the management of British Rail.

Airlines (UK Airports)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many airlines landed passengers in United Kingdom airports in 1986.

Mr. Moore: Full statistics for 1986 are not yet available but during August, a sample peak month, some 149 airlines, excluding solely domestic and air-taxi operations, landed passengers at United Kingdom airports.

Seafarers

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the effect of new flag arrangements upon the total number of United Kingdom citizens employed as seafarers since 1980.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The information is not available.

East Coast Railway Line

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with the chairman of British Rail in relation to investment in the east coast line.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend discussed the electrification of the east coast main line with senior board officials when he inspected progress on this important scheme on 15 October last year. I also discussed progress when I travelled with BR officials on the first electric train from Huntington to Kings Cross on 3 November.

Disused Canals

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy towards building roads over disused canals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Each case is considered on its merits. The statutory position is that if a canal although disused is still classed as a navigable waterway, special procedures have to be complied with. If there are no navigable rights, the usual procedures for building roads and acquiring land apply.

M25 (Facilities for HGV Drivers)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to provide further facilities on the M25 for those driving heavy goods vehicles to obtain rest, refreshment and refuelling.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We plan, as a matter of priority, to provide four motorway service areas at broadly the cardinal compass points of the M25. The site at South Mimms is scheduled to open in May. The existing facilities for heavy goods vehicles will expand. The Thurrock site is planned to open in 1988-89. The proposal for Clacket lane, near Westerham, awaits the outcome of a public inquiry. I shall shortly make a statement about the remaining site proposed at Iver. All motorway service areas provide rest, refreshment and refuelling facilities for heavy goods vehicle drivers.

M6 (Facilities for HGV Drivers)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, once the northern relief road in the midlands is in use, he will take steps to provide facilities for rest, refreshment and refuelling on the M6 for drivers of heavy goods vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Provision of a motorway service area site is an integral part of our proposals for a northern relief road of the west midlands conurbation. I have no other plans to supplement the existing MSAs on the length of M6 through the west midlands region.

M1/A1 Link (Facilities for HGV Drivers)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what facilities for rest, refreshment and refuelling for those driving heavy goods vehicles are planned on the proposed M1/A1 link.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department's proposals include large laybys every 5 km to cater for the high proportion of HGVs expected to use this route. On an all-purpose trunk road such as this it would be for private developers to take the initiative in providing filling stations, cafes and similar facilities, subject to the normal planning considerations. Several potential developers have already shown interest.

Heavy Goods Vehicles (Licences)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many holders of heavy goods vehicle licences have lost their licences as a result of failing medical tests taken compulsorily after licence holders reach the age of 46 years; how many licence holders have retained their licences on appeal; and what discussions he has had with employers with a view to introducing compensation arrangements and arrangements for offering alternative employment to heavy goods vehicle licence holders who lose their licence on medical grounds.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Holders of heavy goods vehicle drivers' licences are normally required to have a medical examination at each three-yearly renewal after they reach the age of 60. The traffic commissioners do not keep statistics on the ages of those to whom they refuse renewal, and there are no data about those who allow their licences to lapse on medical advice. Compensation or alternative employment for those who become unfit to drive heavy goods vehicles is not a matter for this Department.

Road Users (Service Facilities)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he is giving to the recent report on "The Travel Needs of Road Users" published by the Association of County Councils, in particular the recommendation that special attention should be paid in the design of all highway schemes to the need for service facilities provision, and where appropriate additional land purchased for this purpose prior to construction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are considering the ACC report and propose to respond to it shortly. On motorways we currently seek to arrange that service areas are provided either when the road opens or as soon as possible thereafter. It is not always feasible to buy the necessary land before construction. On trunk roads, provision of services is primarily a matter for private initiative; we are considering in the light of the ACC's report whether we should take further action to facilitate provision in the right locations.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

BBC, Scotland (Police Raid)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if the procurator fiscal has informed the Lord Advocate of the interviews conducted by police officers on 27 February with Mr. Pat Chalmers and Colonel Alan Protheroe of the BBC at Glasgow police station; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: It would not be proper practice for me to disclose during the course of a criminal investigation which persons have been seen by the police and for what purpose. As my noble and learned Friend, the Lord Advocate, explained in another place on 4 March, the police investigations continue and at the conclusion thereof the police will make a report to the procurator fiscal.

Sheriff Officers

Mr. Dewar asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will give the number of sheriff officers in Scotland in each of the last 10 years.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: These figures are not available centrally, but it is understood that there are at present 146 sheriff officers.

Degrees in Summary Cause

Mr. Dewar asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will give the number of degrees in summary cause issued by Scottish courts last year and in each of the previous five years.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The number of summary causes disposed of in 1984 (the latest year for which figures are available) and the previous five years is set out in the following table:

	Number
1979	117,005
1980	134,724
1981	109,153
1982	146,061
1983	130,570
1984	125,138

Those figures are drawn from the annual publication of Civil Judicial Statistics, Scotland where there is no separate figure for cases disposed of by decree as opposed to cases taken out of court.

Warrant Sales and Poindings

Mr. Dewar asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will publish a table showing for each of the last 10 years the number of (i) warrant sales, (ii) occasions on which warrant sales have been advertised and (iii) poindings in Scotland.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The information available in the successive annual publications of Civil Judicial Statistics, Scotland is as follows:

	Warrant Sales	Poindings
1979	226	14,515
1980	231	21,096
1981	287	14,926
1982	403	17,014
1983	477	16,478
1984	512	16,887

No separate figures are available for years before 1979. There is a requirement to give public notice of all warrant sales.

Rates (Non-payments)

Mr. Dewar asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will give the number of warrants issued by Scottish courts for non-payment of rates in each of the last five years.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Information is not centrally available for the number of summary warrants issued solely for non-payment of rates.

EMPLOYMENT

Job Creation (Art Content)

94. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Paymaster General what indications he has of the proportion of total expenditure by the Manpower Services Commission on employment measures with an arts content.

Mr. Lee: It is estimated that in 1986-87 the Manpower Services Commission will spend about £21 million on arts-related projects through the community programme and the voluntary projects programme. The Commission will also spend about £9 million on supporting arts-related small businesses through the enterprise allowance scheme.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Paymaster General if he will list the numbers of entrants to his Department from the ethnic minorities in the years 1985-86 and 1986-87; if he will also list the monitoring procedures used to ascertain the percentage of the work force represented by ethnic minorities and their patterns of promotion; what are his methods of recruitment of minorities into the Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have been surveying the ethnic origins of new entrants into my Department since October 1985. The latest available information for the period up to 31 December 1986 is as follows:

	Number
Total new entrants to the Department of Employment (DE) Group in period 1 October 1985—31 December 1986	11,145
Ethnic origins
White	7,601
Black/Asian	632
Not stated	2,912

The Government are conducting a phased programme to survey the ethnic origin of all non-industrial civil servants by means of voluntary self-classification. The Department of Employment group has now completed its surveys. We are now considering ways of using the data on the ethnic origin of staff-in-post to monitor promotion.

All DE group recruitment is conducted on the basis of fair and open competition and selection is on merit. I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Privy Council Office, for the Civil Service on 20 February 1987 at columns 880-881 reporting the arrangements being made to encourage people from the ethnic minorities to apply to the Civil Service.

Jobs (Portsmouth)

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General how many new full-time or full-time equivalent jobs have been created in Portsmouth since 1983.

Mr. Lee: Information about numbers of jobs created is not available from my Department's statistics. Net changes in employment can be given but, for areas smaller than regions, only for those dates when censuses of employment are taken. The latest available figures for Portsmouth are from the September 1981 census of employment and are available in the Library. The September 1984 census estimates for local areas are not yet available.

Jobcentres

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to reduce the number of jobcentres (a) nationally or (b) in the Manchester area.

Mr. Lee: No.

Engineering Apprenticeships

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Paymaster General how many engineering apprenticeships were supplied in 1979 and in 1986.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Unemployment (Kirklees)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Paymaster General if he will detail, ward by ward, the unemployment figures in Kirklees district for 1979 and 1983; and if he will give the latest figures.

Mr. Lee: Following is the available information, which is also in the Library. The table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants in the electoral wards of the Kirklees local authority district for June 1983 and January 1987. the comparison is affected by seasonal factors and changes in the method of collection and compilation of the data. Statistics of unemployment for electoral wards are derived from the ward-based system and are available only from June 1983.

Electoral ward	9 June 1983	8 January 1987
Kirklees No. 1	1,149	1,282

Resource Centre

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General how many Manpower Services Commission funded advice centres specifically for ethnic minorities, similar to the resource centre in Huddersfield there are in the United Kingdom; where they are, and if there are any plans to open other centres in the next year.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is not available centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. Any plans for similar advice centres would be considered by Manpower Services Commission officials with the advice of the Area Manpower Board.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General how much money has been allocated for the Manpower Services Commission funded resource centre in Huddersfield for 1987.

Mr. Lee: The resource centre in Huddersfield is part of a project funded under the community programme. Approximately £53,000 has been allocated for the resource centre from the funding available to the project.

Job Training Scheme

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General (1) whether trainee participants in the new job training scheme are permitted or were expected to be included in shiftwork during placement;

(2) whether participants in the new job training scheme are permitted or were expected to work overtime during placement;

(3) how many job training scheme participants have found placement within Government Departments; and if he will make a statement;

(4) whether he will increase the allowance to participants in the new job training schemes to compensate for midday meals taken outside the home whilst under training with a management agent and on placement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Natural History Museum

89. Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in the last month on the proposed introduction of admission charges to the natural history museum.

91. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in the last month on the proposed introduction of admission charges to the natural history museum.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received four letters from right hon. and hon. Members.

90. Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has recently met relevant trade unions to discuss the proposed introduction of admission charges to the natural history museum.
